NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

Two events, which in themselves seem of minor importance, have greatly disturbed Northerners. The first is the expedition of General Stuart into Pennsylvania via Maryland. The people can neither forgive nor forget it. It has proved to them, and, if to them, to the Southerners, the vulnerability of Northern territory. General McClellan had a large army under his command, and yet he could not prevent a body of Confederate cavalry from entering Pennsylvania, capturing horses and clothing, having a merry time with the inhabitants of Chambersburg, who cared not for the destruction and loss of Government property whilst their own was respected; and then returning to Virginia loaded, hampered with spoils, without molestation of any kind. McClellan, according to the War Department at Washington, promised that the "rebels" should not escape death or capture, but they reached headquarters without a scratch. It was a dashing exploit and a substantial, bloodless victory. It is an affair, moreover, which, we repeat, has a moral effect. If McClellan's large army cannot protect Northern territory, what will become of Northern frontier towns where there is no army to protect them? The Federal press decries the Government and the commanders; but their indignation would not be so great if it were not for the uncomfortable reflection that what General Stuart has done can be done again. If the Confederates chose they could retaliate for the barbarity of the tyrant of New Orleans, or the atrocity of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation. There is a tolerable confidence that the South will not retaliate, but it is not pleasant to have to trust to the unmerited mercy of a generous enemy. The great defeats sustained by the North have not produced so much real panic as General Stuart's last expedition.

The second event that has disturbed and altogether unsettled the Federal public is the operations of "290." This vessel, which is worthy of being the successor of the Sumter, has played such havoc with the Federal marine, that the rate of insurance has increased 5 per cent. It is thus apparent that the commerce as well as the territory of the North is vulnerable. If privateering should be facilitated by the Confederate Congress, the North will find its trade completely crippled. It is aggravating, as well as alarming, to find that the South can retaliate both by sea and land, and we can understand the anger of the New York Chamber of Commerce, but we cannot so well understand that it should threaten this country. According to the telegraphic summary,—

The New York Chamber of Commerce has passed resolutions stating that the destruction of the ship Brilliant by the Confederate steamer Alabama is a crime against humanity. The Chamber of Commerce has not failed to notice the change in British sentiments, transforming a friendly nation into a Power the nature of whose neutrality is shown by its permitting ships to go forth, and armaments to follow them, for the work of plundering and destroying American vessels, thus encouraging upon the high seas an offence against neutral rights, upon the plea of which, in the case of the Trent, England threatened to plunge the American Government into war. The Chamber has heard with amazement that other vessels are fitting out in British ports to continue the work of destruction begun by the Alabama. It is the duty of the Chamber of Commerce to warn British merchants that a repetition of such acts as burning the Brilliant by vessels fitted out in England, and manned by British seamen, cannot fail to produce wide-spread exasperation in America. The Chamber therefore invokes the influence of all men who value peace and goodwill among all nations to prevent the departure of other vessels of the same character from their ports, and thus avoid the calamity of war.

The resolutions close by declaring that it is the desire and interest of Americans to cherish and maintain sentiments of amity with England.

Copies of the resolutions are to be forwarded to the Board of Trade in London.

The New York Chamber of Commerce must, we presume, be aware that the North has supplied herself from England with the warlike stores which has enabled her to perpetrate "crimes against humanity" in the South. Our neutrality has been to allow either party to trade with our markets, and certainly the North has used the privilege to provide warlike stores to an immense amount. The neutrality was greatly in favour of the Federals, because the South, being blockaded, she was almost excluded from the European markets, and when the stores were procured, there was the expense, difficulty, and danger of running the blockade. If the New York Chamber of Commerce supposes we shall help the North to subjugate the South, it is labouring under a strange error; and with regard to threats we are confident that the English public will not tolerate anything more than verbal insults. We cannot help the pluck, devotion, and resources of the South. It is not England's fault that Northern States and Northern commerce can be invaded and crippled by Southern troops and Southern ships. However, we may well rejoice that the North is now learning that she cannot try to subjugate and exterminate the Southern people with impunity. It is, of course, extremely annoying that whilst General Stuart is supplying his troops with stores and clothing from the Federal stores at Chambersburg, the Federal army under McClellan should "be unable to advance on account of short supplies of clothing and stores for the troops," but the annoyance hardly justifies the startling resolutions of the New York Chamber of Commerce. If the "290" offends, why not take her? That may be difficult, but it is the only remedy for the Federal Government.

General Stuart's expedition is not the only brilliant Southern exploit we have to record. A few days since we were told that General Morgan had been routed by the Federal General Dupont. We now hear from Northern sources a little more about the affair. Whatever the "route" might have been, it appears that on the 18th of this month General Morgan "started with 1500 men, 'dashed' into Lexington, Kentucky, capturing the town and 100 prisoners." Nothing is said about the stores captured, but the occupation of Lexington is a sufficient reply to the former account of General Morgan's discomfiture. The Confederates afterwards evacuated the town, but we may be sure that the report of "a sharp engagement in which General Morgan's forces were routed and scattered," is about as truthful as the former report of his overthrow, and which we last week ventured to discredit. We are more confident of this, because the same telegram that announces he is closely pursued, informs us that he has captured eighty waggons.

Nashville is completely surrounded by the Confederates, and a demand has been made for its surrender.

The Northern papers have been urging General McClellan to advance. He has done so, but afterwards retired to Harper's Ferry. This has somewhat damaged the Republican party. The Northern public begins to understand the nature of the Maryland battles, and sees how the cause there was for the triumphant tone of the Federal commander. The following despatch and order of General Lee has been published:—

Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia, Camp on Washington River, Oct. 2.

General.—The enemy's cavalry, under General Pleasanton, with six pieces of artillery, drove back our pickets yesterday in front of Shepherdstown. The 9th Virginia Cavalry, which was on picket, repulsed the enemy several times by vigorous charges, disputing the ground step by step back to the main body. By the time his artillery reached him, Colonel N. F. H. Lee, who was in command of the brigade, was obliged to place it on the west bank of the Opequon, on the flank of the enemy, as he approached Martinsburg.

General Hampton's brigade had retired through Martinsburg, on the Tuscarora-road, when General Stuart arrived and made dispositions to attack. Lee's brigade was advanced immediately, and Hampton's ordered forward. The enemy retired at the approach of Lee along the Shepherdstown-road and was driven across the Potomac by the cavalry, with severe loss; and darkness alone prevented it from being a signal victory. His rear was overtaken and put to flight, our cavalry charging in gallant style under a severe fire of artillery driving squadron after squadron, killing a number, wounding more, and capturing several. He was driven through Shepherdstown, and crossed the river after dark, in no case standing a hand to hand conflict, but relying upon his artillery carabineers at long range for protection.

I regret to add that we lost one lieutenant and several privates.—I am most respectfully, &c.,

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 116.

Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia, Oct. 2.

In reviewing the achievements of the army during the present campaign, the commanding general cannot withhold the expression of his admiration of the indomitable courage has displayed in battle and its cheerful endurance of privation and hardship on the march.

Since your great victories around Richmond you have defeated the enemy at Cedar Mountain, expelled him from Rappahannock, and after a conflict of three days, after repulsed him on the plains of Manassas, and forced him to take shelter within the fortifications around his capital.

Without halting for repose you crossed the Potomac, stormed the heights of Harper's Ferry, made prisoners of more than 11,000 men, and captured upwards of seventy pieces of artillery, all their small arms and other munitions of war.

While one corps of the army was thus engaged the other insured its success by arresting at Boonsborough the combined armies of the enemy, advancing under their favourite general to the relief of their beleaguered comrades.

On the field of Sharpsburg, with less than one-third his numbers, you resisted from daylight until dark the whole army of the enemy, and repulsed every attack along his entire front of more than four miles in extent.

The whole of the following day you stood prepared to resume the conflict on the same ground, and retired next morning, without molestation, across the Potomac.

Two attempts subsequently made by the enemy to follow you across the river have resulted in his complete discomfiture and being driven back with loss.

Achievements such as these demanded much valour and patriotism. History records few examples of greater fortitude and endurance than this army has exhibited; and I am commissioned by the President to thank you in the name of the Confederate States for the undying fame you have won for their arms.

Much as you have done, much more remains to be accomplished. The enemy again threatens us with invasion, and to your tried valour and patriotism the country looks with confidence for deliverance and safety; your past exploits give assurance that this confidence is not misplaced.

ding to the Northern reports, the Confederates in Virginia were strongly entrenched; it is evident that the Federal commanders are ignorant of the position of the enemy.

Northern accounts of the battle of Perryville a victory, and the capture of 9000 Federal prisoners.

military news is as usual confused. Amongst rumours it is again asserted that the Federal army under General McClellan is going into winter quarters. This would, no doubt, be a desirable step; with the present strength of the South, and especially after the activity displayed by General Grant, it will be dangerous and even impossible. The North may not be able to conquer, but she must fight.

Political affairs just now demand the public attention. In an article called "The Struggle for Peace in the North," our readers will find an account of the nature of the contest now going on between the Democrats and Republicans. We cannot indicate probable the results, though it is significant that till now the Northern Government has shown a marked indisposition to let the returns of the elections, as far as they have proceeded, transpire.

At a Democratic meeting held at New York, the following letter from General Scott was read, and produced a great sensation:—

Washington, March 3, 1861.

Dear Sir,—Hoping that in a day or two the new President will have happily passed through all personal dangers, and find himself installed as honoured successor of the great Washington, with you as the chief of his Cabinet, I beg leave to repeat in writing what I have before said to you orally—this supplement to my printed views dated in October last on the highly disordered condition of our so late happy and glorious Union. To meet the extraordinary exigencies of the times, it seems to me that I am guilty of no arrogance in limiting the President's field of selection to one of the four plans of procedure subjoined. 1. Throw off the old and assume a new designation—the Union party. Adopt the conciliatory measures proposed by Mr. Crittenden or the Peace Convention, and, my life upon it, we shall have no new case; but, on the contrary, an early return of many, if not of all, the States which have already broken off from the Union. 2. Adopt some equally benign measure, the remaining slaveholding States will, probably, join the Montgomery Confederacy in less than sixty days, when this city, being included in a foreign country, it would require a permanent garrison of at least 35,000 troops to protect the Government within it. 3. Collect the duties on foreign goods outside the ports of which the Government has lost the command, or close such ports by act of Congress and blockade them. 4. Conquer the seceded States by invading armies. No doubt this might be done in two or three years by a young and able general—a Wolfe, a de Saix, or a Hoche, with 300,000 disciplined men, estimating third for garrisons, and the loss of yet a greater number by skirmishes, sieges, battles, and Southern fevers. The destruction of life and property on the other side would be frightful, however perfect the moral discipline of the invaders. The conquest completed at that enormous waste of human life to the North and North-West, with at least 250,000,000 dead there, and cui bono fifteen devastated provinces to be brought into harmony with their conquerors, to be held for generations by heavy garrisons at expense quadruple the net duties or taxes which it would be possible to extort from them, followed by a Protector or an Emperor. 5. Say to the seceded States, "Wayward sisters, art in peace."

In haste, I remain very truly yours,

WINFIELD SCOTT

Hon. W. H. Seward, &c.

rice 300,000 men have failed to conquer the South, and "the frightful destruction of life and property" that has ensued since the commencement of the war has done nothing towards the conquest of the South, and if the General had to advise the President, he would probably urge his fourth suggestion—"Say to the seceded States, 'Wayward sisters, art in peace.'"

The Hon. J. A. R. Nelson, formerly a member of the House of Representatives, and who has hitherto been a strong Union man, has denounced Mr. Lincoln's proclamation as unequalled in atrocity and barbarism. He urges the people of East Tennessee, if they would save themselves from a species of carnage unequalled in the history of North America, but uninvited by the President's proclamation, at once, without waiting for the conscription, to take up their arms and volunteer in the struggle against Lincoln's Government. "No despot in Europe," he says, "would dare to exercise the powers which Mr. Lincoln in two years has usurped. He now claims the prerogative of abolishing slavery without the consent of East Tennessee. If he thus treats negroes, why may he not take lands, and reduce the people to a state of vassalage, of which no parallel can be found except in the history of the Middle Ages?"

General Butler "has officially announced that no plea of neutrality will be received from native inhabitants of New Orleans; that all refusing to take the oath of allegiance are enemies of the United States, and must send their names and a list of their property to the Provost-Marshal." Thus New Orleans is treated as a conquered city, and the people are compelled to take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government, under pain of spoliation and impeachment. An oath so extorted from helpless women cannot be held binding by the sternest moralist. It is merely an act of cruel and savage despotism on the part of the Federal commander.

The draft in some States is again postponed. No wonder the Washington Government is afraid to enforce it. "The residents of Luzerne County, in the mining districts of Pennsylvania, endeavoured to resist the draft. The military were called out, and fired upon the insurgents, killing four or five. Further opposition ceased." Thus the North has to recruit the ranks of its army by fire and sword.

A Federal foraging expedition up the Mississippi, on transports, does not seem to have met with much success. It is said some cattle were captured, but it is also admitted that "eighteen men were killed on board the transports by the Confederate batteries erected on the levees."

The following telegraphic summary of financial matters, under date New York, Oct. 18, needs no comment:—

The rapid rise in the premium on gold has created uneasiness in commercial and financial as well as in political circles. There has been a fall of 5 per cent. since Wednesday, when the price stood at 37½ per cent., but the general impression is that the fall will not be maintained, and that the higher rate will be speedily reached and surpassed. A deputation of merchants and bankers is preparing to visit Washington, for consultation on the subject with Mr. Secretary Chase.

At the latest date gold was quoted at 32 per cent. premium. The British steamship Gladiator has arrived at Liverpool, with advices from Bermuda to the 7th inst. The captain of the Gladiator, having heard previously to his departure from Bermuda that Commodore Wilkes, of steamship Trent notoriety, intended to capture the Gladiator, obtained the protection of Her Majesty's ship Desperate, which vessel accompanied him a certain distance from the port. The vessels had scarcely parted company when the Gladiator was boarded by a boat's crew from a Federal man-of-war, and the captain was ordered to go on board and report himself. The Desperate being within gunshot, he declined to obey the order, and was then allowed to proceed. The Desperate, on seeing the Gladiator boarded, immediately ran out two guns ready for action. We have elsewhere reprinted from the Bermuda Gazette, an account of the doings of Captain Wilkes.

The proclamation of Mr. Lincoln has not secured him many friends even in the North. Savage as it is in its character, it does not go far enough for the Abolitionists, who are indignant that Mr. Lincoln did not proclaim immediate and unconditional emancipation.

ENGLAND.

The distress in the manufacturing districts increases at an appalling rate. The Poor Law Board this week reports an addition of over 13,000 to the number of paupers, of whom more than 3500 are in Manchester and its suburbs, and above 2000 in Ashton-under-Lyne. The condition of the last-named town is horrible. Out of a population of 35,000 there are 25,000 paupers. Disease is making rapid progress among the starving population. A leading physician reports:—

As a medical officer of the Ashton Union, I have daily experience of the prevailing misery and want. Increase of sickness is the natural result. Fever, measles, scarlatina, rheumatism, pulmonary and other diseases are rapidly increasing, and I fear there will be great mortality during the winter, for the poor people have neither money nor credit, and are destitute of the common necessities of life, many of them subsisting on Indian meal and other cheap articles. Some families have no bedding or blankets, and huddle round the fire at night, or cover themselves with their day clothing, which is very scanty, and fast diminishing. My district includes the north side of the borough and adjoining villages. You will understand the ratio of increase when I report 300 cases for the last four weeks, as compared with only 54 cases for the corresponding weeks of October, 1861. . . . 1s. 6d. a-head is not sufficient to recruit the strength of sick people, who are wasting for want of proper food, and a form of typhus fever is setting in which will spread through the country and affect the rich as well as the poor.

The loss to the people of Ashton in wages alone is estimated at £6000 per week. Probably the masters are losing as much or more. The costliest war that was ever waged would not have cost any town of 35,000 inhabitants half as much as the present peace with America costs Ashton-under-Lyne.

A public meeting held at Blackburn received the report of the Local Relief Committee. Out of a population of 63,000, it seems that above one-half are dependent on charity, private or parochial, while two-thirds of the remainder are in receipt of only half their usual income. Blackburn is losing in wages alone £13,000 per week, or at the rate of over £650,000 annually; and this pecuniary loss is a trifle in comparison with the sufferings of the people.

Sir J. K. Shuttleworth, whose knowledge of the factory districts, and experience in official business, renders him a valuable authority, estimates that, by Christmas, there will be 780,000 people dependent on alms. This will imply a loss in wages of above £5,000,000 a year; sustained entirely by honest hardworking people, who have had nothing to do with the American war, and certainly had originally no sympathy with the South. Northern orator, boast of the injury the war has done to England, and their audiences cheer the boast. Would the cheers be equally hearty if the boaster were to make his statement in somewhat more explicit terms—"We have taken the bread out of the mouths of a quarter of a million of English families of the working class; we have robbed the poor people of Lancashire of five millions a year, earned by the sweat of their brows; we have consigned their wives and children to starvation; we have inflicted upon them the misery of idleness, disease, cold, and hunger; and of this great achievement we are justly proud?" And yet, if English statesmen are content to permit this state of things, we cannot wonder that American demagogues should exult over it.

The Mansion House Committee last week distributed £10,000.

At the meeting of the Central Executive Committee at Manchester, Mr. H. B. Farnall read his weekly report. (The difference between his figures and those of the Poor Law Board is owing to the disappearance of several unions, not properly connected with the cotton trade, from the tables of the latter. In these unions there has been a great diminution of pauperism, which is deducted by Mr. Farnall from the increase in the manufacturing districts):—

My tabular report for this week, on twenty-four unions in the cotton manufacturing districts, shows you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the number so relieved last week, of 9376 persons.

There are now 186,219 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 43,157 were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 143,062 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 331.5 per cent.

Of the above 186,219 persons, 26,248 are able-bodied men.

The total weekly cost of outdoor relief is now £11,626 10s. 9d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2185 17s.; there is, therefore, an increase of £9440 13s. 9d., or 431.9 per cent.

The average percentage of pauperism on the population of those unions is now 9.7 per cent.; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.2 per cent.

The average amount of outdoor relief per head per week in these unions is now 1s. 4d., and the lowest is 1s. 0½d., the highest 1s. 8½d.

On the 21st, I reported to you that, during the six preceding weeks the increase of persons in the receipt of parochial relief in the above unions was 35,668 persons. This seventh report gives an additional increase of 9736 persons so that in seven consecutive weeks 45,404 persons have become paupers in these unions.

I am enabled to state that forty-seven local committees, formed in the cotton manufacturing districts for the distribution of charitable aid, were, at the date of their reports to me, relieving 174,317 persons, but since the reports were dated distress has increased, and a few other local committees have been formed, so that I have reason to believe these local committees are now aiding about 191,300 persons, and that rather more than one-third of those 191,300 persons are at the same time relieved by the guardians of the poor.

The Maine Law sect, of all the political and religious sects in England the most disreputable and despised, has been endeavouring to improve the occasion, and make capital out of the distress of the Lancashire operatives. The President of their "Alliance," Sir W. C. Trevelyan, forwards on their account a donation of £225; hopes that the "benefits" which many families must have felt from their enforced abstinence from spirituous liquors will induce them hereafter to abstain voluntarily; and forwards a resolution which, for wanton insolence and deliberate falsehood, could scarcely be equalled on this side of the Atlantic. The advocates of legislative interference with the people's diet "rejoice to know that by the adoption of total abstinence thousands have been enabled to provide for their families without appealing to public charity." This is utterly untrue. The awful calamity which has overtaken Lancashire has ruined all, except those employed in the mills that have not stopped; the most thrifty have, after a more or less protracted struggle, shared the fate of the most improvident. And the brutality of the insult is completed by recommending to the sufferers "voluntary abstinence, and those habits of economy and self-control which would greatly tend to mitigate the present distress." Nothing but the long habit of association with New England stump-orators could have taught a man belonging by birth, rank, and education to the English gentry, to indulge in such outrageous insolence towards a class of his countrymen now overwhelmed by unmerited suffering. But it seems as if there were something in Teetotalism which inevitably degraded the character and manners of its votaries. How seldom does one meet with a member of the Alliance who can speak soberly, courteously, and truthfully on the subject of "intoxicating beverages." Did any of our readers ever meet an advocate of Temperance who was not among the most intemperate of men?

The following very important letter has been forwarded by Lord Russell to the Cotton Supply Association:—

British Consulate, Charleston, August 13.

My Lord,—The near approach of the close of the "cotton year," which is compiled from September 1, seems to render appropriate a few remarks upon the condition and amount of the crop which has been planted during the last spring and al information on the gin by expressing my regret that the disturbed country, and the irregularity of communication, render it difficult than usual to procure trustworthy details, but I have taken some pains to collect the information, and venture to think that it may be depended upon.

There can be little doubt that the crop of 1862 would, under ordinary circumstances, have reached 4,500,000 bales; but, in consequence of the civil war, not more than 1,500,000 have been planted. It is thought by some that the present crop will not exceed 1,000,000 bales, but I have reason to believe that the supply from Texas has been underestimated. That State has been as yet very little disturbed by military operations, so that agriculture has been less interfered with than elsewhere. On the banks of the Mississippi very little cotton has been planted, as the danger is too great. It is only in the interior of the various States, at a distance from the great rivers, that the crop of this year is to be found.

The crop of 1860 was disposed of, and, in a considerable measure, exported before the blockade of the Southern ports was established, but it is calculated that 750,000 bales still remain on hand.

The crop of 1861 amounted to about 2,750,000 bales. Of these about 1,000,000 bales have been destroyed at various places to prevent their falling into the hands of the Federals; the rest is stored in the interior of the different States. Much of it has been bought by foreigners, who hope to preserve it as neutral property through all the dangers of the war.

About 50,000 bales have run the blockade successfully, chiefly to Nassau. One cargo has gone to Barcelona, and one to France; I do not take into account the product of the sea islands of South Carolina and Georgia. They are in the possession of the Federals, and I have no means of ascertaining whether any cotton at all has been grown there during the present season.

The amount, therefore, of cotton remaining in the Southern States at this date, which might be available to foreign commerce as soon as the blockade is removed, may be said to stand thus:—

	Bales.
Remainder of crop of 1860 . . .	750,000
Undestroyed crop of 1861 . . .	1,750,000
Crop of 1862 (not yet picked) . . .	1,500,000
Shipped through the blockade . . .	50,000
Remaining in the South . . .	3,950,000

It must, of course, be remembered that a portion, or the whole, of this accumulation may be destroyed at any moment by the Southern people.

I have, &c.,

R. BUNCH.

Mr. Gladstone will not soon hear the last of his Newcastle speech. A letter was addressed to him by a gentleman carrying on business in Manchester, complaining that the language used by the right hon. gentleman in his speech at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, with reference to the American war, had misled, not only himself, but the "whole commercial community of Manchester." He has received the following reply:—

11, Downing-street, Whitehall, October 18.

Sir,—I am directed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to acknowledge your letter of the 15th, and to state that he agrees with you as to the grave responsibility attaching to all public declarations made by any of the advisers of the Crown.

He holds himself fully responsible for having declared his opinion at Leith, nine months ago, to the effect that, if the Southern States of America were in earnest, the struggle on the part of the Northern States was hopeless; and again at Newcastle last week, to the effect that the Confederation which has been formed under Mr. Jefferson Davis has shown itself to be sufficiently supplied with the elements which make a nation, and with the will and power to defend its independent existence.

He cannot, however, be responsible for the inferences which, from your letter, you appear to have drawn from his statement; the more so as they might, he thinks, have been checked by attention to other portions of his declarations concerning America on the same occasion, in which he referred to steps that might, under conceivable circumstances, be taken by the Powers of Europe. And, generally, he desires me to remark that to form opinions upon questions of policy, to announce them to the world, and to take or to be a party to taking any of the steps necessary for giving them effect, are matters which, though connected together, are in themselves distinct, and which may be separated by intervals of time longer or shorter, according to the particular circumstances of the case.

As you inform the Chancellor of the Exchequer that your impressions are shared by others, I am to add that you are at liberty to make whatever use you think proper of this letter.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES L. RYAN.

Those passionate propagandists of conflicting dogmas,

Who fight like devils for conciliation,
And hate each other for the love of God, have been doing their best to square accounts, and to strike an exact balance between Catholic violence and Protestant folly. Irish ruffians having done their utmost to bring their church to disgrace by a series of unpardonable outrages on the Queen's peace, it behoved the Evangelical Alliance to make themselves supremely ridiculous by a corresponding series of offences against the common sense of the Queen's English, committed for the honour of Protestantism. Respectable Churchmen abhor Sir Culling Eardley almost as heartily as honest and loyal Catholics detest the Irish mobs; and if Lord Shaftesbury and Sir George Bowyer could be deported together to some desert beyond the hearing of humanity, the sober and pious votaries of either faith would feel greatly relieved by their absence. Of the two nuisances the Irish is certainly the more irritating; but we are inclined to think the English the more contemptible. The only business of the Evangelical Alliance appears to be perpetual interference with the business of everybody else. At its last meeting it was occupied chiefly with the persecutions inflicted in Spain on certain vendors of unauthorized editions of the Bible, which it fiercely denounced and with Mr. Lincoln's schemes of massacre and incendiarism in the South, which it as fiercely applauded. It must be exceedingly painful to the feelings of these estimable men to know that their American allies—the Abolitionists—are mostly infidels both in religion and in morals; while the armies of those against whom they invoke the vengeance of Heaven are led by men almost as much distinguished by their piety as by their military skill and daring. That is a strange Evangelicalism which finds a friend in Garrison and an enemy in "Stonewall" Jackson.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Volunteer Forces has been published. It appears that there are above 162,000 enrolled volunteers, of whom 134,000 are riflemen, and 24,000 artillerymen. A grant is recommended of 50s. a-head for the latter, and 20s. for all other arms; to be expended only for specified purposes. It is suggested further that the volunteers should be as often as possible associated on field-days with the troops of the line. One member of the Commission alone—General Eyre—is opposed to the principle of a capitation grant.

Lord Palmerston delivered at Southampton, the other day, a rather clever speech on the blessings of Free Trade, in the course of which he took occasion to speak on the inadequacy of commercial interests to restrain nations from hostility when once their passions were excited. It had been said, he observed, that England and America were far too closely allied by commerce ever to go to war. Yet when we demanded the surrender of the men seized under our flag, the American people were eager for war; as we should certainly have been had satisfaction been refused. His lordship forgot that the America with which it was said that England could never quarrel included the cotton States. Nevertheless, the hint was thrown out in season, and is perfectly sound. Mr. Cobden, and other amateur diplomatists, will do well to make a note of it.

At a Conservative demonstration at Colchester, the members for North Essex took the opportunity of explaining away such portions of their speeches at Castle Hedingham as had given annoyance to their friends and satisfaction to their enemies. Major Beresford proved his courage by a fierce onslaught on the Times. Mr. Du Cane drew critical distinctions between support to Lord Palmerston, and support to the Ministry of which Lord Palmerston is the chief. Mr. Miller, M.P., hoped that the time would soon come for the recognition of Southern independence, and intervention to put an end to the war. Mr. Pencocke, M.P., was still more outspoken. He called attention to the dissension in the Cabinet; remarked that no less an authority than the Queen's Advocate had laid it down that any Power has a right to recognize any revolted State whenever it pleases, and that the disseized Government has no right to complain. The only question, therefore, was whether it was the interest of England to exercise that right in the present case. He thought that the disruption of the Union, and the recognition of the Confederate States, would be a benefit to England. He had also very good authority for stating that the Emperor of the French told Mr. Slidell, at Vichy, that personally he was in favour of a recognition of the South as an independent country, but that he was unwilling to take any step except in concert with England. The responsibility of recognizing the South therefore rested with the English Government, and he trusted that the English people would put such a pressure upon them that they would not shrink from taking the step. It was in the interest of humanity itself that the war should be brought to a termination, if it was to be carried on in the spirit of the manifestoes of General Butler and the proclamation of President Lincoln. The most ardent Abolitionist in this country would not desire to see the unqualified emancipation of 4,000,000 blacks upon a given day; and if the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln was worth anything more than the paper upon which it was inscribed, and if the 4,000,000 blacks were really to be emancipated on the 1st of January, then we should be prepared to witness a carnage so bloody that even the horrors of the Jacquerie and the massacres of Cawnpore would wax pale in comparison. The Emancipation Proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, even if it had been in the interest of the negro, would have been a political crime; but when we reflected that it was put forth, not in the interest of the negro or of civilization, but that it was merely a vindictive measure of spite and retaliation upon 9,000,000 of whites struggling for their independence, it was one of the most devilish acts of fiendish malignity which the wickedness of man could ever have conceived.

At Greenwich, Alderman Sa Jewish member, said that although in intervention, he did not believe th would hereafter be disposed to American quarrel so lightly as it h last session. The people of the Sou. the strongest patriotism, had fought like deserved that nationality for which they were gling. He hoped that some plan might be adopted by means of which the American people might be brought to their senses, and he thought that if this country could combine with France, Russia, and the other Powers, a mediation could be brought about which would terminate this infamous contest, a disgrace as it was to the nineteenth century.

At a public meeting held at Pontefract, to consider the case of the distressed operatives of the cotton districts, a somewhat remarkable speech was made by Mr. Monckton Milnes, well-known as a poet of no mean order, and a politician of considerable capacity, but, perhaps, still better known as collecting around himself the most agreeable and intellectual society that is to be met anywhere in England. He commended the sense and patience of the operatives, and regretted the American war, which could lead to no issue that Englishmen would not regard as a calamity. "If the North triumphed, a portion of the country would have to be held in permanent political bondage. If the South were victorious, a new Power would be introduced among the nations of the world, based on the institution of slavery. He was opposed to the recognition of the South. It would not help us to get cotton. The Southerners would keep it back, in order to exasperate us against the North; and if they let it go, very little could escape the blockading squadrons. Moreover, if we recognized the South, we should be forced by the law of nations to go to war with the North." What does Mr. Milnes mean? In the first place, the South is no more, as a political Power, founded upon slavery than was the confederacy of which it recently formed a part. Slavery, under the new as under the old Government, is merely a domestic institution of the several States, with which the Confederate Power has no concern. And are we not on excellent terms with the slave empire Brazil? Again, it is absurd to think that the South wishes to prevent our getting cotton. It would only too glad to sell what we are so anxious to. The blockading squadron is a more serious objection; but it is one which was created by ourse. If we had not allowed a paper blockade before, there would not now be an effective or quasi-effective one. And, in the name of Grotius, what rule of international law makes it necessary that if we recognize the Confederate States, we should go to war with their enemies. Recognition does not involve alliance; nay, it does not even give a good ground of complaint to the Power which claims the provinces whose independence we acknowledge. Did we go to war with Spain when we recognized the Spanish colonies, or with Austria when we recognized Italy?

Mr. Cobden has delivered at Manchester an oration of portentous length, setting forth his view as to the reforms required in the present code of belligerent rights. He wishes to exempt private property from capture at sea, and to abolish commercial blockades. He accepts these proposals as American; and perhaps admires them as much because they are American as for any other reason. He would allow no captures at all on the high sea, unless he would except contraband of war; and he would not permit any blockade except of arsenals and fortified places. He affirms that it is for our interest to carry out both these proposals. England is now becoming a great neutral Power; and it is her interest as such to promote freedom of trade in time of war; she is a country absolutely dependent on her foreign commerce, and therefore, even when at war, she would generally suffer more injury than she would inflict by a commercial blockade. If we had assented to the American proposal in 1856, we should not now have been suffering fearfully from cotton famine, caused entirely by the commercial blockade of the Southern ports.

At Rochdale, the Radical orator entered more generally into the politics of the day. He vindicated the millowners of Lancashire, pointing out how severely they suffered from the suspension of their trade, and reminding their calumniators that though they might not subscribe to the funds of Relief Committees, they had duties to perform nearer home. He argued that intervention would unite all parties in the North against us, and that it would not give us cotton:—as if we could not break the blockade at a blow, and so free the whole store of the South. The Warrior also could get us all the cotton that exists. Mr. Cobden abused the Government for spending so much on the military and naval defences of the country, and the Tories for supporting Lord Palmerston, ding as a panacea for all evils. As that those who do not pay the taxes and spend them, it is hardly likely to buy.

EUROPE.

ANCE.—M. Proudhon has taken up his pen in defence of the occupation of Rome. The phrase which alone secured for this extremist of Communists and Red Republicans the notoriety so dear to men of his stamp—the phrase which must endear him to Northern soldiers and New England Abolitionists—that “all property is robbery”—precludes him from vigorously defending the indefeasible right of the Pope to the patrimony of St. Peter. He only argues that the union of Italy would weaken France by creating another great Power—an idea which implies that France is always meditating aggressions, and that her neighbours are always concerting resistance. The Emperor would probably prefer that his policy should not be defended by men whose praise is infamy; and he may envy Signor Mazzini the honour of being heartily abused by this European Wendell Phillips. We may remark another phrase worthy of that which first made M. Proudhon infamous.—“In politics, ingratitude is the first of rights and the first of duties.” Surely this preacher of immorality has now reached the last depth of deliberate baseness. Ingratum cum dixeris omnia dixi.

ITALY.—Brigandage and reactionary conspiracies still continue to agitate the Northern provinces of the late kingdom of Naples. Hitherto the Italian Government has acted feebly, trusting to get possession of Rome, the nest and refuge of Bourbonists and banditti, and thereby to extirpate the nuisance at small cost to themselves. Awakened from this delusion, they appear to be taking more vigorous measures against the brigands. Great severity is to be exercised against all persons suspected of correspondence with the banditti, and the Syndics (local magistrates) and National Guard are to be held liable to make good all depredations committed by bands numbering less than ten. The clergy are also to be closely watched. There is no doubt that the clergy are generally, the peasants often, and the magistrates sometimes, in league with the banditti; the National Guards are notoriously cowardly and loathful. Nevertheless, there are visible in the signs issued by the Piedmontese authorities signs of carelessness about shedding innocent blood, which will bring down upon them the condemnation of civilized Europe, if some check is not placed upon it by the Government at Turin.

No longer a prisoner, Garibaldi has been removed from Vanguano to Spezzia. Very dismal rumours have been circulated in regard to his health. It has been reported that the bullet is in the wound; that his life is in danger; that amputation will be necessary. There is, however, ground for hope that these altidings are greatly exaggerated.

GERMANY.—It appears that the Hessian Elector and Chambers have made up their disputes. Those between the King and the Liberals of Prussia are far as ever from a settlement. The Deputies have been received with honours on their return to their respective homes. An appeal to the people for subscriptions to indemnify those who have suffered in the cause of the Constitution has been published by the People's Gazette of Berlin. The following, published by a semi-official paper, is probably to be taken as a Government manifesto:—

The proposals of the Government, aiming at a conciliatory solution of the question of the military Budget, having been rejected by the Chamber of Deputies, the Government has placed in a new position. The country may be convinced by its former conduct, and by its present disposition to a constitutional solution of the question, that the Government will take care to narrow the conflict within the narrowest possible grounds, that is to say, to the maintenance of the unavoidable military expenditure of 1862, which will be paid under the constitutional responsibility of the Ministers.

But very shortly the means prescribed by public duty and science will be employed in order, at the beginning of the next session, to bring about a definitive constitutional solution of the question at issue, to restore to the country entire peace in the interior, and to ensure the undisturbed development of constitutional institutions.

GREECE.—King Otho has been sent about his business. Discontent has long been rife, and the direction of the garrison of Vozitza was the signal for military revolt and popular risings in every direction. After a futile resistance the royalists gave way, and the King abdicated and fled. The event has caused considerable excitement in Greece, but in England it is regarded with general indifference. So long as the Greeks will refrain from invading Turkey, or meddling with the Ionian Islands, Englishmen would not grudge them a respite per month, after the fashion of Spanish comp.

FEDERATION.—It is reported that Mavro Cordato, one of the few respectable men in Greece, has been elected at the head of the Provisional Government.

If this be so, it would seem that the revolution is supported by the better classes, and instigated by a real wish for the good of the country. As yet all details are wanting.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, October 29.

Our last report closed on a steady market on the basis of 26d. for Middling Orleans, and 16½d. for Fair Dhollerah cotton. The hardening tendency which was apparent at the beginning of last week gave place towards its close to that heavy languid tone which has so often characterized our market of late. On Thursday the sales reached 4,000 bales; on Friday, 3,000; and on Saturday, 2,000 bales, at slightly lower prices but without any pressure to sell. On Monday, however, some anxiety on the part of holders was evinced to realize, and in American, which had been entirely neglected for some days, a few hundred bales were sold partly on the basis of 2s. for Middling Orleans. The whole business only reached 1,500 bales, and of those 1,000 to the trade.

On Tuesday another state of stagnation prevailed; business was almost at a stand-still, and the sales were only estimated at 550 bales. In Manchester a similar state of things prevailed, and to effect sales a considerable reduction in price would have been requisite.

To-day a little more has been done, the sales reaching 1200 bales, but only at prices sufficient to tempt the speculator, and the few transactions that have occurred establish a heavy decline on the quotations of Friday. Middling Orleans is said to have been done at 23d, and Fair Dhollerahs may be quoted 15½d, but these prices are entirely nominal through the absence of a bona fide demand.

The Europa's news to hand on Monday reported a great Democratic Demonstration in New York in favour of the popular candidate, Mr. Seymour. General Stuart, in a gallant, cavalry raid, had entered Pennsylvania, described a complete circle round the Federals, and reached his own headquarters in safety. By the City of Washington to the 21st via Cape Race, McClellan had met in his advance a heavy Confederate force, and retreated on Harper's Ferry. Gold had advanced to the enormous premium of 38 per cent., but closed at 31½.

The most favourable American news has now no effect in imparting life to our market, and for the present we are entirely in the hands of Manchester. The trade have been for a long time past buying only at the rate of 6000 or 8000 bales per week, and have lately been shutting up their mills wholesale, and the production has now fallen to a much lower ebb than any one a year ago considered possible. It is generally believed in Manchester that it does not now exceed 10,000 bales per week, or little over one-sixth of its former rate.

It is evident that with our large stock of cotton, present prices cannot be maintained unless consumption be materially increased; and this can only be brought about by an advance in Manchester, sufficient to enable spinners to work at present prices to a profit, or by such a decline in Liverpool as will bring about the same end. The last India accounts report the markets for goods dull, and prices much under a parity with the home markets, so that the improvement here may be delayed some time; and with the present stagnant state of trade in Manchester, it is hard to say what price for cotton would tempt spinners to recommence work—some full-confident that 15d. for fair Dhollerahs could start a large amount of machinery, but we are inclined to think even a lower figure necessary to materially increase consumption.

Private advices from New York estimate the amount of cotton to be shipped for Liverpool from that port at 12,000 bales, between Sept. 1, and Nov. 1.

MANCHESTER, October 31.

THE flatness of the Liverpool cotton market, for some days past, has produced a corresponding depression of tone here, which the tenour of the telegrams from the East, just received, has not tended to dissipate. The feeling to-day has been exceedingly dull, and in all departments the business transacted has been on the smallest scale.

Yarns are flat, and hardly any transactions of consequence are reported. Most export qualities are extremely scarce, and owing to this, prices are generally pretty firmly maintained; but some home-trade yarns, which have been more freely offered, are weaker and worse to sell. We hear of some transactions in the Blackburn class of yarn, at about ½d. per lb, decline from the rates current on Friday; and Bolton yarns are also more urgently passed for sale, with a very depressing effect on prices, although without leading to any business. Doubled yarns, from 100s. downwards, are flat and neglected, and the turn of the market is against sellers. The finer counts, both single and two-fold, are steady in value, but the demand is far from active, and nothing is doing.

In cloth the tone of the market is also dull, and with some exceptions, prices are irregular, and occasionally exhibit a drooping tendency. We hear of some inquiry for the better class of printing cloths, the value of which is very firmly maintained; but shirtings, T cloths, J. cloths, &c., are in very languid request; and although in many cases prices are firm, or, at least, nominally so, sellers find the course of the market decidedly adverse to them, and that it is impossible to do business in any quantity, without making a substantial concession from their quotations.

TOBACCO MARKET.

LONDON, October 30, 1862.

We have to record a large business during the past week, and for export there have been considerable sales of Western leaf, chiefly of medium to good quality, at price from 9d. to 10½d. per lb., and this tobacco is now being shipped, as rapidly as possible, to the Continent. Lugs and low leaf have almost disappeared from stock, and prices for such quality have now advanced to about 7d. per lb.

The trade also have taken some large lots of good natural Western leaf at prices from 10d. to 12d. and 12½d. In Western strips but little has been done, fine parcels are held for 17d. and much of the stock is off the market altogether.

Of Virginia leaf there is so small a stock that quite fancy prices are obtained. Virginia strips are quoted from 18d. to 22d., and business has been done at 19d. to 21d.

The speculative demand for Marylands has ceased for the present, but the advance created by the late purchases will probably be quite maintained by a consumptive demand as the winter draws on.

The tone of the market is decidedly strong, and though there is some evidence of a desire to realize present profits, the aspect of the war is quite enough to justify those who are looking for a yet higher scale of prices.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

Reliable information from New York, received by the friends of the Hon. John Forsyth, of Mobile, contradicts the death in a recent engagement.

It has been announced by telegraph, and published, that “the Captain of the Confederate vessel of war, Sumter, lying at Gibraltar, had been shot by one of his officers.” The facts, so far as ascertained, are these: The Sumter, being in a disabled condition was in charge of only a boat's crew, under command of an acting midshipman, when a quarrel seems to have arisen between the latter and one of the crew, which terminated in his death. Whether the fatality was due to an accident, how and where the quarrel occurred, is not known, as no details of the affair have yet reached us. The acting midshipman is described to have been a worthy man, of a quiet and peaceable disposition, and no blame is attached to the unfortunate victim.

The Charleston Courier says:—Alabama has sent to the war 65,000 men, out of a voting population of 85,000, and has armed 19,000 and equipped 8000, besides turning over 21,000 stand of arms to the Confederacy.

The Richmond Examiner says:—We learn from official sources that within the last few months our stock of arms in the South has been largely increased by importation and capture. Our small arms alone have increased from these sources not less than 80,000. Our supply of ammunition has also been largely increased by importation and manufacture; and there is said to be a prospect that the active and methodical operations of the Nitre Bureau will supply our demand, and make us independent of foreign importation. The production of nitre is already £1000 a day, and there is good reason to think that it will reach £3000 a day, and supply our consumption.

At present there are thirteen regiments of Indians in alliance with the South, numbering nearly 10,000 men, are in service, representing chiefly the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, with a few from other tribes.

The ladies of South Carolina subscribed $6,929.60 for the gun-boat “Palmetto State.”

The Confederate Congress has passed the following resolution, thanking patriotic women for their contributions for the army:—

Resolved, By the proceedings of the Confederate States of America, That the thanks of the Congress of the Confederate States are eminently due, and are hereby tendered, to the patriotic women of the Confederacy, for the energy, zeal, and untiring devotion which they have manifested, in furnishing voluntary contributions to our soldiers in the field, and in the various military hospitals throughout the country.

Promotions and appointments in the Confederate Service:—Brigadier-General Jones M. Withers has been promoted to the rank of Major-General.

Major-General Buckner has been assigned to the 3rd grand division of the army. The following is a list of his staff officers:—Major Cosby, A.A.G.; Major Hays, Chief Quartermaster; Major Wintersmith, Chief Commissary; Surgeon Pallen, Medical Director; Major V. Sheliha, Chief of Artillery. Volunteer Aids:—Majors Tom Clay and Gallagher.

Captain Campbell, commanding Company A, Palmetto Battalion of Artillery (Furman Light Artillery) has been appointed Major of the Battalion. First Lieutenant Earle succeeds him in the command of Company A.

Captain Frank Buchanan, late commander of the Virginia, has been promoted to the highest office in the Confederate Navy, viz.—that of Admiral, for his distinguished services in the great battle and victory in Hampton Roads. His commission dates from Saturday, August 23.

A PATRIOTIC FAMILY.—General Joseph Graham, of North Carolina, has left a name renowned in history as a Revolutionary hero. His mantle has fallen upon his descendants. His youngest son, ex-Gov. Wm. A. Graham, has five sons in the army. His sister, the youngest daughter of General Graham, and wife of the Rev. Dr. Robert H. Morrison, has two sons and four sons-in-law in the service, two of the latter being “Bethel” Hill and “Stonewall” Jackson.

ST. GEORGE, BERMUDA, October 6.

You will no doubt be very much surprised to learn that I am still here. But for the last two weeks the island has been closely blockaded by Federal cruisers.
On the 27th ult. three heavily armed steamers, the Wachusset (Admiral Wilkes), Tioga, and Sonoma, entered this harbour in open defiance of the Queen's Proclamation in regard to belligerent vessels and remained five days, during which time they coaled, took in supplies, and industriously informed themselves concerning every vessel in the port. The flag-ship has disappeared from British waters, but the other two are still plainly visible in the offing, being constantly engaged in steaming slowly to and fro across the entrance of this harbour exactly like sentries, and frequently not more than two miles distant. From the Telegraph Station of St. George's, other Federal cruisers are constantly seen; and it is said that there are about twenty of them on the track hence to Charleston. I must not forget to add that the United States' Consul here is constantly communicating with the two steamers above alluded to, by means of small boats. Wilkes, while here, made such comprehensive threats of capturing English vessels, that the steamer Gladiator, which has never been beyond Bermuda and Nassau, and was advertised to sail for England with a cargo of cotton, on the 20th ult., does not dare to venture forth.

The state of things at Nassau is also bad. By a late arrival we learn that the yellow fever had been raging there, that vessels were quarantined at Charleston in consequence. The blockade of the island was even more rigorous than ever.

I write this by the mail steamer Merlin, which touches here on her way from St. Thomas to Halifax, and is just in. I have just learned that the Merlin was brought to and boarded this morning by the United States' steamer Sonoma.

NEW YORK, October 17.

The excitement in Wall-street continues; the price of gold fluctuates hourly, and it is quite impossible to give a correct quotation. All articles are advancing upon the influence of the paper money system. It is difficult to imagine how Mr. Chase can meet his payments, for he has occupied every channel of credit.

The elections in all the Northern Border States show large Democratic gains in nearly every Congressional district, but the general result is not fully known. Should the opposition have obtained control of the respective Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa, the Governors of those States will be deposed for their unconstitutional acts; in a few days the complexion of these important bodies will be made manifest.

The Confederate States steamer Alabama is playing havoc with American commerce.

PARIS, Oct. 28.

The revolution in Greece has not produced any very marked sensation. Phil-hellenism has dwindled here to a very low ebb, and the quarrel between the Greeks and their Sovereign would have been viewed with equanimity even on the Bourse, but for the fear that the conflagration might extend to Turkey, and revive the slumbering spectre of the Eastern question. Logically, the Greeks have as good a right to get rid of an unpopular Sovereign as the Neapolitans had to rebel against a cruel despot; but it would be gross injustice to King Otho to compare him either with King Bomba or his successor Bombadino. Otho was a very King Log, and what the Greeks required was an active, ambitious, and intelligent autocrat, who would have hanged, and flogged, and forced his subjects into civilization, and carried out his favourite notion of snatching Stamboul from the Turks, and making it the capital of a Greek Empire.
Otho, the Bavarian, stood in the same position with regard to his subjects as the First Georges with us; but sense and self-control are English qualities, which are unknown to the Grecian mind. C'est absolument, ob- served the late M. Roque, of Athens, to Lord Byron, la même canaille qu'au temps de Themistocle. King Otho may console himself with the reflection that he has one thing in common with the great Athenians of old—Miltiades, Themistocles, and Aristides. He has been ostracized by the demos, but the parallel goes no further.

The simultaneous outbreak of the late rebellion argues a preconcerted scheme, in which our political sooth-sayers fancy they detect Russian or French intrigue.
France has so many irons in the fire just now that she may be acquitted of the charge; but the part played by Russia is by no means clear—the less so as a Russian, or half-Russian Prince, the Duke of Leuchtenburg, is newly mentioned as a candidate for the vacant throne.

In an European point of view the Greek revolution is also interesting, from the fact that it may lead to a further estrangement of the two great Western Powers, the relations between which are just now rather acrimonious—the stubborn and injudicious perseverance with which the British Cabinet resists popular pressure at home, and pressing requests from abroad, to put an end to the useless sacrifice of life in America by a recognition of the South, is not the least among the causes of refroidissement which have sprung up between the two Powers, and which has consigned the entente cordiale to a premature grave.

The question, however, is too important not to force itself upon the attention of the French Cabinet, and the English Government may discover too late the folly of pursuing, across the Atlantic, the policy of self-isolation and self-abasement which has reduced English influence to so low an ebb throughout the continent, where the British Lion has degenerated in public regard to the level of a common poodle.

During the past week the press have not been silent on American affairs; La France in particular has distinguished itself by an able article on the atrocities perpetrated by that despicable pettifogging tyrant, Butler, at New Orleans. The remarks of your contemporary are very much to the point, and as La France unquestionably is, for the present, the most authoritative exponent of the policy of the Government, I have no hesitation in reproducing them in extenso; it says:—

The struggle between the Northern and Southern States is no longer a war of civilized people; it is a war of savages, in which all the principles of the law of nations, and all the guarantees of modern society are trampled under foot.

Terror reigns in every part of free America; the horror of our first Republic are exceeded; nothing is any longer respected—neither the eternal laws of justice, the laws of humanity, nor the lives, liberty, and property of citizens. And these excesses, a disgrace to our age, are not committed in the mad intoxication of the combat, they are produced under the form of decrees, and coolly calculated proclamations, and carried into execution with inconceivable sang froid. Let us not weary in calling down the public indignation on those attacks against social rights. On this question, as well as on all others, where the coalition of interests and of passions endeavour to lead public opinion astray, let us raise our voice in the name of justice and of truth. The strange sympathy which the Northern States have acquired among certain organs of the French press, has arisen out of a deplorable misunderstanding. We have never ceased to demonstrate this, and, supported by the evidence of facts, have shown that the philanthropy of Europe has been shamefully abused, in order to procure success for a vast system of oppression, tyranny, and violence. Under the pretence of emancipating the blacks, Mr.
Lincoln and the North pursue the object of enslaving the whites of the South. According to their views, the South must be the slave of the North as regards political supremacy, and the economical and commercial system. The men of the South must plant, reap, and labour, in order that the North may receive all the profits, and remain its onerous intermediary with the consumers of the whole world.

In order to attain this object, and serve this policy, the North will not hesitate at any rigour, or, if necessary, at any act of cruelty. Thousands of men will be sacrificed and more than that, all the liberties of America; ruin and mourning will be sown in all the devastated States of the old Union.

Such is the truth which we shall never cease to point out to those who intentionally disguise it, or who wilfully close their eyes against it. The men of the North, who are void of pity for their white brethren, whom they oppress, pillage, and murder, are equally void of pity, for those poor blacks, of whom our abolitionist journals speak as being their liberators.
They despise them; expel them from society, and put them out of the pale of the law, and when in order to obey the implacable logic of their programme, they decide on emancipa-ting them, it is only to drive them far from the American soil, and banish them beyond the contact of the noble Yankees, into distant colonies. The emancipation of the negroes is only adopted as a means for ruining the South. It is not founded on any generous sentiment, and those must be blind who do not regard it in that light. That, however, is not enough! Mr. Lincoln has adopted the regime of terror in order to arrest his policy. The American Government, wherever it is still standing, is no longer anything but a frightful despotism, which crushes all citizens under a yoke of iron. Is this a necessity of defence? Is it the supreme law of public safety? Is it the all powerful interest of threatened society, which calls for those terrorist measures which leave far behind them the furious acts of 1793? Certainly not, and on this point the errors wilfully circulated by the partisans of the Union, must be removed and cleared away. It is the cause, the person, and the President-ship of Mr. Lincoln that those acts of violence and of tyranny are intended to defend and to protect. There has been formed in the Federal States, and even in the army, partiinspection of the document. The victims of the pious fraud now protest. The clergy is said to be in general very active in this movement, the Church in the Protestant parts of Prussia being still in the state of thralldom as regards the State to which Frederick the Great reduced it. Your readers cannot have forgotten the story of the pastor whom he summoned before himself and his boon fellows in his Tabagie, or smoking-room, to give an account of his faith—in the Devil. So far the Feudal party are in ecstasies at their success, like children who have kindled a little fire in a corner of a wood, and clap their hands, and dance round, not foreseeing the danger of an all-devouring conflagration. According to them, the world may at length repose under the wings of the Prussian eagle. The King has made his coup d'état, the Deputies are dispersed, the country is tranquil, and the Executive rules supreme. This is their idea of a model Government; and they think it may go on so for ever. No doubt, at the stated time the Parliament may assemble, and the Deputies will either dutifully pass the Budget presented to them, blindfolded; or, if they are naughty boys and refuse it, the King will again send them about their business. The country has done very well for the last ten months without a Budget, and they see no reason why it should not go on for ten years more. They are quite sure that their side will not get tired of this game of moving the King backwards and forwards on two squares, and they do not foresee the possibility of their adversaries ending it by upsetting the board.

But there is something bitter even on the rim of the cup. The change of Foreign Minister in Paris has upset Herr V. Bismarck's most scientific combinations, and it is only after much hesitation that he has proceeded to Paris to deliver his letters of recall as Minister there, and perhaps to take some lessons in the art of State fencing. His plan of an alliance between Prussia, Russia, and France, which had a fair prospect of success while M. Thouvenel was Minister, has no chance against the known sympathies and antipathies of M. Drouyn de Lhuys. It is well known that M. Drouyn de Lhuys considers the isolation of Prussia, and consequent support of Austria, the only means of restoring French influence in Germany. The present Ministry has therefore lost all hopes of diplomatic support, and the King, who has made himself its responsible editor, finds himself equally alone. The Queen remains at Coblenz, and the Crown Prince has accompanied his Consort to spend some months in Palermo; so His Majesty goes to drink tea at Sans Souci with the long neglected Queen Dowager, whose affection for the Feudal party has never wavered. Although reigning extra constitutionally, in the wholesome severities which he exercises, the King is careful to keep as far as possible within its letter. The Deputies cannot be called to account for their conduct in the Chamber, but there is no proviso that those who hold appointments shall not be transferred. So Herr Borkum-Dolffs is removed from the Presidency of Coblenz to Gumbinnen; H. Klotz (who proposed the vote against the Lords' resolution), from Potsdam, where he was judge to Trebbin, a small town twenty miles off, and the Advocate-General, Oppermann, has been placed on the retired list, with half pay. This gentleman's crime was the expression of his opinion that the proposed reorganization of the army could only be legalised by a vote of the House. For readers in England, I should add that the office of Advocate-General in Prussia is not a political one. Whilst the Government thus visits its displeasure on the members of the Lower House, the papers are filled with addresses of approval from their constituents. The 18th is still celebrated throughout Germany as the anniversary of the battle of Leipzig. On that day telegrams were received in Berlin from Heidelberg and Esslingen, from "the men of Wurtemberg and Swabia," thanking the Deputies for their undaunted defence of popular rights.

I have just heard of the Prince de la Tour D'Auvergne's arrival to take leave of this Court, where he will probably be regretted. He will carry away with him, as a matter of course, a Grand Cordon of some colour or other. People are getting accustomed to the situation, as one sleeps during a bombardment, and there is no apparent movement in diplomatic circles. From Munich we hear of the Queen of Naples' immediate return to Rome, escorted by an Italian cardinal, who has arrived to persuade her to resume her life of slavish etiquette. It was from this and the domineering temper of her step-mother-in-law that she fled, rather than the King's treatment. So long as the King remains in the leading strings of the Queen Dowager, who was the real cause of the loss of his kingdom, the young wife has little hope of domestic happiness. The old Chevalier, Charles Edward's father, who also lived in Rome, was not more happy in his married life, and his Queen, Maria Clementina, at one time left him, and was only persuaded to return by the intervention of the Pope. Her husband was probably alone to blame for the rupture, for history describes her as an amiable woman, and her memory is still cherished in Italy as that of a saint. James had less excuse than Francis II., for he had no ambitious step-mother.

The more it is studied, the more remarkable seems the result of the Commercial Congress at Munich. The expression of public opinion there elicited in favour of the treaty with France, which is a step towards the introduction of free trade, was quite unlooked for, as Austria and the Courts which fix their faith upon Austria, had made great efforts to be fully represented. At the same time, the Prussian Court had done all in its power to destroy public confidence; the decision is, therefore, doubly important, as proving the advance of economical science in Germany, and the instinct which separated the future of Prussia from the aberrations of its Government. One of the chief speakers against the treaty was the representative of the commercial community of Nürnberg, which protested by telegraph against the opinions he advocated. The assembly of the Gross Deutsch party holds its first meeting to-morrow, in Frankfort, and it is understood that after the discussion of the plans for a Parliamentary union of the States, an attempt will be made to counteract the effect of the Munich resolutions in favour of the French treaty.

The Greek revolution is in so far a German question that the dethroned King is a Bavarian Prince, and his family will not be inclined to give up the chance of the succession without a diplomatic struggle. No man ever threw away a crown so wilfully, as no country ever offered a fairer field of action to an enlightened Prince. Its people have deserved to be well governed by the sagacious patience with which they have endured the most stubbornly retrograde of petty tyrannies. It is now twenty years since they wrested from the King their present Constitution, and for twenty years they have suffered the Court to render it nugatory—not that they were not earnest in their determination to have a popular Government, but because they hoped, by accepting the delay, to obtain it without having recourse to revolution. I have lived for a considerable time in Greece, and have conversed on this subject with men of all classes. The impression with which I left was, that of a people more universally acquainted with the political necessities of their country and of their position than any other body of men in the world. The fear of the difficulties which might arise in choosing a successor, not want of irritation at the incapacity of King Otho, was the motive of their forbearance. A few points will be enough to show how well-founded their complaints were. The Constitution gave them two Chambers, one for life, the other elective; trial by jury; irremovable judges. The Chamber of Deputies was packed by the Court, for both universal suffrage, and Government candidates were first tried in Greece, of all European countries. Every form of pressure was employed to prevent the return of opposition members, even to the extent of sending troops to refractory communes, to prevent freedom of election. The ballot box was almost avowedly tampered with, and it often contained more votes for the Government candidate than all the voters of the districts could have given. I saw a letter from the unsuccessful opposition candidate for a place in the Peloponnesus, at an election at which I was present. The ballot box was placed in the church of the commune, and the mayor and his subordinates spent the six days that the voting lasted at the church door, preventing any one from entering. The writer acknowledged that he sent a little boy through the sacristy window, to put into the room a thousand voting papers inscribed with his name; but after the urn, solemnly sealed in the presence of those who chose to attend, arrived at the chief town, and was opened, it was found to contain about 15,000 votes, all in favour of the King's man. Greek had met Greek. The judges were still subject to removal at the will of the King, a will not unfrequently manifested. On the other hand, the jury system worked admirably, and even in cases in which foreigners were concerned I could hear of no complaint; but it is fair to add, that while every man of twenty-one years could vote for a representative of the people, a rather high yearly taxation was required to qualify a jurymen. At one time there were many stories of brigandage in Greece, but the Greeks asserted, and not altogether without seeming grounds, that it only existed by Court favour. On one occasion, when the complaints of the Foreign Ministers became too serious to be trifled with, the King charged an officer of known energy to arrest the chiefs, and break up the bands. "Then I must ask your Majesty's permission to begin in the Palace," was the answer. The brother of a Deputy was arrested in 1856 at the head of a band which had committed great havoc in Eubœa and the mainland adjoining.

The cartouches of his men were found to be those provided by Government for the volunteer invasion of Turkey the year before. I could multiply stories proving bad faith as well as incapacity, but I should require a volume, not a short letter, to do justice to so fertile a subject. Europe is disappointed at the small success of its experiment in Greece; but the Greeks have not had fair play, and notwithstanding this, the results to an impartial observer are very remarkable. The country has prospered so far as persevering labour, unaided by Government, would allow Syra has become a flourishing port, the shores of the Peloponnesus are one long extended garden, and the eagerness for education has not been damped. I believe that the last thirty years have been usefully employed, and that now that they are free of the incubus which held them down, the Greeks will justify all the hopes once entertained of them.

AFFAIRS AND OPINIONS IN NEW YORK.

New York, Oct. 14, 1862.

The following letter has been sent to us for publication:—

The entrance of Stuart's Cavalry into Pennsylvania on Friday last was merely a raid, but like most of that able general's movements it was a successful one, and after its accomplishment the whole party, numbering nearly 3000, recrossed the Potomac, and landed safe in Virginia with all their booty.

The crossing into Pennsylvania was effected at Dam No. 5, and not at Hancock, as was stated in the despatches sent per last steamer. This Dam was in the vicinity of Clear Spring—and from thence the Confederates, who were led by Stuart in person, entered Pennsylvania. In the flourishing towns of Mercersburg, Urbana, Chambersburg, Liberty, Emmettsburg, Woodboro', and Newmarket, they obtained large supplies of harness, provisions, clothing, &c., &c. and then recrossed into Virginia, at a point to the east, and almost under the nose of the Federal army! Considerable Federal property, which they could not remove for the want of transportation, was destroyed by them before leaving, while much railway property suffered in like manner. Altogether it was one of the most dashing feats on record, while its success, and the time occupied in travelling (96 miles in 24 hours,) is, I believe, without a parallel.

When McClellan heard of the bold invasion, he immediately declared that "not a soul of them should ever return to Virginia." Accordingly, General Casanton, with his cavalry, was ordered in pursuit; but Stuart was too much for him, and they (the rebels) eluded him entirely. In their movements the Confederates passed completely around the Federal army. Yet so adroitly was the movement managed, that but a single person was captured. You may well imagine that the Federals feel terribly chop-fallen at such a result, which the Times characterises as an "infinite disgrace to our military leaders."

Why the immense force so lately enrolled in Pennsylvania for the defence of the State did not rush forward and expel the invaders, was because that after Lee's retirement from Maryland the Governor of Philadelphia felt that the State was perfectly secure, and the volunteers that had been called out in its defence were accordingly disarmed and returned to their homes. This fresh and unlooked-for invasion will probably open the eyes of the Governor, and it is doubtful if he is again caught napping while so daring and vigilant an enemy is within gunshot of his borders.

Reports are current of the invasion of the State at other points, but I am inclined to believe them erroneous.

With respect to the Federal army of the Potomac, it appears to be taking matters very quietly (the raid into Pennsylvania is good proof of this); and it is asserted in certain quarters that it will remain thus quiet until after the 1st of January, when the war will be carried on as the War of Emancipation. It is not unlikely but what there is some truth in this, as it is well known that McClellan is not in condition to make a forward movement just at present, for want of reinforcements, while after January 1 it is openly asserted that the "vast arsenal in the loyal South (the blacks of course) available for military purposes can then be drawn upon." Here is an open declaration by one of the Controllers of the Administration (the Tribune). Arm the slaves and carry on the war by means of their aid. But the slaves have first to be secured, and if the President or any of his adherents flatter themselves that they will come forward voluntarily, or of their own accord, in answer to the Proclamation, they will find themselves vastly mistaken.

No! I have no idea that any material number of the so-called "loyal South" (Nigs) will ever be found in the ranks of the Federal army, unless perchance their masters and the white residents of the South generally, shall have been first of all destroyed. Then, if there is anything left to fight for, the blacks may possibly be forced to take a hand; but not till then. In this connection, the letter of Gen. Scott, read at the Seymour ratification meeting, last evening, is worthy of mention. This letter was written as long ago as "March 3rd, 1861," but the old soldier and hero therein plainly tells the new powers that the war they are about to inaugurate will be a hopeless one, and only end in ruin. His prophecy is being rapidly fulfilled, and the authors of the war, if they had a spark of manhood left would, after re-reading this letter of the sage counsellor, hang their heads for shame, and call on the mountains to hide them.

General Scott's mysterious management of the war up to the period of the first Bull Run, is now readily accounted for, the true patriot, although the victor on many a bloody field, had no heart for such a contest, and he threw up the management of it in disgust. General Scott was a man of intellect, of calm reflection—a patriot, a statesman, and a soldier. He knew the attempt at coercion would end just as Webster, Clay, and others of that noble galaxy had predicted it would, and the moment the real purposes of the Administration were developed he washed his hands of all further contact with it. Oh! if it had but listened on the 3rd of March, '61, to his words of golden wisdom, what a world of sorrow, suffering, and loss, would have been averted!

Cotton is in brisk demand in part for shipment in place of exchanges, and the market closes firm at 60 c. for middling.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1862.

The Struggle for Peace at the North.

Before we can again address our readers, the people of the Northern States of America will have practically decided for themselves whether the ruinous war in which they are engaged shall end or be prolonged indefinitely. The policy of Mr. Lincoln's Administration, and the individual members of that Administration themselves, are now on their trial, and the people at the ballot-box are to give—nay, have in part already given—the verdict of "guilty" or "not guilty."

On Monday next a general election for Governor, Legislature, and Members of Congress, will be held in the great "Empire State" of New York, whose vote in the Federal councils is equal to over one-sixth of the entire national representation in Congress. An election for Members of Congress was held on the 14th inst., in the scarcely less influential State of Pennsylvania, and the fact that though we have seven days' later news from America, we are left doubtful as to the result of this election, is sufficient to prove that while neither of the contending parties can have gained a decided triumph, the election news is not such as to make the Government censors anxious for its speedy publication. The voices of these two great States have at all times had a controlling effect upon the fortunes of parties. In 1860 Pennsylvania, the first to speak, virtually caused Mr. Lincoln's election; New York at the last moment had it still in her power to prevent his accession to office by throwing the election into the hands of Congress. How much more potent must the voice of these States be now when Secession has diminished the Federal representation by nearly one-half, and when they, with Ohio, which is also soon to speak at the ballot-box, cast one-third of all the votes cast in Congress.

The importance of an election in America does not consist in the transfer of power alone. Long before that transfer actually takes place, the defeat or triumph of a party has borne its full fruit. A President is virtually deposed by the election of an antagonistic successor, though that successor does not assume the reins of Government for many months. So with a party and its policy. The political destinies of the country are in the hands, not of statesmen to whom consistency is of greater importance than the transient tenure of office, but of professional place-hunters whose highest ambition is to be always on the winning side. Like rope-dancers, their skill consists in the timely shifting of their balancing-pole. The rapid rotation to office makes it necessary for the aspirant to be constantly in accord with the changeable views of his State, or at least Constituency; for even the few prizes which are purely in the gift of the Administration are bestowed with reference to the local strength of the recipient. The moment, therefore, a party begins to exhibit signs of weakness it is instantly deserted by tens of thousands of its sworn adherents, and the party in the ascendant recruits its numerical strength in geometrical proportion. This accounts for the cowardice of minorities in America, which so much surprises the European spectator, and it also accounts for the undue influence which the elections of the larger States have upon those in the smaller.

The character of the issue in Pennsylvania and New York, and in the various States which will follow during the winter, is defined with sufficient clearness. The Democratic or Constitutional party, despite some timorous disguises and affected disclaimers, is emphatically the party of peace. As such it is denounced, with a virulence unparalleled even in America, by the Republican or Administration party; and in this attitude, therefore, it appeals to universal suffrage, though by its own professions it assails only specific acts of the Administration, and not the war itself. The wholesale suspension of the Habeas Corpus, the fiendish Emancipation Decree, the corruptions and mismanagement at Washington, are excellent electioneering weapons, and probably more judiciously selected than would be a sudden demand for peace, for which the mass of voters may well be supposed to be imperfectly prepared. The leaders of the Democrats or Constitutionalists thus secure the loyalty of many timid well-wishers, without precluding themselves, when they shall have the power, from terminating the war, as is their firm intention.

It must not be supposed, however, that this party consists in any considerable degree of friends to the South or favourers of Secession. On the contrary, it is almost wholly composed of men who deeply deplore the event, some of whom even yet hope for reconciliation at some future and happier period, and many of whom have by word and deed been among the most violent and active to repress the so-called rebellion. This party simply represents those who by stern lessons have been taught at last that the war is futile—that by persistence in it all that may yet be saved will be irretrievably lost—and that the part of wisdom is to make the best of a very disagreeable bargain.

Should this party succeed in the State of New York by the election of its candidate, Seymour, as Governor, the effect upon the contest between North and South would be almost beyond calculation. Not only might the Democrats of the West entertain reasonable hopes of carrying their States, but the Washington Cabinet would at once be deprived of some of its most efficient supporters; perhaps Mr. Seward himself, whose whole political fortunes are bound up with the State which he so long represented in the Senate, and now represents in the Cabinet. Mr. Lincoln would still continue President until the expiration of his term of office, but Mr. Lincoln's duties would be restricted to affixing his signature to State papers drawn up by abler men than himself.

That any party in favour of peace, though fighting with mask and closed vizor, should feel itself strong enough to do battle against the party actually in power, and which but lately seemed to have the whole nation passively at its feet, is certainly a most hopeful sign, especially when it is remembered how cowardly American minorities have always been, and how little the Democrats have heretofore formed an exception to this rule. But in the face of the most hopeful assurances from the other side of the Atlantic, we cannot bring ourselves to believe that the war will terminate by such a return to sanity on the part of a majority of the Northern people. This war has been an anomaly throughout, but it would be the most astounding of all the anomalies it has yet presented, if the still feeble and uncertain voice of common sense should at this moment make itself heard above the wild and deafening tumult of wicked passions which resounds across the broad ocean. It would be the first time in history that, in the midst of a great popular revolution, the Conservative elements suddenly regained the mastery over the public mind. It would be as though a horse over which the rider had lost all control were checked in its headlong career by a child in its path; as though a mountain torrent was stopped in its furious rush by the bridge with which men had endeavoured to span it. Far more probable does it appear to us that the defeat of the Peace party will be the signal for renewed and madder orgies by the partisans of war. What acts of tyranny and revenge may have been restrained by prudence, so long as the issue was undecided, will fall with double force upon the individual and collective components of the party whom defeat at the ballot-box shall have placed helpless at the mercy of the victors. We predicted this resistance of the Democrats when the scheme of the servile war first became known in Europe, and we then predicted that this resistance would only lead to their more complete destruction. May the event prove us bad prophets. But whatever evils may yet be in store for the unfortunate people which claims our kindred, a large portion must be placed to the charge of those who, deaf to the appeals of justice, humanity, and reason, encouraged and promoted, Mephistopheles like, what a word or a sign could have prevented.

The Federal Armies Need a Truce.

It is again rumoured in New York that the Federal army is going into winter quarters. The wish is father to the thought. Generally, delay is dangerous to the invading Power; but at this juncture a truce would, in a military point of view, be of incalculable service to the North. Recruiting is making slow progress, and attempts to enforce the draft in Pennsylvania and Ohio have resulted in a riot, and, in the first-named State, in bloodshed—a catastrophe full of evil foreboding to the North. The Irish, who are an important element of the fighting population have resisted impressment to the death. They may be coerced into obedience, but men enlisted at the point of the bayonet do not make the best of soldiers. Moreover, the Washington Government now learns that the transformation of the recruit into the soldier is a work of time; and above all, the North, after boasting of her endless resources and sneering at what she was pleased to call the poverty of the South, not only lacks arms and munitions of war, but has not sufficient clothing for the forces already enrolled and in active service. We see no reason to doubt the startling announcement that General McClellan's army, which was last spring so splendidly equipped that it dazzled the eyes of European military critics, and made them confidently predict that such a numerically mighty host, so fully prepared for war, was invincible, is now inactive for the want of shoes and clothing. The raggedness with which the Northerners, in a spirit of contemptible meanness, reproached their gallant foe, is now their own condition. Yet it must not be supposed the North is exhausted. The European markets are still open to her; and, although she is financially crippled, she is still rich enough to purchase all the equipments necessary for her new levies. But military stores are not obtained in a day; and some months must elapse before the Northern depôts are replenished.

If Mr. Lincoln did not foresee the urgency of a truce, and in his supreme ignorance imagined it was as easy to organize and equip armies as to issue atrocious decrees, or to make wooden nutmegs, the Federal commanders were not so blind. After the Seven Days' Battle before Richmond, when the Army of the Potomac was beaten, decimated, and disorganized, General McClellan saw the impossibility of continuing the contest without a thorough reconstruction; and General Halleck fully assented to the wisdom of this opinion. The object then sought for was, to withdraw McClellan's troops from the peninsula and mass the five Federal armies in Virginia, in a defensive position in that State, so as to cover Washington and command the leisure necessary for drilling the recruits. This plan was frustrated by the activity and genius of the Southern commanders. They were not deceived by the pretended reinforcements of McClellan, or by the flimsy ruse of Burnside and Pope attacking Richmond; but they crushed Pope's army before it could be joined by McClellan, and forced the whole of the Federal forces in Virginia to take refuge behind the fortifications of Washington.

It was then more necessary than before that there should be a temporary cessation of hostilities; and General McClellan placed his army so as to be safe from attack, and where he would have the opportunity of moulding the new levies into fighting regiments. The Confederates passed into Maryland, threatened to invade Pennsylvania, and so compelled him to abandon his Fabian tactics. McClellan broke up his camp, and whilst General "Stonewall" Jackson was taking Harper's Ferry with its vast amount of stores, and which place was secure so long as the Federal army remained in the immediate neighbourhood of Washington, he fought those Maryland battles which he claimed as victories, but which we now know were almost the severest reverses the North has sustained. Even at the battle of Antietam the Southern force did not exceed 60,000 men, whilst the Northern force was considerably more than 100,000 men. In none of the Maryland battles were the Confederates beaten, whilst the Northerners sustained fearful losses, and were only able to maintain their ground by their vast numerical superiority and continual reinforcements. Ultimately the Confederates recrossed the Potomac, having by the brief Maryland campaign acquired large supplies of food and clothing, the invaluable booty taken at Harper's Ferry, and having inflicted on the North losses which were equivalent to substantial defeats.

For a third time the Federal commander, pressed by an irresistible necessity, tried to get breathing time. He entered Virginia, not as the romance writers of the Federal War Office asserted, for the purpose of forcing the Confederates to battle, but, if possible, to occupy the defensive line that he had been compelled to abandon by the Maryland campaign, and making Harper's Ferry his headquarters. Then came the brilliant exploit of General Stuart, who with 3000 cavalry crossed the Potomac, traversed Maryland, entered Pennsylvania, captured Chambersburg, clothed his army, and carried away with him 600 horses and large stores of the clothing so much needed by the ragged soldiers of McClellan; and passing right round the Federal army, rejoined the main body of the Confederates without the loss of a single man. This adventure has produced a panic in the North, that all the promises and subterfuges of the Lincoln Government cannot allay. It shows the Northerners that it is not more difficult for Southern armies to invade their territory than it is for their troops to invade Southern territory; and what makes the lesson more impressive is, that this exploit should have been performed despite the presence of the largest Federal army. If the Confederates will persist in thus harassing and threatening their enemies—however necessary, it becomes impossible for the Federal army to go into winter quarters, and the raw recruits must learn the art of war in combating with disciplined and veteran troops. We are told that a general engagement is imminent in Virginia; and if it takes place, we may be sure it will be forced on the Federals.

In Kentucky and Tennessee the Confederate tactics are equally harassing and effective. By one mail we hear that General Morgan has been routed; by the next that he has captured Lexington; and by a third that he is being hotly pursued, and yet has made a large capture of stores. The fact is, General Morgan is one of those aggravating tacticians who are the peculiar abhorrence of Northern commanders. He has an inveterate habit of attacking the weak points of his antagonists, and having gained his object, does not wait to be attacked in turn, but is off, whither the Federal commanders know not; and his whereabouts is only ascertained by the report of some fresh capture. If at the battle of Corinth the Federals gained some advantage, it was not of a character to enable them to follow it up; and at Perryville they sustained a signal defeat. Nashville is surrounded, and its surrender has been demanded. It is evident that in the West, as well as in the East, the Federal troops have no prospect of a rest, however greatly they may stand in need of it.

The South, at the beginning unprepared for war, is at present in a better position than the North for active operations. She now has an abundant supply of arms and ammunition, whilst her enemy is temporarily crippled for needful supplies. The South has not only become a nation, but in the midst of an unequal contest she has made sufficient preparations to defend her independence, even if the North should have the means and inclination to prolong the contest for years. She is now so happily situated that the loss of a battle, or even a disastrous campaign, would not involve her subjugation. And this the North knows. Knows that there is no hope of conquest but by extermination. Knows she cannot in fair fight do aught towards effecting this extermination, and therefore resorts to the infamous expedient of trying to stir up a servile war.

The Manchester School on International Law.

Mr. Cobden is, beyond comparison, the ablest man of the extreme party to which he has attached himself. Unless we are to except Mr. Forster, whose brief Parliamentary career has already excited great hopes of his future eminence, Mr. Cobden is the only Radical who ever showed anything like the knowledge or the capacity of a statesman. The others are mere declaimers, generally ignorant, and always perverse. Mr. Bright is listened to with admiration as one of the first orators living; but nobody ever learned a new fact or a new argument from Mr. Bright. He is untruthful, abusive, extravagant; often interesting; always eliciting a cheer; but never sensible, instructive, or statesmanlike. When he is not inspired by personal malice, he cannot speak; and he never yet delivered an oration on any subject whatever which did not principally consist of vituperative epithets or calumnious imputations directed against some class, party, or individual obnoxious by social, intellectual, or moral superiority, to the ambitious and intolerant arch-demagogue. The Member for Rochdale is a man of far higher calibre. He can speak, when he chooses, as calmly and effectively as any man living; he is perhaps the most lucid and logical of English politicians; and when he undertakes to state the case on one side of any great question, he is sure to say a great deal that is worth attention, and not a little that is very hard to answer. He was a greater man than he is; more candid, more rational, and less obstinately ignorant. Long association with friends far inferior to himself both in virtue and in sense—with men who share his most unfortunate defects, and exaggerate his worst mistakes—with men more conceited, less educated, and more prejudiced than he is—combined with the fatal want of a liberal training and the incurable one-sidedness which always marred his own character—has reduced him almost to the level of his chosen allies. A story is told of him which aptly illustrates the immense difference which once existed between him and them. No well-informed politician would have any difficulty in utterly demolishing the ablest argument ever delivered by a Bright, a Coningham, or a Stansfeld. Even Mr. Gladstone, Lord Russell, and Lord Palmerston rarely speak on a great question without laying themselves open to an effective and often damaging reply. But on one occasion, before the conversion of Sir Robert Peel, that statesman was observed to sit in attentive silence after one of Mr. Cobden's most powerful attacks upon the Corn Laws. The country gentlemen behind the Treasury Bench began to murmur, "This will never do. Why don't Peel get up and answer him?" Sir Robert half-turned round and muttered, "They may answer him who can." And on his own ground Mr. Cobden is still often unanswerable. If there were only one question in the political world, and that question had only one aspect, the Member for Rochdale would be master of the situation. As it is, the inherent narrowness of his mind, confirmed by a narrow education—he once said that a copy of the Times contained more political wisdom than the whole of Thucydides—utterly disqualifies him for practical statesmanship. He is essentially a man of one idea; and, like all such men, he is gradually sinking into a condition of political monomania.

Nevertheless, his Manchester speech on International Law was a masterpiece in its way. It expressed his convictions on a point to which he has given great study, and which, in one aspect, he thoroughly understands. The misfortune is that the subject has other aspects; and that the particular standpoint from which he regards it and everything else prevents him from seeing more than a very small part of the question. He touched, therefore, very few of his adversaries' positions, and those the weakest; but he put forward the argument on his own side as completely, clearly, and powerfully as it could possibly be put. Very much of what he said was true; but it was only a fragment of the truth, and therefore produced the effect of absolute falsehood.

Our readers will remember what was the state of maritime international law, as laid down by English jurists, up to 1856. We asserted the right of granting letters of marque to prey on the enemy's commerce; we asserted the right of blockading ports or coasts, provided the blockade were enforced by a naval strength sufficient to make access obviously dangerous; and we further asserted and exercised the right to confiscate the goods of an enemy found on board the vessels of a neutral. This last right was questioned by foreign Powers, who maintained the privilege of confiscating neutral property on board enemy's ships—a proposition obviously adverse to the interests of a Power which, having a vast commercial marine and a great navy to protect it, might hope, even in war, to share the carrying trade of neutral countries. It is easy to see that the doctrine that free ships do not make free goods is of great importance to a belligerent possessing a decided superiority at sea, inasmuch as it enables him utterly to destroy the commerce of his enemy. And this was, in fact, the chief reliance of England. Her naval supremacy enabled her to wage war with great effect, even if she did not send a single soldier from her shores; and the hope of prize-money tended greatly to facilitate the manning of her navy. By the Treaty of Paris she abandoned this advantage; and many of her ablest statesmen conceived that she committed a serious error in so doing, as well as in surrendering the right of privateering; though in the latter concession she herself obtained no inconsiderable advantage, American ships being thereby excluded from preying on her commerce in merely European wars. It was argued that the power of annihilating an enemy's trade, cutting him off from all foreign supplies, crippling the means of his merchants, and starving his people, was a most important and efficacious instrument of hostility; and that, in giving up this power, England would sacrifice the chief advantage she derived from her naval supremacy. But Lord Clarendon had made the agreement; it had been sanctioned by the Cabinet; and its ratification by Parliament was practically a matter of necessity.

The consequent state of international law is at once anomalous and inconvenient. We may still capture an enemy's merchant ships; but unless he puts his merchandize on board ships of his own, we cannot touch it. We may take his ports, and exact from the owners of property therein any contributions we think proper to levy; but when their property has left the port on board a neutral vessel, we are not entitled to meddle with it. If we were at war with America, the gold of California would be free on board French vessels. If we were at war with France, the silks of Lyons and the wines of Bordeaux would pass under the guns of our cruisers on board American merchantmen. We are therefore precluded from destroying an enemy's trade, but we may still destroy his merchant marine. His manufacturers and merchants are exempt from injury; his shipowners only are at our mercy. And ours are in the same plight, and complain loudly of the injustice and absurdity of the regulation. The shipping interest of England is by far the largest in the world; it is one of the most powerful interests in England; and it has power to make its protest heard and attended to, the more easily that it has reason on its side. The shipowners point out that the effect of the new rule in time of war would be to transfer to neutrals the whole carrying trade of Great Britain and her colonies. The greatness of our naval strength would not prevent this. The Federal navy is enormously superior to that of the Confederates; and yet the exploits of one or two Confederate cruisers threaten wholly to interrupt the carrying trade of the North. Even in time of peace our merchant marine suffers by the possibility of war. Shippers in India and China are alarmed by every European quarrel. They fancy that between the time of the shipment and that of the arrival of their cargoes England may possibly be involved in war; and therefore they give the preference to a flag certain to be neutral. This would not have happened before the Treaty of Paris, because the goods would have been equally liable to confiscation on board a belligerent's and on board a neutral ship.

When the American Government was invited to accede to the Treaty of Paris, it refused to do so unless it were allowed to add to that treaty a further engagement, that private property should be altogether exempt from capture at sea. To this proposal the English shipping interest has given its support. The authors of the proposition contend that private property should be similarly treated on land and at sea; and as it is not liable to confiscation on shore, it should be equally exempt on the ocean. But this reasoning involves both a fallacy and a mistake in point of fact. Whatever protection is given to private property on shore arises from the well-understood rule of civilized warfare, that no injury should be done in mere wantonness; that no suffering should be inflicted on an enemy, and above all on a defenceless enemy, which does not tend to effect the object of war—the submission to terms of the party assailed. Now, there can be no doubt that the interruption of an enemy's foreign trade does inflict such suffering as certainly tends to compel him to make terms; while no such effect can be attributed to spoliation by an invading army. And further, it is not true that private property on land is altogether exempt from seizure. An invader has a right to take anything that his army requires, or that may be useful to that of the enemy. Some invaders go much further. We should like to know how these advocates of Free Trade during war, who are mostly warm admirers of Mr. Lincoln, regard the wholesale plundering of which, by his orders, the Federal troops have been guilty? Is it piratical, or is it lawful? And in either case, how is it possible to deny to the Confederates the right of retaliating on the merchant marine of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, the sufferings which Louisiana and Virginia have endured at the hands of the Northern soldiery?

But Mr. Cobden directed his argument chiefly against commercial blockades. We do not agree with him in holding the right of blockade inseparably connected with that of capture on the high seas. But we grant that the two questions are closely connected; and further, that the case against blockades has been stated with admirable force, skill, and clearness by the Member for Rochdale. He has very little to say against them on the score of right; but he labours to show that England has very little interest in maintaining their legality, and very great interest in putting an end to them. He argues that if in 1859, when General Cass, then Secretary of State, endeavoured to get rid of such blockades, England had supported him, we should have obtained the consent of Europe, and the American Government would have been precluded from the measures which it has now taken to ruin our manufacturers and starve our people. We doubt whether this inference be altogether warranted. It is true that Mr. Lincoln has abandoned the pretension to close the Southern ports by proclamation, as an exercise of municipal authority. But he did so only because he found it possible to close them by blockade. Mr. Cobden says that an attempt to enforce a municipal prohibition in such a case would have brought about a war with Europe, and that therefore no rational Government would have been guilty of such an attempt. But a paper blockade is an equally valid casus belli; and yet for many months the Southern ports were only blockaded on paper. We do not believe that Mr. Lincoln would have consented, without a desperate struggle, to allow the South to export forty millions worth of cotton, and receive its price. If he would in any case have done so, he would now submit to the resolution of England or France to break the blockade. And this even Mr. Cobden feels sure that he would not do.

It is true, however, that England may in many cases be the worst sufferer by commercial blockades in wars wherein she is neutral. She suffers by the blockade of Mobile and Savannah and Charleston more severely than the Southerners. But it should not be forgotten that she has always the right and the power to relieve herself from such suffering by the only means which could be used to enforce an international prohibition of such blockades—by war, or the menace of war. It is true, also, that there are cases in which, even as a belligerent, she would probably abstain from exercising this right. But the fact that in certain cases it is better not to use a power does not prove that that power ought not to be jealously preserved. We may doubt whether any man will ever again be hung for treason; yet we should be sorry to relinquish the power of hanging traitors. When friends and foes are mixed together in a mêlée, no general would order his troops to fire upon the mass; but that does not prove that all battles should be fought with the bayonet alone.

It is strange that Mr. Cobden should not have seen, while he laboured to prove that commercial blockades must often be disastrous, and never useful, to England, that he was loading to the muzzle a weapon certain to recoil with terrible effect upon himself. Why could England so ill endure the use of this power by others—why so sparingly use it herself? Except in the case of cotton, the one necessary of her life which she cannot produce for herself, she might have been able to endure, without ruinous suffering, the commercial blockade of any coast except her own. But FREE TRADE has made her dependent on foreign countries for everything—for the very food of her people; and for this, of living men, Mr. Cobden is chiefly responsible. We do not say that, despite this terrible disadvantage, Free Trade is not a good, right, and necessary policy; but we do say that the essential one-sidedness of Mr. Cobden's mind is strikingly exhibited in his failing to perceive this aspect of the question, which has always been plain to men of very inferior powers to his own. The truth is, as he admitted or rather boasted at Manchester, his dream has been to make England "a great neutral Power." He thinks that he has succeeded; thank God, we know that he has failed. The position, the wealth, the temper, the duty, the virtue of the country, forbid it. Great Britain is separated from Europe, not by an ocean, but by a strait. Her geographical situation forbids her to be neutral in European politics. Her wealth compels her to be strong; her spirit makes it impossible that she should submit to the insults and the impotence which are the lot of a neutral Power in the midst of a constant conflict of interests and of rights. It is her duty to see that justice be done to the cause of liberty and national independence, of which Heaven has appointed her the especial champion; it is her duty to protect the rights of the weak against the restless ambition of the strong; and, whatever Mr. Cobden may think, his countrymen are not so selfish, so materialist, so atheistic, as to disbelieve in national duty, or so craven as to flinch from it.

The Blockade of Bermuda.

To Englishmen, and we believe to all unconcerned observers, it appears absolutely certain that a war with England would be about the most terrible disaster that could possibly befall the country which is still styled, and still is entitled to style itself, the United States of America. The Federal Government has a sufficient number of ships to blockade the principal ports of the South; it has gunboats and iron-clad vessels capable of doing great execution on inland waters; and it is able to spare a few vessels to infest British seas and prey, under the cloak of belligerent rights, upon British commerce. It has an army, which, if not well-disciplined, is for the most part brave, and is throughout well equipped. It has a few forts in its principal harbours; and as it believes, the road to Canada is open to it, and will speedily be closed against England. But the Federal navy is not one which would give the least trouble to an efficient British fleet. The blockading ships are tolerably swift, and effective enough against unarmed craft; but they could not fire a broadside without imminent danger of sinking. The Monitor would probably keep beyond the Warrior's reach; if not, the latter would simply run over her, almost without feeling the shock; and the other iron and wooden gunboats would be annihilated with still greater ease, if they ventured out of the rivers. The few fighting ships that the American navy can boast would be easily disposed of by the present squadron of Admiral Milnes. The Atlantic cities, without an exception, would be at our mercy; the Southern ports would be instantly opened; and before a month had elapsed every Federal garrison on the Southern coast, from Norfolk to New Orleans, would be prisoners of war. The army, fully engaged by the activity of its present enemies, could not be spared for the invasion of Canada; and before new forces could be raised for that purpose, Portland would have received a British garrison, and the communication with Canada would be opened and held by a British army. Already at war with the South, it would be an act of suicidal madness in the North to bring upon itself a war with the first naval Power in the world. It would be madness in the North; but it might be an act of politic villany on the part of the Northern Government. A war with England would be popular; it would go far to restore the waning authority of Mr. Lincoln, and it would effectually cover the sins of his Ministers, and save them from being called to any account for failure and ruin, which would be laid entirely to the account of British treachery. Already men are beginning to demand of Mr. Seward the fulfilment of his lavish promises of victory; already they begin to murmur against that tyranny in the North which is not compensated by the subjugation of the South. An English war would supply a ready answer to all such complaints; nay, it would give the Government an excuse for effectually silencing—perhaps for ever—the most prominent of the malcontents. Mr. Chase would find in such a war an excuse for the national bankruptcy which cannot, save by peace, be averted or much longer postponed. Frauds, jobbery, incompetence, even treason, would be concealed or condoned; the evidence would be lost, and the culprit forgotten in the vast ruin and overwhelming excitement which would follow the report of the first cannon-shot fired by an American man-of-war against a British enemy. And there are some, therefore, who are inclined to believe that for their own purposes the Federal Cabinet desire to involve their country in war with England. We do not think it necessary to judge them so severely. Their conduct, no doubt, does seem to point to such a conclusion. They have fired shot and shell at our ships in British waters; they have blockaded British ports; they have offered us insults which, if received from France or Russia, would have been instantly answered by cannon-shot. But it does not follow that they wished for war. Hatred to England is the ruling passion of the Republican party; insult to England is the traditional policy of the American Government; but war with England is quite another thing. The Yankees like to insult and irritate us up to the very verge of war; and their rulers indulge them in this harmless amusement; but both the people and the Government rely on the forbearance of England, and believe that they will always be able to draw back in time. Therefore, outrageous as has been the behaviour of the Federal squadron in the Bahamas, we never believed that it was intended to provoke war. It may be that the Navy Department went further than the intentions of the President. It must not be forgotten that a large contraband trade has been carried on, of which Nassau was the entrepôt. That trade was as irritating to the Americans as their similar exploits were to our fathers in the Napoleonic wars; and they are not accustomed, as civilized nations are, to keep their irritation within the bounds of reason and of law. It is not unnatural that, failing to interrupt the contraband trade between Nassau and Charleston, they should try to interrupt the legitimate trade between Liverpool and Nassau, which feeds and maintains the other. We ought not to let them do so; but their doing so does not prove that they are ready for war, but only that they cannot keep their tempers.

What has just happened at Bermuda is somewhat more threatening. It is very difficult to understand the appointment of Captain Wilkes to command in the West Indies, except on the supposition that the Federal Cabinet wish for war. It is possible that the act was that of Mr. Welles alone; and every one knows that Mr. Welles is not capable of prudence or common sense. But Mr. Lincoln could have revoked the appointment; and, as he has not done so, he must be held to approve it. Now, the selection of such a man for such a post was in itself an act of discourtesy towards Great Britain—as if we were to appoint Mr. Spence our Ambassador at Washington, or to send Sir George Bowyer to supersede Sir James Hudson at Turin. But, further, what could be expected from such a man but that he should insult and defy Great Britain? It must be remembered that his former act of piracy not only won him the applause of the rabble, the press, and the pulpits of the North, but that it also called forth the thanks of the House of Representatives, and the commendation of the Secretary of the Navy. He has a right to suppose that similar services are expected of him for the future. And it appears that he has acted exactly as, under such circumstances, it was to be expected that he would act. And the consequences are exceedingly irritating to Englishmen, and may not end very pleasantly for the Americans.* Mail steamers have been fired at and boarded within three miles of the land—that is to say, in British waters; boats have been employed to sound the channels at the mouth of the harbour; and still more outrageous insults have been offered to the British flag and to British neutrality.

The steamer Gladiator left Bermuda after being warned of the intention of the hero of the Trent to capture her while on a voyage between two British ports—she being bound for Liverpool. She was boarded, and her captain was ordered on board the American cruiser. He refused to go; and the enemy finally abandoned the idea of capturing the vessel—which, by the way, he had as much right to do as he would have to seize a steamer plying between Dublin and Holyhead. Whatever the vessel's previous history, the attempt to seize her while on a lawful voyage was simply an act of piracy. The above is the account given by the captain of the Gladiator; another version of the affair informs us that the steamer was escorted by H.M.S. Desperate, and was boarded while the latter was still in sight; and that the cause of the Gladiator's liberation was the sight of the preparations for action made on board the Desperate.

On Friday, September 26, Captain Wilkes, with his flag-ship and two gunboats, entered the harbour of Bermuda. He was warned that he could only remain there for twenty-four hours. But in defiance of this warning, he remained there for six days, under pretence, first, of coaling, and then of accident to his machinery. While he remained, one of the gunboats was constantly cruising about outside the harbour, while the other anchored every night in such a position as absolutely to close the entrance, and prevent any vessel from passing in or out. After his departure, Captain Wilkes left the two gunboats to cruise in the immediate vicinity of the port. These acts were, every one of them, gross insults to England, outrages on her neutrality, and violations of international law. It was Captain Wilkes' duty to quit the harbour when ordered, and it would have been the right of any British ship, or battery of adequate force, to sink him when he refused to do so. The anchoring of the gunboat at the entrance of the harbour was as gross an insult as could well be offered; the stationing of cruisers in British waters, within sight of a British port, is in itself a sufficient casus belli.

But for all these insults, we may thank Lord

Russell. When British shipowners complained of the blockade of Nassau, of the seizure of their ships while pursuing a lawful voyage, the Foreign Secretary replied that as the Americans were determined to interrupt our trade with Nassau, our merchants would do well to abstain from it altogether—and he refused them all protection. When a British vessel was fired upon by an American cruiser, while almost inside a British port, and when only accident prevented the murder of British seamen within sight of British shores, Lord Russell offered no remonstrance. Naturally, Mr. Gideon Welles and Captain Wilkes imagine that they may do as they please; that the forbearance of England is unlimited, or the cowardice of her Ministers unbounded. It is likely that before long they will be terribly undeceived. It is certain that the nation will not long tolerate a Ministry which allows its flag to be dishonoured and its ports to be insulted by the officers of a third-rate Power; it is probable that the Government will see the necessity, for its own sake, of taking measures, before Parliament meets, to put a stop to outrages which would inevitably provoke a Parliamentary storm. The issue may be war; it may be peace, and reparation extorted at a cost as great as that which procured the surrender of Messrs. Mason and Slidell; but be it what it may, the weakness and timidity of our Foreign Secretary are at least as much to blame as the lawless temper and violent conduct of the Americans.

English Feeling towards the Belligerents.

THE attitude of Europe is unmistakable, notwithstanding the assertion of the English Government. There is no doubt that every country and every Government would gladly recognize the Confederation if it were not for the impassiveness, not of the English nation, not even of the English Cabinet, but the section of it which sways our foreign relations. What the feeling of the British nation is at the present day is evidenced in every speech, in every newspaper, and in every society; what the feeling of the Cabinet is was evidenced by the frank declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Newcastle. And yet Mr. Gladstone has frittered away into vague generalities the plain inference of his express words. Sir G. C. Lewis, Lord Ripon, Mr. Collier, and a host of minor satellites of the section of the Cabinet we have particularized, have been driven into the inevitable consequence of such an argument as this. The fact of the impossibility of the subjection of the Southern States by the Northern is conceded. The power of the Confederates to win their independence is conceded, and the only question left is—Have they won it? The answer is on the lips of every man. But, argue these gentlemen, we have nothing to do but to wait. It behoves us, then, to examine without warmth or partiality, the causes of what seems a moral phenomenon, and the riddle is not difficult of solution. Although the disruption of the United States was imminent, and the irreconcilable principles of the two sections of the Transatlantic Republic were perfectly well known amongst themselves, and plainly and unmistakably delineated by such philosophers as De Tocqueville and others who had looked beneath the surface; yet, notwithstanding, the whole question was to the British public an enigma. No one understood the constitutional bearings of it, and the legal powers of States, President, and Legislature were so hopelessly involved, and so unlike the rule and order of this country, that no one presumed to speak or write with authority. The confident assertion of the Washington autocracy, that the secession was a rebellion, was indeed accepted, like the rest of their assertions, cum grano, and the nation cordially endorsed the first position laid down by Lord Derby, that both parties were belligerents, without venturing to pronounce on which side the right lay. Under these circumstances two important elements came into action on the public mind in England—the religious and commercial. We will take them in this order. It is the great peculiarity of England that the heart of the country is thoroughly religious. Fortunately for us, home influences are all-powerful, and at the fireside every national question is ultimately decided. The plain issue, then, between the two sections was therefore naturally overlooked by those whose programme in America was the law of conscience overriding the law of the land; and the prominence they gave to the slave question was especially directed to the religious public in England. And well has it answered their purpose. To this very hour the great mass of the people have no other terms to express the nature of the conflict. It is to no purpose that argument, fact, and experience have shown the utter indifference of the North to the welfare of the negro; the complete appreciation by the slaves themselves of the sham friendship offered them; and still more, the diabolical character of the preaching of the ministers of God's Word, who rely on Sharp's rifles and Blenkerism to carry out their doctrines. The emancipation of the negro from the slavery of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's heroes is the one idea of the millions of British who know no better, and do not care to know. But this would hardly have produced the national action had it not been for the other and more immediate cause. For many years past, owing to the peculiar advantages of England, the cotton trade of the world has fallen into her hands. On the other side of the Atlantic her relations were entirely with the Northern dealers. The whole wealth of the South passed through the houses of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and the produce of English industry was again by them distributed to the Southern buyers. It was no wonder, therefore, that all the sympathies of the manufacturing lords should be with their Transatlantic correspondents. It was a partnership of profit and loss, the most binding on all society. The failure of one was the ruin of the other; and corresponding have been the efforts of the English partners in the trade to prop up the fortunes of their co-speculators. There is, besides, a latent feeling, not expressed or acknowledged, but none the less penetrating, that a long series of uninterrupted insolence and injustice on the part of the United States to England has induced a national desire to see them lowered, more especially at their own hands; for it is apparent they have done themselves more irreparable damage in eighteen months than all Europe could have worked them in as many years. All these influences combined have acted on the public mind of England, and resulted, first, in violent abuse of the South on the ground of slavery, while the question between the two sections was misunderstood; then in the belief in the material strength of the overwhelming odds of the North, so powerful as to preclude all hope of success against men, arms, and discipline, so paraded in America, and so backed by money spread over every country in Europe, where the latest and best appliances of warfare were eagerly bought and extravagantly poured over the Atlantic, to equip the largest and best appointed armies that perhaps the world had up to that time beheld. But time, as usual, worked wonders. The true state of the slavery question became gradually known to those who studied the issues. The opinions of juriconsults and statesmen on the constitutional questions involved, filtered through the uninformed mind of England; and success, the idol of the nineteenth century, changed the tone of the quondam violent denunciation against the Southern Confederation. Perfectly unprepared, despite the rabid denunciation of Buchanan's treachery—with their chief city in the hands of their enemies—with 200,000 men in arms on their soil, menacing their seat of government from west, north, and east—with no fleet, no commerce, and no communication outside their own borders—with an improvised Government, and only such treasury arrangements as the patriotism of a united country could ensure—they have driven back the hordes of sanguinary mercenaries with slaughter and disgrace, and freed their native soil from the tread of the invader. Shoeless and without arms, they have successively beaten the best equipped troops that all the money and all the boasted nationalism of the United States could coax or force against them. They have raised an army the terror of their foes, commanded by generals the admiration of the veterans of Europe. But still more, they have proved to demonstration that no feeling exists throughout their wide borders, save horror and detestation of their foreign oppressors, and the old British determination to be free on their own land, and, with the blessing of God, by their own strong arm. Nor need they fear domestic treason. The slaves, who have cheerfully shared their masters' peril, and in their absence faithfully guarded their masters' wives and children, as well as property, are not likely to be seduced by any professions of Northern love for the negro, or by offers of freedom like those of the Lincoln Proclamation. The soil of the Confederation is free. Its elected Government is contentedly and cheerfully obeyed in all its realm. The most painful sacrifices, both of life and property, are submitted to, not only without a murmur, but with cheerfulness; while all Europe has noted with acclamation the difference between the State Papers of Richmond and the voluminous documents which have poured from Washington in explanation of a policy as inconsistent with reason and decency as it is subversive of every maxim that has hitherto ruled the ways of civilized nations. And yet the organs of English neutrality bid us wait—aye, even as Sir Cornwall Lewis tells us, until the North recognizes the Southern independence. Be it so. We do not despair of that being wrenched from them. Nor is there much doubt that in time the falsity of the three combining causes of England's apathy as a nation will be proved by the unerring testimony of facts; and the warm sympathy with the Southern cause evinced by British men and women from the highest to the lowest, as individuals, completely vindicated. That it has been a support and encouragement to their struggling kinsmen on the bloody field, and in the deserted homestead, we know; and many a wife and mother has been cheered by the words of kindly feeling from afar that have reached them in the darkness of their bitter hours. The Southern men, and above all, the Southern women, have shown they know how to dare and how to suffer under the old British watchword of Duty; and English hearts have known how to appreciate.

But in the meantime it is worth while to think something of the honour and honesty of England evidenced by such universal sympathy. It is worth while to think something of the sufferings of her own starving millions, whom this internecine war is daily robbing of their children's bread. Let us turn to a brighter view. There are stored still in the Southern cities some four millions of bales of cotton, which are available for the starving Lancashire operatives, and even now measures are being taken for their transport. The comprehensive mind of Lieutenant Maury, months ago, pointed out the course to be adopted, and the statesmen at Richmond have proved themselves no idlers. England and the Southern Confederation must be friends and allies by the immutable laws of mutual interest. The demand and supply are both present, nor will the blind hostility of the enemies of both keep them much longer asunder.

The International Exhibition.

An hour after sunset on Saturday next the Great Exhibition of 1862 will be a thing of the past. It is true the closing ceremonial is postponed till January, and that the building will be kept open a fortnight for the sale of goods; but after Saturday next there will not be the slightest ground for calling the affair an International Exhibition. The pictures and statues will have departed, the shopocracy will reign supreme, and, unless we are misinformed, the whole concern is to be wound-up with a monster auction. The English exhibitors, in the fortnight's undisguised trading and the auction, will have some advantage over their foreign rivals, since, we believe, there is no impediment to their introducing into the building goods they cannot sell in their shops, and which they may by chance dispose of as Exhibition articles. We think, then, the moment has arrived when English journalists may criticise the undertaking frankly and unreservedly. Henceforth undeserved praise will not contribute a shilling to the coffers of the Commissioners; nor will merited censure add a sixpence to the liabilities of the guarantors.

us at this juncture to sternly demand it. We admire, or rather, as Englishmen, we sympathize with and reverence the loyal and grateful sentiment that has blinded the public to many glaring imperfections. The Exhibition of 1862, like its predecessor of 1851, is intimately associated with the name and memory of the lamented and good Prince Consort. The conception of gathering together, from all parts of the earth, the productions of every climate, and the art and industry of every nation, so that the whole world might be improved and knit together by a rivalry which injures no man, and benefits every community, was worthy of a Prince whose virtues made royalty loved as well as respected, and who showed that in peace, and even without the circle of political life, there are triumphs to be achieved not less glorious, and surely not less enduring, than those which are gained in the battle-field or in the Senate. And the conception is not only commendable in itself, but the author of it, though cut off in the prime of his days, lived to see it crowned with complete success. To this hour there is a tender remembrance of the gathering of 1851, and that gathering has led to others in Europe and America. Now, we admit the Exhibition that will close this week was originated and brought about by the influence of the same master mind; but except the approval of Captain Fowke's unsightly building, we deny that the late Prince Consort's taste and judgment are responsible. If he had lived there would have been no paltry evasion of the bargain made with the season ticket-holders; there would have been no unseemly broils about stick and umbrella pence; there would not have been the scandal about a bankrupt French cook and his hon. clerk. We are still more certain that the interior arrangements would have been artistic and intelligible, and not a confused maze that, but for the costliness and beauty of some of the articles, would be fairly comparable to the disorder that appears to prevail in the arrangement of the miscellaneous stock of a marine store dealer. The late Prince Consort had the feeling of an artist, and would not have tolerated the vulgar trophies suggested by some one who thinks the whole art of life and the whole life of art consists in the tradesman dressing his window as obtrusively as possible. Above all, prize medals and honourable mentions would not have been bestowed lavishly indeed and without discrimination. As it is, not to have obtained a prize so far from being a discredit is rather a test of merit; but, of course, we do not mean by this that many of the prizes have not been well deserved; we only regret want of judgment has made the distinction of so little value. In finding fault, then, with the International Exhibition of 1862, we are, in fact, vindicating the artistic reputation and administrative skill of the late Prince Consort.

The outside of Captain Fowke's building conveys no other impression than that of largeness, and yet, when the visitor enters it, he finds the interior arrangements dwarf the building, and so conceal the only merit of the design—if mere size is a merit. The best parts of the Exhibition were the pictures and the machinery—not, we mean, especially on account of their respective artistic and mechanical merits, but that they were grouped together—and not scattered about and mixed with incongruous articles. An International Exhibition is not intended merely as a fashionable lounge, but as a school of instruction, by enabling the visitor to compare the productions of different countries. Yet how could this be done when the productions of every country were isolated? If any one wished to compare the fabrics of France, England, and Switzerland, he would have found the Exhibition less convenient than many of the warehouses in the neighbourhood of the Old Change. He could not at Kensington see the goods side by side. We submit that, to make an Exhibition really useful, the products, whether agricultural or industrial, should be classed by kind and not by country; but even in the last arrangement chaotic confusion was not indispensable. Cases of cigars, trophies of bottles containing wine or water—the visitor knew not which—photographs, china, glass, and kitchen utensils, need not have been placed in the same compartment.

Some discretion should have been exercised in the reception of goods. A large percentage of the things in the building were of a very inferior description, and nothing is gained by looking at things too common for a tradesman's shop window. There were whole compartments in the galleries with nothing in them worth consideration. Would not the confusion and distraction have been greatly avoided if rubbish and commonplace—we do not mean cheap—goods had been excluded?

Somehow or other the whole venture has failed. The guarantors, if they do not lose much money, have had a few months of anxiety. The exhibitors complain of their treatment, and consider themselves cruelly used. Captain Fowke's building, with its dishevelled domes, has, we believe, not found a single admirer out of the charmed circle of the Royal Commissioners. The London tradesmen complain that the Exhibition has been more plague than profit; and certainly the inhabitants of London, who, not owning carriages, depend upon cabs and omnibuses—the class designated in Belgravia as "the omnibus people"—may be glad that months of inconvenience are over, and that sight-seeing foreigners and unsophisticated country cousins have returned to their homes.

There was nothing imposing about the Exhibition, except the chapmen and the eating department. It was a large shop, and to the unwary rather a dear one. Many ladies paid double prices under the excitement incident upon the idea that the Commissioners did not allow sales. It was a kind of smuggling, and ladies are inveterate smugglers. One "dodge" was exceedingly effective. If the public did not buy, a few cards with the word "sold" printed on them, distributed about the stalls, soon attracted customers. People were anxious to have what others had secured. The keeper of the stall whispered the name of the distinguished nobleman who had purchased the article, and offered to supply a duplicate at a price which would not have been given if an aristocratic buyer had not been mentioned. In this way, by shifting about the "sold," and we may add "selling," cards, the dealers disposed of the wares they wished to be rid of. We are not grumbling. If the Royal Commissioners allowed it, what right have we to find fault? When the visitor had been through the Exhibition, he felt the appropriateness of the gilt gingerbread trophy at the grand entrance, which is supposed to indicate the quantity of gold found in Australia. Was it not a fitting monument to place in the Temple of Mammon?

Reviews.

THE TESTIMONY OF AN ENEMY.*

Rushing, or drifting, or in any way getting into print, is a dangerous experiment for those who would rather live unknown than acquire a reputation for folly. Stupid men never write wise books; but it frequently happens that very wise men write very stupid books, so that the odds are much in favour of an author unconsciously doing for himself what Dogberry so earnestly desired another should do for him. Men do not willingly proclaim themselves fools, but it is remarkable that sometimes they are at unusual pains to prove themselves knaves. Hence the world is treated to confessions which are, generally speaking, a long way after Rousseau. We do not, of course, refer to the "last dying confessions" of the "Newgate Calendar" worthies, or even to the confession of the late M.P. for Southwark, though it was strictly and charmingly artistic, and, by a motive of vanity, tinged, or rather suffused, with a roseate hue of romance and mystery; what we refer to are voluntary and gratuitous confessions. Such, for example, as "A Chequered Life," that has lately amused Belgravia, and all the little Belgravias that cluster around London; in which a man of fashion, with fascinating audacity, proclaims his past villainies, not only without a blush, but with the same unction that a converted drunkard details to a teetotal meeting the quantity of liquor he consumed when he had the means of procuring it. The hero of "A Chequered Life" differs from Barnum, and Mr. W. G. Stevenson, the author of "Thirteen Months in the Rebel Army," inasmuch as he knows that his practices are shameful, and he even bemoans them; whereas Messrs. Barnum and Stevenson glory in their shame, for the simple reason that they consider cheating, provided it is successful, a virtue.

That Mr. Stevenson has been in the Confederate army, is, we think, an undeniable fact, for the descriptions he gives of the Southern troops and of Southern operations are graphic; whilst his romance of how he was enlisted is a very poor invention. Our readers will not have forgotten the story of the learned sinner who was kept in Texas a whole year against his will, and during that time saw negroes regularly baked by their masters, and who made his escape with a terrible document concealed in the barrel of his rifle; and we can assure them, excepting the "slave roasting," Mr. Stevenson's adventures before he enlisted are scarcely less wonderful. He was an innocent youth, doing a profitable trade in wine-cask staves in Arkansas when the war broke out. On April 16th, 1861, "urged by a guardian, though warlike spirit," he cleaned his revolvers, and next night he was awakened by three men, who forthwith conducted him to Jeffersonville, where he had to appear before the "Phillips County Vigilance Committee," and during the journey one of the three men, his friend Buck Scruggs, informed him that he was to be tried on suspicion of being a Northern man and an Abolitionist, and that he must be cool, and only use his pistols in case of need. The committee, consisting of fifty or sixty "graceless scoundrels," who were maddened with "vile liquor," greeted him with cries of "Hang him," "Burn him," &c.; but for some unaccountable reason he was neither hanged nor burnt; and being acquitted, proceeded without a moment's delay to Memphis, and rather singularly found the passengers on the boat freely discussing his trial and acquittal. When he got to Memphis he was taken before the Committee of Public Safety, and though confronted by one of the Jeffersonville Vigilance Committee, was again set free; but he was followed out of the room by a policeman, who handed him a letter from the chairman, in which he was advised to enlist, or "he would probably stretch hemp instead of leaving Memphis." Acting upon this hint, he cheated the gallows of its prey, and volunteered. He does not pretend he was badly used in the service; on the contrary, he was rapidly promoted, and fully trusted. From the moment of his enlistment he was a traitor to the cause of the South, and only thought of how he could escape without risking his life. He suggests that the enemy may be spared by using "a cartridge without a ball, a pretended discharge without a cap, or an extra elevation of the piece." During the battle of Shiloh he was actively engaged as a aide-de-camp, and on the eve of the fight was anxious to escape and inform the Federals of their danger, but could not do so without risk. The strangest instance of our author's moral obtuseness is the remark he makes in reference to horrors of the battle-field. "The only relief to my feelings was the reflection that I had not shed one drop of that blood." He had, merely by acting as aide-de-camp, abetted and assisted others to do so. Mr. Stevenson has a most convenient and elastic conscience. If the Southerners were as indifferent about violating an oath, the tyrant of New Orleans would not have found so much difficulty in inducing the people to take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government.

It is easy to see through the flimsy pretence of the compulsory enlistment. Mr. Stevenson wishes to stand well with the Northerners, for whom "Thirteen Months in the Rebel Army" is written, and to do so it was indispensable he should get rid of the awkward fact that he had done his best to defeat the Northern armies. He is evidently a commonplace deserter, who is anxious to make a little money and notoriety out of an act that all nations regard as infamous.

Still, his testimony is worth some notice, because, when an enemy is obliged to confess to the strength and virtues of the Southern cause, the most bigoted Northerner must admit there is something in it. We do not mean to infer that any such testimony was necessary. We can judge of the tree by its fruit. The South has maintained her independence against superior numbers and superior resources, and we may reasonably conclude she has been actuated by a better spirit, and strengthened by a greater unanimity.

Mr. Stevenson is almost eloquent on the subject of Southern earnestness:—

The planters were, and are yet, in bloody earnest in this rebellion; and my impression, since coming North, is, that the mass of Union-loving people here are asleep, because they do not fully understand the resources and earnestness of the South. There is no such universal and intense earnestness here as prevails all over the Rebel States. Refined and Christian women, feeling that the Northern armies are invading their homes, cutting off their husbands and brothers, and sweeping away their property, are compelled to take a deeper interest in the struggle than the masses of the North are able to do, removed as they are from the horrors of the battle-scenes, and scarcely yet feeling the first hardship from the war. Indeed, I do not doubt that regiments of women could be raised, if there was anything they could do in the cause of the South. That they are all wrong, and deeply blinded in warring against rightful authority, makes them none the less, perhaps the more, violent.

With regard to the reported Union feeling in the South, he is not less emphatic. Whilst he was in the seceded States, though he was an officer, and had excellent opportunities for observation, he did not find any evidences of disloyalty to the South:—

The truth is, and it should be stated frankly—the whole people, men, women, and children, were a unit, cemented together under a high heat in opposition to "the invaders."

So far from the Confederates lacking arms and ammunition, they have, according to Mr. Stevenson, abundant supplies. He reports that large quantities of arms have been received from Europe; but it is clear the North has had free access and made greater use of the European markets. We do not question the present abundant supply of munitions of war, or that it will be kept up by the energy of the people. It is, however, not the less true that at the commencement of the struggle the South had harder work to procure arms than to organize an army. It is stated that there is still a deficiency of clothing, and, if so, it seems that General Stuart is showing his comrades the way to remedy that deficiency at the expense of the enemy.

One of the passages which is contradicted by general report, and which any one acquainted with the actual condition of the Southern army cannot credit, is that in which Mr. Stevenson accuses the Southern troops of immorality and irreligion. Now, one effect of the life-and-death struggle has been to develop a strong religious sentiment in the South, and some of the most distinguished leaders have in a marked manner shown the compatibility of a Christian profession with bravery and patriotism. As to the South becoming "a moral wilderness" by the continuance of the war, we must remark, that if so, the past is no criterion for the future. Besides, Mr. Stevenson is self-refuted. He enlarges upon the discipline and patriotism of the Southern army; and these qualities are inconsistent with demoralization. Further, he tells us of an excellent officer whose reputation suffered greatly because he was reported at time, to use profane language. We think it not unlikely that Mr. Stevenson will find the North not over pleased with his book. It may be no fault of his, but an irresistible impulse, that when he opens his mouth to curse his enemies, lo! he blesses them. He may, however, be sure such slips, however unavoidable, will not be forgiven. In the North the most atrocious libel, and the most unpardonable treason, is to speak the truth about the condition or institutions of the South.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Common Sense of the Water Cure. By Captain J. H. LUKIS. (Hardwicke.)

If the author of this book is a favourable specimen of the results of hydropathic treatment, we earnestly advise all persons to eschew the so-called cold water cure. We pity a man who is under the impression that he and his fellow-creatures were created mainly for the purpose of thinking of their organs of digestion. No doubt beef and mutton, farinaceous puddings, fruit and cold water, constitute a very wholesome regime; but we are not quite convinced that the taste for a variety of food was given to us for the purpose of not being gratified. Captain Lukis falls into the same error as the disciples of Hahnemann, and ascribes to medical quackery the benefits that result from a change of food. A person accustomed to rich living will often find relief from sickness by adopting a simple diet, and we can assure Captain Lukis that, on the other hand, persons accustomed to poor living are often cured by adopting a generous diet. If any one is sick, suffering from too practical acquaintance with Francaelli's "Art of Confectionery," or worn out by the exciting contingencies of Indian military life, let him go into the country, and have "pure air, regulated diet, moderate exercise, mental repose, and a judicious use of the renovating properties of water." But let him not go to Hkley, our author's "Young Malvern," because the four first restoratives he recommends can be obtained at almost any place remote from towns, and the portion of the prescription we have italicised is not procurable at hydropathic establishments, where they insist upon the injudicious use of water.

John and I. A Novel. (Hurst and Blackett.)

This story is well-constructed, and, excepting that it is a little spun out, very well told. John and Henderson Brown are the sons of a banker, who ruins himself with speculation, and dies in disgrace and poverty. His sons find a refuge with their uncle, Colonel Von Blum, who resides at Stuttgart. The elder becomes tutor in the family of the Baroness Weiler, and the younger obtains a situation as clerk in a merchant's office. John marries the baroness; and the domestic bliss is cut short by an unfortunate attachment, which results in a vast amount of jealousy and ill-will. We shall not attempt in our limited space to give an outline of the plot, which has the merit of not outraging probability. The characters are strongly marked, and the author evinces a considerable knowledge of German manners and customs.

CONFEDERATE STATE PAPERS.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Treasury Department, C. S. A., Richmond, August 18.

Hon. Thomas S. Bocock,
Speaker of House of Representatives, C. S. A.

Sir,—I have the honour to submit the following report of the condition of this Department, and of the estimates and supplies requisite for the support of the Government, until January 1 ensuing:—

The receipts at the Treasury up to August 1, from all the various sources of income, are as follows:—

From Customs	$1,437,399.96
From Miscellaneous sources	1,974,769.33
From Loan, Act of February 28, 1861	15,000,000.00
From Loan, Act of August 19, 1861	22,613,346.61
From Call Deposits, under Act of December 24, 1861	37,585,200.00
From Treasury Notes, Act March 9, 1861	2,021,100.00
From Treasury Notes, Act May 16, 1861	17,347,955.00
From Treasury Notes, Act August 19, 1861	167,764,615.00
From Interest Treasury Notes, Act April 17, 1861	22,799,900.00
From $1 and $2 Treasury Notes, Act April 17, 1861	846,000.00
From temporary loan from Banks—balance	26,25,000.00
From War Tax	10,539,910.70
	$302,555,196.60

The expenditures at the same date are as follows:—

War Department	$298,376,549.41
Navy Department	14,605,775.86
Civil and Miscellaneous	15,766,503.43
	$328,748,830.70

The difference between this sum and the receipts, amounting to $26,193,634 10, is made up of the various balances on the books of the Treasury to the credit of disbursing officers, which are not yet paid.

There are, also, outstanding requisitions upon the Treasury, upon which warrants are not yet issued, as follows:—

War Department	$18,112,192.15
	$18,524,128.15

This sum must be added to the expenditures paid as above, in order to exhibit the whole expenditures of the Government from its commencement to August 1, and the aggregate is $347,272,958.85, and for still greater accuracy it should be stated that as about five millions of the amount charged as expenditure has been paid for the redemption of Deposit Certificates, the aggregate above stated is subject to that abatement, when considered in the light of actual expenses.

The Treasury Notes issued to the same date are as follows:—

General currency notes of Five Dollars and over	$180,956,035
General currency notes under Five Dollars	846,000
Interest bearing at rate 3.65	1,441,200
Interest bearing at rate 7.30	22,799,900
	$206,043,135

To pay the balance against the Treasury as above set forth, there must be a further issue of	26,193,634
And to pay the outstanding requisitions, as above stated	18,524,128
	$250,761,797

The issue already made of these notes as above shown to	183,244,135
Leaving authority to issue only	16,755,865
	$200,000,000

The difference between these balances now due by the Treasury	44,717,762
And the above	16,755,865
is	$27,961,897

Unless this balance can be paid by bonds or 7.30 notes, the authority to issue general currency notes must at once be extended to pay the same; and that authority must be extended still further to meet the appropriations already made by Congress not yet paid, and also the further appropriations yet to be made.

The appropriations already made by Congress and not drawn on August 1, amount to $164,687,389.93

The estimates submitted by the various Departments of the additional supplies required to make good deficiencies and to support the Government to 1st January next, are as follows:—

For the War Department	$44,373,590.36
For the Civil List	386,607.39
For the Miscellaneous	102,889.38
	$44,862,097.13

So that the whole amount of supplies required to January 1, presents a total of $209,550,487.06

Congress must now determine the best mode of raising this sum.

If the Bonds or Stock of the Government to any considerable extent could be sold, they would unquestionably offer the best mode of raising the money. An examination of our funded debt account will show that only a small portion can be raised in this way.

The whole amount of Bonds and Stocks issued is as follows:—

Eight Per Cent. Stocks and Bonds	$41,577,250
Six Per Cent. Call Certificates	32,784,400
	$74,361,650

This statement, while in the large amount of call deposits, it exhibits its confidence in the credit of the Government, yet in the small comparative amount of Bonds and Stocks, it shows an indisposition to make investments in that form. We are, therefore, constrained to resort to Treasury Notes as the only mode by which the requisite funds can be raised. The resource has its limits. But it is hoped that with a reasonable economy in making the appropriations, the plans already set in operation will extend these limits, so as to reach to the end of the war.

The inherent objections which attend a Government currency are that it disturbs the standard of value and enhances prices. The facility with which it is created is a constant temptation to excess; and the danger of this excess, together with the doubt of an ability to pay, are the chief causes which affect its credit as a currency.

Thus far, no want of confidence has been exhibited in our currency. It freely circulates everywhere, and the fact that the banking institutions receive and pay out Treasury Notes in their own business is the most certain indication that their credit is unimpaired.

The other cause becomes active only when the total amount of circulation exceeds the usual business wants of the community. It operates without relation to the actual value of the circulation, so that even coin, if it could be kept in a country (if in excess produce the same result. The effect is a necessary consequence of the relation between the whole circulating medium and the whole business and property of the community, and can only be modified by influences upon the cause. Every means, therefore, which will reduce the quantity of circulation, becomes important, and should diligently be sought after.

It was with this view that Congress adopted two measures of relief; one, by which any excess in the quantity of currency might at once be permanently withdrawn and funded in eight per cent. bonds—the other by which the same effect could be produced for a time, through interest bearing notes and deposits on call. But plans are working well. The deposits have in fact been a permanent loan at six per cent. The interest notes, although current to a certain degree, are usually withdrawn from general circulation as soon as a sufficient amount of interest has accrued upon them to make them valuable as a temporary investment. It must be observed, however, that if this interest should remain in arrear for a long or indefinite time, these notes encounter a difficulty which seriously impairs their value, namely, that of an unproductive investment. Thus, being both unproductive and uncurrent, they will not pass into general use unless the interest be paid annually. It will be seen that the issue of these notes already amounts to upwards of twenty-two millions. Much of it has doubtless been taken under the belief that the interest would be paid like other interest, and I have encouraged this belief by stating that I would recommend to Congress that the interest should be paid annually. I earnestly hope that Congress will approve this recommendation. The payment could be stamped annually on the note, without encumbering it with a coupon; and in this way it is believed the objects intended by the issue would be effected.

I would also recommend that the notes be issued of a less denomination than $100. The large amount of money in the hands of private capitalists is the fund which we must induce to be loaned for the uses of the Government. From the War Tax returns, and from estimates as to such States as have not yet made complete returns, this fund may be set down at seven hundred millions, and one of the best means for procuring the use of part of it by the Government, seems to be through these notes, which answer the double purpose of currency and investment.

I have, also, to report that the acceptance of deposits on call at 6 per cent. has operated well. It will be seen that nearly thirty millions have been deposited in this way, thus proving at the same time, the confidence of the country in the Government, and the advantages of the plan.

It will also appear, from the statements herewith, that there have been issued about $816,000 of notes under $5. These notes are in great demand, and the issue of them may be extended to ten millions.

The issue of the large amount and various denominations of notes has confronted us with a difficulty which calls for the intervention of Congress. It requires the services of 129 clerks to perform the various duties involved in the issue of these notes. Of these about seventy-two are employed in signing; and it will be readily seen that the chief security intended by the signing is thus reduced to but little practical value. It is difficult for any one to bear in mind the signatures of so many different writers; but when to this is added the changes required by sickness, absence, and resignations, it becomes impossible.

These embarrassments have been increased by the efforts of our enemies to counterfeit the notes. Organized plans seem to be in operation for introducing counterfeiters among us by means of prisoners and traitors; and printed advertisements have been found, stating that the counterfeit notes, in any quantity, will be forwarded by mail from Chestnut-street, in Philadelphia, to the order of any purchaser.

Under these circumstances, it will be necessary to change many of the plates and to make new issues. The change would be more complete by dispensing with the variety of signatures, which are attached to the other notes. I am informed by the engravers that the signatures of the Register and Treasurer might be engraved in fac simile and printed, and that by stamping an elaborate engraving in colours on the back of the note, the security against counterfeiters would be greater than it is at present. The expense of the issue would be diminished by dispensing with the numerous signing clerks, and its more prompt execution would be secured. In order to make this change, the authority of Congress is necessary. The laws against counterfeiting, if not already sufficient, must be made to embrace these notes. In this connection, too, it is proper to bring to the notice of Congress that the penalties of the law, while they apply to any person found in possession of counterfeit blank notes, with intent to utter them, do not seem to embrace notes which are completely filled up and ready for circulation.

The situation of the country made it advisable to remove the printing and engraving establishments from Richmond, shortly after the last adjournment of Congress. The distance from the seat of Government at which so delicate a business must now be conducted, involves the necessity of greater expense and of greater ability and higher character than those of ordinary clerks, in those who must superintend. I would therefore, respectfully suggest that this department be made a separate bureau, and that a chief clerk, with an appropriate salary, be charged with the superintendence of its business at Columbia.

The War Tax has been paid by the several States as follows:—

North Carolina	$1,400,000.00
Virginia	2,125,000.00
Louisiana	2,500,000.00
Alabama	2,000,000.00
Georgia	434,126.12
Florida	225,374.11
Mississippi	1,484,467.67
	$10,168,967.90

The State of Georgia has substantially paid in the balance due by her, and the State of South Carolina has paid the whole amount due by her into the Treasury, in the form of six per cent. call certificates. But as the final settlement has not yet taken place, the certificates have not as yet been delivered up, and the account is not yet closed. The returns from the State of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Texas, have not yet been rendered in complete. The two former States have, nevertheless, paid the taxes in advance.

From the documents furnished, it appears that the States of North Carolina and Alabama have overpaid their respective assessments, and I will ask leave to submit an estimate to the amounts to be refunded them as soon as the complete returns shall be received.

The collection of the War Tax has presented several difficulties, which it is proper that Congress should have in view, whenever a further tax shall be levied. These difficulties are presented together in a report from the Chief Clerk of the War Tax office, a copy of which is herewith respectfully submitted. It is also proper to state, that by a judgment of the District Judge of South Carolina, money invested in State bonds has been excepted from the War Tax. An appeal has been ordered from this judgment, but as no Supreme Court has yet been organized, the effect of the judgment will be, to release from any future tax all monies invested in this form in South Carolina, or in any other State wherein the District Judge may hold the same opinion.

Since the last meeting of Congress I have appointed three new places of deposit for public moneys, one at Galveston, Texas, one at Knoxville, Tennessee, and one at Augusta, Georgia.

The Assistant Treasurer at New Orleans has removed his office, for the time, to Jackson, Mississippi, and the depositary at Mobile has made a temporary removal to Montgomery, Alabama.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. G. MEMMINGER,
Secretary of Treasury.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Confederate States of America,
War Department, Richmond, August 12.

To His Excellency Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States.

Sir,—Although it is not customary for the heads of departments to make reports at extra sessions of Congress, yet, in consideration of recent changes in the organization of the army, and of the necessity for further legislation, it is deemed best to depart from this usage on the present occasion.

It became apparent, in the course of last spring, to all acquainted with the condition of the army, that the Acts of Congress providing for re-enlistments would not affect the desired object.

The privilege allowed of re-enlisting corps, and even for different arms of the service, coupled with the love of change always found in camps, and heightened in the case of our armies by the monotony and discomfort of winter quarters, caused such extensive changes, that the re-enlistments tended to the disorganization of the army.

Large numbers of our men, yearning for home, weary of the discomfort of camp life, and deceived by the apparent inactivity of the enemy into a belief that their services were no longer necessary, declined to re-enlist, and prepared to turn over the burden of the war to those who had as yet borne no part of it. Efforts to procure re-enlistment and the expectation of change, relaxed the discipline of the army, impaired its efficiency, and rendered it incapable of accomplishing what otherwise might have been achieved.

While our armies were thus passing through successive stages of disorganization to dissolution, those of the enemy recruited and re-organized, had reached a high state of efficiency, and were ready at the opening of the campaign to enter upon it, with every guarantee of success that numbers, discipline, complete organization, and perfect equipments could afford.

The successes they obtained under these circumstances, far from being a matter of surprise, were necessary consequences of the relative conditions of the armies, and it is truly surprising that these successes were not greater and more complete.

The plan of voluntary enlistment having failed to preserve the organization, and to recruit the strength of our armies at a time when the safety of the country required both to be effected, a resort to draft or conscription was the only alternative. To all acquainted with the true condition of things there could be no ground for doubt. In a period of thirty days the terms of service of one hundred and forty-eight regiments expired. There was good reason to believe that a large majority of the men had not re-enlisted, and of those who had re-enlisted a very large majority had entered corps which could never be assembled, or if assembled, could not be prepared for the field in time to meet the invasion actually commenced.

There was, therefore, an interval of disorganization and weakness impending, and the enemy had already entered Virginia with an army now known to have had more than double the numerical strength of our own, and superior to it in everything but courage and good cause. It was obvious that conscription alone could save us, and it could hardly be supposed that a Constitution adopted in the midst of war, inhibited the only possible mode of raising armies.

Influenced by these and other considerations, Congress adopted the measure popularly known as the Conscription Act. Four months have not elapsed since its passage, and the present condition of the army and of the country sufficiently prove its wisdom. Four months ago our armies were retiring weak and disorganized before the overwhelming force of the enemy, yielding to them the sea-coast, the mines, the manufacturing power, the grain fields, and even entire States of the Confederacy. Now we are advancing with increased numbers, improving organization, renewed courage, and the prestige of victory, upon an enemy defeated, disheartened and sheltering himself behind defensive works and under cover of his gunboats. A military system which has done so much in so short a time should be cherished and perfected, and its defects speedily corrected.

Soon after the passage of the Conscription Act, the Department prepared to carry it out, and on the 28th of April, published General Order No. 30, a copy of which is herewith returned, prescribing regulations for the enrolment, mustering in, subsistence, transportation and disposition of conscripts.

It was determined to establish one or more permanent camps in each State, at points selected with reference to health and facilities for subsistence and transportation. Each camp has its Commanding Officer, its Drill Officers, its Commissary, Quartermaster, and Surgeon. The conscripts are to be assembled, drilled, taken through the camp duties, and distributed among the regiments of the State in proportion to their respective deficiencies.

The necessity of sending them immediately into the field has interfered with this plan of operations, but it has been carried out as far as practicable, and during any period of comparative inactivity it can be fully executed. Recruits thus prepared for the field, will be little inferior to old soldiers, and the army will be relieved from its crowded hospitals and the long train of inefficients that now drag in its rear.

The greatest difficulty encountered in the execution of the law has been that which constitutes the chief impediment in all involuntary military systems, the enrolment of recruits. The third section of the Act requires the enrolling officers of the State to be used with the consent of the respective Governors, and it is only on failure to obtain such consent, that the President is authorized to employ Confederate officers.

The military systems of many of the States have fallen into such disuse, that there are either no enrolling officers, or none that can be relied on. So far the experiment of using State officers has proved a failure, and I would suggest that permission be given to resort to other measures for enrolling recruits.

This may be done either by the appointment of a certain number of enrolling officers for each congressional district, or by giving each corps supernumerary officers to act as enrolling officers for the corps. The latter plan would probably give more activity and efficiency to enrolments than the former, as the enrolling officers would be under military control, and if inefficient, might be ordered back to their regiments and be substituted by others.

The 4th and 13th sections of the Act require all conscripts and volunteers to enter companies in existence at the passage of the Act, thus cutting off recruits for companies mustered into service after that time. The object of this restriction was apparent; the new companies then forming were allowed thirty days to complete their organization, and had the advantage over companies in the field in recruiting. It was supposed necessary, therefore, to restore equality by giving the conscripts and volunteers after thirty days to the old companies.

The effect will be, that many fine regiments brought into service since the passage of the Act will go down for the want of recruits. I think it will be well to permit conscripts to be assigned and volunteers to enter all companies in service.

It is true that the number of regiments is already too great, and that it is impossible to keep them all up. This may have been a motive for restricting recruits to old regiments and permitting the others gradually to decline. But it will be better to discriminate in the reduction of a number of regiments, and to consolidate such as become too weak to be recruited. The power of consolidating regiments, battalions, and companies, is so essential that our armies cannot be maintained in a tolerable state of efficiency without its exercise. The department has been compelled to disband corps because useless from loss of men or other cause, but as the law now stands this can only be done by discharging the entire corps and enrolling the men within the conscript age for service in other companies.

Two inconveniences attend this mode of proceeding: First, all men over thirty-five and under eighteen are lost, even though they have enlisted for the war. Secondly, it is doubtful whether conscripts can be enrolled out of their own States, and a company, therefore, cannot be disbanded out of the State in which it was raised without losing the whole company.

I suggest, therefore, that whenever a corps become so much reduced as to be unfit for service, and there is no reasonable expectation of recruiting it, the President be authorized to disband it, to put the officers out of commission, and to transfer the non-commissioned officers and privates to other corps from the same State. It may be objected that this violates the contract of enlistment, which is for service in the company selected by the volunteer, and thus the Government, in accepting the volunteer, impliedly engages to keep him in the company of his choice. I think that the engagement of the Government is fulfilled by retaining the volunteer in his company so long as it is fit for service, but that there is no implied promise to discharge him when his company can be no longer preserved. Such a promise would be a premium to inefficiency. A company anxious to leave the service would secure its object by rendering itself unfit to remain.

I also further recommend that power be given to enrol conscripts wherever they may be found. Military service is a debt due to the Confederacy, and the power of exacting should not depend on the accident of place. Conscription may be altogether avoided by large numbers of men, if merely crossing a line concentrates them from it. The practice of employing substitutes at pleasure, supposed to be authorized by the 9th section of the Conscription Act, has led to great abuses. The procurement of substitutes has become a regular business. Men thus obtained are usually unfit for service and frequently desert. The Department has restricted the practice by prohibiting the reception of unnaturalized foreigners as substitutes, but the evils of the system are still very great, and further restrictions are necessary.

It would be well to authorize substitution only where the services of the principal are equally useful to the public, at home as in the field. Such is the case with experts in trades necessary for the prosecution of the war, with overseers in districts of country having few whites and large numbers of slaves, and generally in such callings as are essential to the public welfare. It is unwise to injure the public service for the benefit of individuals, and therefore no substitution founded merely on considerations of private interest should be tolerated.

In this connection I desire to call attention to what seems to be an omission in the Exemption Act. Millers, tanners, and salt-makers are essential to the prosecution of the war. Without them armies can neither be subsisted or properly clad. They are equally essential to the community at large, and the restriction of such callings to persons under eighteen and over thirty-five years of age inflict injury upon the army and upon the people. I recommend, therefore, that they be included in the Exemption Act.

The greatest defect in our present system is to be found in the rule of promotion established by the 10th Section of the Conscription Act, and by the Acts of the Provisional Congress, approved December 11th, 1861, and January 22nd, 1862. They require promotion to be by seniority. To this rule no valid objection could be made if provision were made for exceptional cases in which it becomes impracticable. In long established armies seniority implies experience, and the rule is applied to individuals who, by previous examination or other test, have been found qualified for their position. In our armies there is little or no difference in the experience of our officers, and no test is applied to ascertain their moral or intellectual fitness for a commission.

As the act provides that commissions shall be granted by the President, it was supposed that this was intended as a safeguard against the admission of unqualified persons to important public trusts.

Accordingly, by General Order No. 39, a copy of which is herewith returned, Boards of Enquiry were directed to be summoned in all cases of promotion or election where the fitness of the claimant was doubtful. This, however, only keeps out unfit persons, but makes no provisions for filling vacancies in case there be no unfit person in the corps, or in case all entitled to promotion decline it. Such cases occur, and they contribute an element of disorganization and inefficiency in the army.

I earnestly recommend, therefore, that in all cases where election or promotion by seniority fails to fill a vacancy with a qualified officer, such vacancy may be filled by appointment. It may be objected that this increases Executive patronage, and by the intervention of examining boards, that promotion by seniority and by election may be cut off. If the increase of Executive patronage be necessary to remove a great evil, its possible abuse is a poor argument against such increase. It is unwise to prefer certain evils to contingent abuses. Practically, it has been found difficult to get the examining boards to be rigid enough; they are too apt from indolence or good nature to scrutinize slightly the qualifications of brother officers, and would prove to be very unfit instruments for Executive usurpation.

In this connection another serious difficulty in filling vacancies will be mentioned. It is generally supposed that the rule prescribed in the 10th section of the Conscription Act applies only to corps organized under that Act; that the rule prescribed in the Act approved December 11th, 1861, applies only to re-organizations of re-enlisted corps, very few of which re-organizations actually took place, and that the Act approved January 22nd, 1862, applies only to troops raised under an Act approved May 8th, 1861. But troops were authorized to be raised by Acts approved May 11th, 1861, and August 8th, 1861, and questions arise as to what Act troops come under, and what rule of promotion is provided for corps which come in under the Act last mentioned. It is said that troops mustered directly into Confederate States service received their laws of promotion from Congress, and that those raised by the Governors of States, under requisition on them by the President, are governed by the laws of their respective States. It is maintained that the latter class are militia, and that, under the Constitution, Congress cannot provide for filling vacancies occurring in the militia.

Great confusion, uncertainty, and inequality result from this state of things, and it is very important that a uniform rule should be applied to all. I know of no better rule than that already adopted, providing the power of appointment be given as recommended, and there be no constitutional impediments to its general application. A difficulty arises from the Act authorizing the appointment of general officers which should be removed. The 6th section of the Act approved March 6th, 1861, authorizes the President to organize brigades and divisions, and to appoint commanding officers for them, who are to hold office only while such brigades and divisions are in service. If the casualties of service destroy a brigade or a division, the commission of the general expires, and if separated from his command by ill health, wounds, or detached service, it is left without a head, there being no authority to appoint a successor without vacating the commission of the first appointee.

The army moreover requires the service of generals not attached to brigades and divisions. There are certain duties which can be better performed by general officers than by officers of lower grade, but the merit requisite for the discharge of these duties secures promotion in the line, and officers of the line are therefore unwilling to surrender their positions for staff appointments. Brigades and divisions are sometimes temporarily deprived of their commanders by the casualties of service, and it is desirable to assign general officers to such commands. It will be well, therefore, to increase the number of general officers to a definite excess above the whole number, not exceeding eight or ten per cent. for the purposes above mentioned.

Congress, at its last session, authorized the appointment of eighty artillery officers for ordnance duties, the addition of fifty engineers to the provisional corps, and the organization of a signal corps, and a nitre corps.

All of these Acts have been carried into execution. Eighty artillery officers for ordnance duty have been appointed, and their duties prescribed and systematized. General Orders No. 24 and 46, herewith returned, require that every army corps shall have an ordnance captain, every brigade one with the rank of first lieutenant, and every regiment an ordnance sergeant. These form a corps under the chief of ordnance at Richmond, to whom they are required to report. Their services are important for the proper distribution and preservation of arms. Ordnance officers are also required for arsenals. For the proper discharge of ordnance duties at arsenals and in the field, it will require a corps of at least 150.

I recommend, therefore, that application be made for the enlargement of the corps to that number, and that a limited number be authorized with the grade of major for service with army corps.

Most of the additional engineers have been appointed and the corps has done good service. The present law permits no higher grade than that of captain, while the other corps of the provisional army are organized in conformity with corresponding corps in the Confederate States army. This discrimination is unjust and impolitic. If men of talent and acquirement are needed in this corps, promotion should be offered equal to that attainable in other branches of the service.

Engineering talent is of a high order of endowment, and should be stimulated by proper rewards. I recommend, therefore, that the grade of the Provisional Engineer Corps should be made to conform to those of the same corps in the Confederate States Army.

A Signal Corps has been organized by general order No. 40, a copy of which is herewith returned. For the purpose of systematic instruction, a confidential pamphlet has been prepared by a member of the corps and printed with due precautions to avoid publicity. Should it, however, fall into the enemy's hands, no great harm would be done, as it contains the principles of the art merely, and does not disclose the key to any signal or cipher.

A Nitre Bureau has also been organized, and under its able and indefatigable head, Major J. M. St. John, is doing good service. General Order No. 41, herewith communicated, was issued to facilitate the operations of the Bureau. The production of Nitre is already one thousand pounds a day, and there is good reason to think that it will reach three thousand pounds a day, and supply our consumption.

A map of a reconnaissance, and Major St. John's report, are herewith returned. The Bureau has been directed to turn its attention to the mining of such material as are required for the army, and will do much to develop their production.

The act authorizing bands of partisan rangers has been carried into execution. Apprehending that the novelty of the organization, and the supposed freedom from control, would attract great numbers into the Partisan Corps, the Department adopted a rule requiring a recommendation from a general commanding a department, before granting authority to raise partisans. Notwithstanding this restriction, there is reason to fear that the number of Partisan Corps greatly exceed the requirements of the service, and that they seriously impede recruiting for regiments of the line.

The precaution has been taken to require their organization to conform in all respects to that of other troops, and it will be only necessary to brigade such of them as are not needed for partisan service, to make them, in fact, troops of the line, although nominally partisans. I recommend that this be authorized.

Since the adjournment of Congress, our stock of arms has been largely increased by importation and capture. Our small arms alone have increased from these sources not less than eighty thousand. Our supply of ammunition has also been increased by importation and manufacture; and, as already stated, we may expect at no distant day that the active and methodical operations of the nitre Corps will supply our demand and make us independent of foreign importation.

I deem it unnecessary to say anything of the operations of the army since the adjournment of Congress. The time has not arrived for their complete disclosure, but enough has appeared to show the ability of our generals and the courage and patience of our troops.

It is to be regretted that we cannot reward such services as the army has rendered; they are infinitely above all compensation, but something may be done to show our appreciation of them—courage and skill cannot always command promotion. Happily for us, they far exceed our means of reward, if confined to mere material benefits. It would, however, be doing our high-toned soldiers great injustice to suppose that rank and pay are their only incentives to exertion. I think that medals conferred as rewards for good conduct in the field cultivate the spirit which distinguishes the patriot soldier from the mercenary, and afford means of reward without injuring the army by excessive promotion.

I recommend, therefore, that application be made for authority to confer medals upon such officers and men as distinguished themselves in battle.

A right to control the operations of our railroads to some extent is necessary to insure quick and safe transportation, and to maintain the roads in a proper state of efficiency. The regular transportation of the roads is so much deranged by the movements of troops and munitions of war, that a common head during the war is necessary. I recommend that application be made for authority to exercise such control as may be necessary to harmonize the operations of the roads, and to maintain their efficiency, and to appoint a superintendent who shall be charged with the supervision of railroad transportation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. W. RANDOLPH.

Secretary of War

THE FEDERAL BLOCKADE OF BERMUDA.

The Bermuda Gazette of the 7th October, under the heading "The notorious Wilkes," publishes the following extraordinary statements:—

Admiral Wilkes, with his flagship and two gunboats, arrived off the Islands on Friday, the 26th ult., and on the following morning entered the harbour of St. George, with the Wachusett and the Tioga, the Sonoma being left outside cruising in the channel. The Admiral called on his Excellency the Governor on Saturday afternoon, having, as we are informed, received the usual official notification, as laid down in Her Majesty's proclamation (already published in our columns) that twenty-four hours only would be allowed for the stay of the vessels in his command. We understand that the object of his visit was to obtain coal, but as the ships were only four days from Hampton Roads his supplies could not have run out to any extent,—hardly, we think, to incapacitate his return to his nearest port. The coaling, under some pretext, did not commence until Monday afternoon, when a few tons were put on board the Wachusett. The Tioga did not commence coaling until Tuesday. The coaling of these vessels was completed on Tuesday night and Wednesday, and then an accident occurring to the machinery of the flag-ship again delayed the departure of the squadron. In the meantime the Sonoma was engaged in cruising about outside, and on Wednesday morning she came in to coal and repair a mishap which occurred to her machinery, how, when, or where we are not in a position to state. On the Wednesday morning the Tioga went out and relieved the Sonoma, following the same course of proceeding as her consort, cruising about in the channels, and anchoring near the checkered buoy at night, blocking up the entrance and preventing the ingress and egress of all vessels. The Wachusett left on Thursday morning, and in the afternoon the Sonoma went out; the Admiral bore away to the eastward, and was out of sight at night, the two gunboats being left cruising outside—a piece of recreation which they have since been indulging in up to the time of our going to press.

The ostensible object of obtaining coal is, we conceive, but a little scheme to see how far it might be possible for American pluck to drive through the rules of neutrality laid down by the British Government. The delaying from Monday to Thursday, the cruising within our waters, the anchoring in our channels, the landing of armed crews, the boarding of British vessels, the taking on board of unlimited coal, and the subsequent proceedings of the gunboats evidently prove that there must have been some peculiar and particularly private reasons which have given us the honour of this influx of United States' heroes.

The mail steamer was boarded this morning, and boats have been engaged in sounding the channels and reefs at the west end.

We are not anxious for a row, nor do we wish to come across the peculiarities of Americans in their present excited and perhaps exasperated and unreasoning condition; but we do submit whether these breeches, committed in the very teeth of the Royal instructions, in the face of justice, right, and national law, ought not to receive such a check as to put an end to the chance of that flag which is supposed to have braved a thousand years the battle and breeze being deliberately and grossly insulted.

The Royal mail steamer Merlin, Captain Sampson, when within three miles of the land yesterday morning, was fired at and brought to by one of these gunboats, and though the officer in charge of the boat, when he became aware of the true character of the vessel he had stopped, apologized, still such frequent and unprovoked insults will not be submitted to.

Her Majesty's steamer Steady, Captain Grant, arrived here from Halifax on Friday last to have her machinery perfected. She left Halifax on the 23rd ult., at which time there were in that port Her Majesty's ships Ariadne, Immortalité, Melphomene, Peterel, and Spitful.

Her Majesty's steamer Melphomene, 51, Captain Ewart, arrived at Halifax from Nassau, New Providence, on the 21st ult. She had had sixteen cases of yellow fever on board, five of which had proved fatal. The convalescing had been removed to the Pyramus receiving ship, lying off the Royal Naval Hospital.

Her Majesty's ship Spitful arrived at Halifax on the night of the 22nd ult., also from New Providence. Had had twenty-two cases of yellow fever, of which eight had proved fatal—viz., in the case of a midshipman, a master's mate, and six seamen. The Spitful was placed in quarantine.

Admiral Milne left Halifax on the 23rd ult., in the Nimble, accompanied by the Landrail, Plover, Cygnet, Medea, and Nile and Hero, on an experimental trip. All the vessels were to go to Ship Harbour, and the Admiral was to return to Halifax on the 26th. He would afterwards go to St. John, New Brunswick, in the Medea.

The steamship Askelon, from Liverpool, England, bound to the West Indies, arrived at Sydney, Cape Breton, on the 20th ult., for coal, and was to have proceeded on her voyage that night.

The British steamer Ovachita got under way in St. George's Harbour on Sunday, and proceeded to Grassy Bay, for the purpose of trying her engines, when one of the American gunboats chased her to the entrance of the north fide channel.

We understand that the Admiral, with a large force, is expected here from Halifax about the middle or end of next month. We are, however, disposed to think that recent occurrences will expedite the arrival of his squadron.

THE CONFEDERATE NAVY DEPARTMENT AND CONGRESS.

The subjoined proceedings in the Confederate Senate furnish many points of interest to the student of the great American revolution. Charges of incompetency have been brought against the Secretary of the Navy in the Lower House, a joint resolution was put to appoint a committee of inquiry. This resolution coming before the Senate, the following debate ensued:—

The resolution relative to the Navy Department was then taken up and reported. It led to a long and spirited discussion. This is the resolution as it stood after the blanks had been filled by the Senate:—

That a Joint Committee of five be appointed on the part of the Senate, and five on the part of the House, to investigate the management of the Navy Department under its present head; and that such committee be empowered to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky, desired to say he should vote against the resolution. He had never known any good result from these committees. They, under the old Government, always resulted in white-washing resolutions. There was a method of reaching an officer of the Government, if he had failed in the discharge of his duty. Let some Senator come forward, and upon his own responsibility charge the Secretary of the Navy; let him be arraigned and tried. He desired no injustice to the Secretary of the Navy. But he favoured an open and fair trial and investigation, and not a star chamber process, as was practised under the old Government.

Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, should vote for the resolution. A member of the other branch of Congress had asserted that the iron steamer Mississippi might have been, but for mismanagement, completed in time to have defended New Orleans. He thought that, in justice to the Secretary of the Navy and to the President, an investigation should be had. He had received reports of the conduct of the Secretary of the Navy, which, if true, should subject him to the condemnation of the Senate, but he had not sufficient proof to make any charge.

Mr. Clay concurred with the senator from Kentucky; still he would vote for the resolution, hoping that the committee would bear in mind the fact that the secretary may be in the dilemma that he cannot justify his own conduct without exposing facts inexpedient now to be made public.

Mr. Brown, of Mississippi, submitted the following as an amendment to the resolution: "And said Joint Committee shall investigate all such charges as may be preferred in writing by any responsible person against the Secretary of the Navy, and a copy of such and every of such charges shall be furnished to the Secretary before the Investigating Committee begins its labours."

Mr. Wigfall explained that under the Constitution the House of Representatives alone could impeach an officer of the Government, and the Senate was the court by which such officer was to be tried.

If any member of the House knew of malfeasance in a Government officer, it was his duty to impeach him, instead of moving a resolution to appoint an itinerant committee to go roaming about the country in search of witnesses and papers. If any gentleman in the Senate knew of the malfeasance of the Secretary of the Navy, let him go to the member from his State in the other House, lay his facts before him, and let him impeach him. He should vote against the resolution, and all similar resolutions. He believed that the passage of any such investigating committee was unconstitutional. The House has the right to impeach and the Senate to try; further we could not go.

Mr. Preston would vote for the resolution. It was no question of impeachment; it was a question of inquiry. A question not of impeachment but of knowledge. An inquiry was necessary to satisfy the Congress and the people. There is no censure implied by the terms of the resolution. It proposes simply to investigate the management of the Navy Department. The habits and usages under the old Government are the things most to be avoided.

Mr. Brown, of Mississippi, said, we were told that we were to investigate the affairs of the Department. But where are we to begin? The Secretary has sent in his report, wherein he has stated all the affairs of his Department, except such as the public good requires shall be kept from the public, and this committee will hardly take the responsibility of dragging into public view these facts. It cannot be concealed that this resolution is the result of public clamour through the newspapers and heated denunciations in the other House. We all know how easy it was to raise a hue and cry against the commanders of armies and navies. Let our armies be unsuccessful, and we shall hear the same clamour against the generals. Let the mail boy fail on any route, and we hear denunciations of the Postmaster-General. The president is not an idiot. If the charges made against the secretary were well-founded, the President would not retain him in office. The President is cognizant of all the facts, and he knows that the denunciations of the Secretary are unfounded. But what is it proposed the Committee shall investigate? Where is it to begin? He was opposed to the resolution and should vote against it.

Mr. Barnwell should vote against the resolution. He was opposed to an investigation at this time, because he believed it inexpedient. He believed the head of that department had suffered in public opinion from his self-sacrifice. If he spoke only as the friend of the Secretary, he would desire an investigation, for it is impossible the facts would justify the amount of odium that has been heaped upon him. But regard for the character of the Secretary would not induce him to vote for a measure which would expose to our enemies schemes in the past and future, which should be kept from their knowledge. Another reason why he should vote against the resolution was that it might lead to impeachment, in which case the Senate, being the judge before whom the accused might come, should have nothing to do with the investigation.

Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, said the question involved a principle that the Senate should not investigate charges against an officer, because perchance the investigation might elicit something which would subject him to impeachment. If this was to be adopted as a principle, there was an end of all investigation.

Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, was opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, because it narrowed the field of inquiry. It was due to the character of the Secretary that the investigation should be full and unlimited. He favoured the resolution.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. Phelan, of Mississippi, offered as an amendment, that the words "under its present head" be struck out, which was rejected.

The joint resolution was then put to the vote, the yeas and noes having been called for, and was adopted—yeas 15, noes 7.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

Nos. I. to XXVII. NOW READY.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent commercial, however remote, however small the class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—startled Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of these events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The friends of the Lincolnites on this side the Atlantic must be patient and even rather fond of being befooled. It is almost affecting to see with what childlike credulity they accept the oracles of Washington and New York, and though their faith has been betrayed a hundred times, they are ready and willing to believe that two and two make five in the Southern States, if it shall please Mr. Lincoln or his Ministers, Messrs. Seward, Halleck, or Chase, to declare it so in an amended edition of "Cocker's Arithmetic." For these last few days we have been treated to some pretty essays upon the exhaustion of the South. First, because Southern journals admit the Confederate loss at Corinth to have been heavy, and the advantage of the fight to have been with the Federals. And we can quite understand that it must seem curious to Northerners to see their enemy frankly admitting a repulse, which was of such a nature that the Federals were not extremely jubilant; and still more extraordinary must appear the freedom with which Southern journals comment on public affairs. In the second place, we were admonished of the glorious victory of General Buell over General Bragg. The Confederate army had been whipped, routed, and scattered. Buell was the man to redeem the military reputation of the North. New York was not particularly elated, but in England the Northerners were in a delirium of triumph. The arrival of the City of New York puts an end to the rejoicing. We are informed that "General Buell has relinquished the pursuit of General Bragg, who has passed through Cumberland Gap into East Tennessee. The Confederates carried immense trains of provisions out of Kentucky." An army beaten and pursued does not carry "immense trains of provisions;" and, therefore, we now have a Northern admission that the Buell victory is to be classed with Pope's capture of "10,000 men," and with the Halleck version of the evacuation of Corinth. Nor is this all. The Washington Government is so discontented with "the victory" that General Buell has been removed from the command in Kentucky, and replaced by General Rosecrans. The "Buell victory" was fabricated for election purposes, but why the "dodge" should have been so soon and openly confessed is not so clear. Possibly the result of the elections, as known to the Washington officials, makes them anxious about the consequences to themselves of continuing to so grossly deceive the people.

General McClellan has not advanced. "Reconnoissances from his army continue to be made," and that is all. It is reported that "General Burnside has been assigned to the command of the defences at Harper's Ferry," and that "the Confederates are massed in the Shenandoah Valley." There is a continual agitation kept up by the Republicans against General McClellan. They demand his removal. It is rumoured that there will be another convention of Governors to effect that object, as well as to urge the enforcement of the Confiscation Act. We can assure the Governors that Mr. Lincoln's Government will be extremely happy to enforce confiscation if they will show him how it is to be done.

The Federals are said to have evacuated Corinth and Bolivar, Mississippi. Nashville is entirely cut off from communication with the North.

A Confederate defeat in Arkansas is reported by the New York telegram. The announcement is suspiciously bare of details.

The results of the elections are, as far as possible, kept a secret; but this confirms the reported Democratic gains. At a Democratic meeting held at Brooklyn, Mr. Horatio Seymour declared that Democratic relationships to the Government had changed within the last few weeks, and that Democracy now commanded the situation. He said, referring to the deception and corruption of the Federal Government:—

There must be no more withholding of truths from the popular eye. The general term is used that we have been labouring under a "misapprehension." (Laughter.) How happened it that more than 200,000 young men have been laid in new-made graves, but for the fact that we had a "misapprehension" as to the power of our enemy? How came this "misapprehension"? We had been taught in schools, in our youth, concerning the resources of the South. The courage of Taylor and the Southern troops in the Mexican war was well known. Evidences of the riches and energy of the Southern people had long been seen in the commerce of the port of New York. Quite a "misapprehension" of the true strength of the South was studiously inculcated by evil-minded persons in the North. If the facts of Southern resources had been fully understood here, this war would never have taken place, and brothers' hands would not now be imbued in each other's blood. Conceal the facts of a depreciated currency, of intrigues in the army, of disasters by land and sea, conceal these facts if you will, but you cannot keep the truth from ultimately coming out, and the people from judging upon it. (Applause.) Put them in gaols if you will. That will not prevent them from speaking their mind. It is in vain that you place armies in the field, that you send out sons, brothers, and friends, if there is not a wise system of government to sustain them there. (Cheers.) What are the facts? I appeal to you, Radicals and Conservatives, and ask you if you ever find in the Republican journals the statements of notorious frauds, proved by Congressional examination? Our Republican friends love to talk about the nation's life being in danger, but they do not like to have you talk of what is the danger. (Laughter.) That Government whose frauds are concealed is on the road to destruction. A corrupt Government will destroy you as inevitably as invading armies. It will not only destroy the national authority, but disgrace the national character. I will allude to only one case—fraud No. 62—from a report made by Hon. Robert Dale Owens and Hon. Joseph Holt. Among the contracts for arms there was one made by an establishment which had been in the habit of furnishing muskets to European Governments for $12½ a piece. They charge our Government $25 a piece for the same arms. Another concern offered to furnish it for $15 (it only cost $7), and made a weapon equally good, perhaps superior. They could only get an order for 5000, while the other concern received an order for 30,000. The profit of that firm was over $300,000. The committee also state that out of all the contracts made for guns only four contained the usual provision, excluding members of Congress from the contract, according to the law of the country. I beg of you to study your Congressional reports. Learn for yourself if fraud does not reek at the national capital. See if John Hale did not tell the truth when he said that the Government had more to fear from corruption in the departments than from the enemy in the field.

Resolutions were passed pledging Democracy to restore the Union as it was, and to maintain the Constitution as it is, denouncing arbitrary arrests and interference with the freedom of the press. Mr. Lincoln's emancipation proclamation was declared unwise in policy and bad in principle, securing an united South, but making a disunited North.

On the other hand, Republican meetings have been held in Brooklyn, at which the emancipation proclamation was fully approved, and the "Union as it is" was denounced. It is worthy of observation that those who profess to be fighting for the restoration of the Union are openly condemning it.

The North seems to be doing as much as possible to get into a quarrel with Europe. The New York Tribune gives the following account of a transaction that would be incredible if we were not already acquainted with the lawlessness of Federal naval officers:—

On the 8th of the present month the merchant ship Blanche, Captain Smith, carrying the English flag, formerly engaged in the trade between New Orleans and Cuba, but sold, since the war, to an English house, was coming from Matamoras to Cuba, when she stopped at a small port called Mulata to take in coal. She then sailed for Havannah with a Spanish pilot on board. When near that place and off Marianao, she saw at a distance an American ship running toward her with all speed. The ship proved to be the gunboat Montgomery, Captain Hunter. Unfortunately, the captain of the Blanche became alarmed, and instead of waiting for her, attempted to escape. The Montgomery continued her pursuit, compelled her to wear round, and ran her ashore six miles north of Moro Castle. The sea Alcalde, who had watched her movements from the shore, took a boat, and with two or three other men went on board the Blanche, on which he hoisted the Spanish flag as a sign that she was under the protection of the Spanish Government. At the same time Captain Hunter, of the Montgomery, ordered two boats with armed men to go on board the Blanche, and to take forcible possession of the vessel. Once on board, the officer in command explained to Captain Smith and to the Alcalde what his mission was, and told them that he had received orders to carry the Blanche away, if possible; if not, to set fire to her and to burn her cargo. Captain Smith and the Spanish official having protested against such proceedings, a quarrel ensued, in which the officer of the Montgomery slapped the Alcalde in the face, and with the aid of his men drove him ashore, together with the three Spaniards who were with him. After this, they came back, set fire to the ship, and carried away the Cuban pilot who had been taken by Captain Smith at Marianao. When the Spanish Governor at Havannah received the account of the affair, orders were given to a Spanish frigate to sail forthwith, and to capture the perpetrator of the deed. But the Montgomery had disappeared, and at the latest date no trace of her had been discovered. At the same time despatches were sent to Mr. Tenara, the Spanish Minister at Washington, giving the details of the matter, which by this time must have been submitted to Mr. Seward.

This report seems confirmed by a later account in the New York Tribune, to the effect that "It is believed in Washington that if the circumstances of the sinking of the steamer Blanche, in Spanish waters, by the Federal steamer Montgomery, are as stated, the Federal Government will repudiate the action of the captain of the Montgomery." If the Federal Government should repudiate the act of its officer, it will only repeat a stratagem that it has often and successfully essayed—to bully the defenceless, and to cringe when threatened with retaliation. But possibly the Spanish Government may not be so patient as the English Government, and may not be satisfied with a verbal apology for a barbarous insult. In that case we doubt not the Federal Government will be ready to sacrifice their officer, as well as apologise.

At New Orleans General Butler has, to quote the Times, "been making a raid upon family spoons," and in such a manner as to insult the Prussian Government by a gross violation of the law of nations. It appears that the Prussian ship Essex arrived at New Orleans on the 24th of August last with a cargo of salt, which was duly discharged on the 2nd of September. She then, having obtained the requisite authority, commenced loading with a cargo for Liverpool, a Custom-house officer being stationed on board to supervise the entire operation. Everything being completed, application was made to the Custom-house, on the 15th of September, for a clearance. But this, without assigning any reason, the Collector of Customs positively refused. An application from the Prussian Consul, however, brought forth a verbal answer that the ship would not be allowed to proceed unless the following five items of her cargo were taken out:—

Shipped by Robert Clark, silver ware, one package valued at $3000, and one valued at $500, consigned to George Green, Sons, and Co., Liverpool.

Shipped by Houghton, Rankin, and Co., three cases containing family plated ware, and silver plate in use, valued at $8000 dollars, consigned to Rankin, Gilmore, and Co., Liverpool.

Shipped by T. B. Ehlers, two boxes of old silver ware, valued at $6000, sealed and consigned to Messrs. A. Duranty and Co., Liverpool, as British property.

Shipped by Francis Olroyd, two boxes containing bullion, value $4205, consigned to James Harris, Sun Life Insurance Office, London, care of Bahr, Behrens, and Co., Liverpool.

Shipped by Cramer and Co., as Hamburg property, one box said to contain in gold $4745, in silver $520, consigned to order.

The Prussian Consul appealed to General Butler, and on the 20th the General sent an officer on board the Essex with the above list of articles, of which he demanded the surrender. The captain refused compliance, unless the bills of lading he had given for them were returned to him by the shippers, and at the same time he made a formal protest, holding General Butler responsible for damages at the rate of $500 a day. Not to speak of the breach of law, the affair deserves notice from the paltry conduct of the Federal commander.

The New York Chamber of Commerce is almost amusing in its petulant anger at the doings of the Confederate war vessel Alabama, which we need not inform our readers is as regularly commissioned as any vessel in the Federal navy. Did the merchants of New York think they were never to know the dangers and devastations of war? Did they think they were for ever to encourage the destruction of Southern towns, without retaliation? Their remonstrance, which we append, is puerile, in the extreme. England will not, to oblige them, capture the Alabama, or refuse to sell ships to the Confederates while she sells warlike stores to the Federals.

That the Chamber has heard with profound emotion the graphic account given by Captain Hagar of the burning of the ship Brilliant, on the 3rd of October, a portion of which is in the following words: [Then follows a description of the burning of the ship, of which particulars have already been published.]

That, in view of this atrocity, it is the duty of this Chamber to announce, for the information of all who are interested in the safety of human life, the life of shipwrecked passengers and crews, that henceforth the light of a burning ship at sea will become to the American sailor the signal that lures to destruction, and will not be, as in times past, the beacon to guide the generous and intrepid mariner to the rescue of the unfortunate.

That henceforth self-preservation will be the first dictate of prudence as it is the first law of nature, and consequently the destruction of the Brilliant can only be characterized as a crime against humanity, and all who have knowingly and willingly aided and abetted must be considered as perpetrators in the crime.

That this Chamber has not failed to notice a rapid change in British sentiment, transferring a friendly nation into a self-styled neutral Power, the nature of which neutrality is shown in permitting ships to go forth with men, and in permitting an armament to follow them for the detestable work of plundering and destroying American ships, thus encouraging upon the high seas an offence against neutral rights, on plea of which, in the case of the Trent, the British Government threatened to plunge this Government into war.

That the outrage of consigning to destruction by fire, without adjudication British and American property together, is an aggravation of the offence against the rights of neutrals, and ought to be denounced as a crime by the civilized nations of the world.

That the Chamber has heard with amazement that other vessels are fitting out in the ports of Great Britain to continue the work of destruction begun by the Alabama,—an enormity that cannot be committed on the high seas without jeopardizing the commerce and peace of nations.

That it is the duty of the Chamber to warn the merchants of Great Britain that a repetition of such acts as the burning of the Brilliant by vessels fitted out in Great Britain, and manned by British seamen, cannot fail to produce the most widespread exasperation in this country, and hence they invoke the influence of all men who value peace and good-will among the nations, to prevent the departure of other vessels of the character referred to from their ports, and so to avert the calamity of war.

That it is the desire as it is the interest of all its members to cherish sentiments of amity with the people of Great Britain, to maintain those cordial relations which have led to profitable intercourse, and to strengthen the ties that knit them together in mutual courtesy and respect.

That copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be sent to the Hon. Secretary of State, and the Hon. Secretary of the Navy of the United States, and to the Board of Trade of London and Liverpool, and that the Secretary of State be requested to transmit copies of the same to the diplomatic agents of the United States for distribution in other commercial countries.

The Washington Government is not more seemly in its anger. It is reported in New York that "Semi-official despatches from Washington say that the Federal Government would give half-a-million dollars for the capture of the Confederate steamer Alabama, or $300,000 for her destruction." Are we to understand that Federal navy officers are so remiss in their duty that they need the stimulus of a reward? Or does the Federal Government think it necessary to bid for piratical or foreign aid?

Thirty Federal machine workers at Portsmouth, Virginia, have gone over to the Confederates.

It is rumoured that the superintendent of a plantation near New Orleans had been killed by negroes, and that the negroes afterwards revolted, and several of them were shot. No details of the affair and no authority for the statement are given.

The Morning Herald (Nov. 5) says:—

The Emperor of the French either has made, or is on the point of making, a proposal to Her Majesty's Government that France, England, and Russia shall jointly recommend to the belligerents a suspension of hostilities.

General Scott has published a lengthy document, detailing the plan he proposed to "stop" Secession. Even now he seems to think the strengthening of a few Southern forts would have been sufficient. This might have been excusable so long as the General could persuade himself Secession was the conspiracy of a few, but now that he knows it was the determination of the entire Southern people to secede, his opinion shows wonderful weakness of judgment. The following is the first clause in General Scott's memorandum, and it is also a summary of his scheme:—

October 30, 1860.—I emphatically call the attention of the President to the necessity of strong garrisons in all the forts below the principal commercial cities of the Southern States, including, by name, the forts in Pensacola harbour. October 31, I suggested to the Secretary of War that a circular should be sent at once to such of those forts as had garrisons to be on the alert against surprises and sudden assaults. (See my Views, since printed.) After a long confinement to my bed in New York, I came to this city (Washington) December 12. Next day I personally urged upon the Secretary of War the same views—viz., strong garrisons in the Southern forts—those of Charleston and Pensacola harbours, at once; those on Mobile Bay and the Mississippi, below New Orleans, next, &c. I again pointed out the organized companies and the recruits at the principal depots available for the purpose. The Secretary did not concur in any of my views, when I begged him to procure for me an early interview with the President, that I might make one effort more to save the forts and the Union. By appointment, the Secretary accompanied me to the President, December 15, when the same topics—secessionism, &c.—were again pretty fully discussed. There being at the moment (in the opinion of the President) no danger of an early secession beyond South Carolina, the President, in reply to my arguments for immediately reinforcing Fort Moultrie and sending a garrison to Fort Sumter, said,—

"The time has not arrived for doing so; that he should wait the action of the Convention of South Carolina, in the expectation that a commission would be appointed and sent to negotiate with him and Congress respecting the secession of the State, and the property of the United States held within its limits; and that if Congress should decide against the secession, then he would send a reinforcement, and telegraph the commanding officer (Major Anderson) of Fort Moultrie to hold the forts (Moultrie and Sumter) against attack."

The observations of Mr. Lincoln prove, though further proof is needless, that at the time of his assuming office he did not profess to regard Secession as rebellion, but was expecting to negotiate about the property of the United States in a seceded State.

In New York there was, when the mail left, a scarcity of labouring men, and the Chamber of Commerce recommended the promotion of immigration. Would not the circulation of the Federal Conscription Act, the statistical history of the war as to the numbers who died from fatigue and wounds, and the rigid way in which the draft is enforced, be likely means to attract emigrants to the United States? It will be found easier to procure powder from Europe than "food for powder."

Among the Pennsylvanian miners there "has been organized resistance to the draft," but it is said "affairs have been adjusted." Weak indeed must be a Government that has to "adjust affairs" with men who form an association to resist its decrees.

ENGLAND.

The General Relief Committee held its meeting at Manchester on Monday last, to receive the Report of the Executive Committee. Mr. Cobden's name was added to the list of the former Committee. The Report stated that the Executive had received £150,000, and that a further sum of £30,000, collected by other associations, was likely to be placed in their hands. They had it in their power to distribute £25,000 per month for five months to come. The Local Committees had raised a further sum of £100,000. But the number of paupers in the district was nearly 209,000, against 45,000 in October 1861, and further, 143,000 persons not receiving parochial aid, were assisted by the Local Relief Committees. The number of operatives employed and unemployed was:—

In full work	58,638
Working short time	119,712
Out of work	182,401
Total	360,751

To assist the sufferers, the Executive Committee have organized a complete system of relief in money and clothing throughout the distressed districts, under the superintendence of Local Boards, composed of the gentlemen resident in each of the suffering townships.

Large sums have been received from various distant quarters. Australia has sent nearly £25,000; subscriptions have been received from English residents in Egypt, Buenos Ayres, and Bangalore; many dioceses have instituted church collections; and subscriptions have been received from the army and navy, from the employés of various companies, and the workmen in prosperous trades. Supplies of blankets and clothing have been received, and many railway and steamboat companies have agreed to carry such packages free of charge.

The following is Mr. Farnall's Report to the Executive:—

Manchester, Nov. 3.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report, on twenty-four unions in the cotton manufacturing districts, will show you that, on the 25th ult., there were 208,621 persons receiving relief, and that in the corresponding week of last year there were 45,437 persons so relieved. There is, therefore, an increase of 163,184 paupers, or 359.1 per cent.

The unions referred to are:—Ashton-under-Lyne, Barton-upon-Irwell, Blackburn, Bolton, Burnley, Bury, Chorley, Chorlton, Clitheroe, Glossop, Haslingden, Lancaster, Leigh, Macclesfield, Manchester, Oldham, Preston, Prestwich, Rochdale, Salford, Stockport, Todmorden, Warrington and Wigan.

It will be remembered that in my first report to you, which was for the last week in last August, I stated that the number of persons then receiving parochial relief in these unions was 149,165; but on the 25th ult., there were 208,621 persons so relieved; therefore, in eight weeks 58,456 persons have become paupers in the unions adverted to.

This increase has taken place almost wholly in the following twelve unions:—In Ashton-under-Lyne the increase is 11,358; in Blackburn, 6068; in Burnley, 2979; in Bury, 3734; in Chorlton, 3568; in Haslingden, 5272; in Oldham, 4022; in Manchester, 10,343; in Preston, 5837; in Rochdale, 2386; in Todmorden, 2083; in Stockport, 2438; making a total increase of 60,088 paupers.

The average percentage of pauperism on population in the above 24 unions is now 10.8 per cent.; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.4; but, while 10.8 is the average percentage, the percentage in the union of Ashton-under-Lyne is 20.7; in that of Preston, 17.8; in that of Blackburn, 17.1; in Manchester, 15.6; in Glossop, 14.3; in Haslingden, 13.1; in Todmorden, 12.8; in Stockport, 11.5; in Rochdale, 11.2; and in Burnley, 11.1.

The total weekly cost of out-door relief in the 24 unions is now £13,158 19s. 8d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2288 11s. 3d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £10,868 8s. 5d., or 475.0 per cent.; but this increase has taken place almost wholly in the following 14 unions:—The increase in Ashton-under-Lyne is £1606 per week; in Blackburn, £55; in Burnley, £533; in Bury, £501; in Chorlton, £467; in Glossop, £233; in Haslingden, £622; in Manchester, £1632; in Preston, £1266; in Rochdale, £639; in Oldham, £431; in Stockport, £657; in Todmorden, £222; and in Salford, £442; making a total weekly increase of £9106.

The total weekly cost of in-door and out-door relief alone in the last-named 14 unions is £12,937, or at the rate of 3s. 7½d. in the pound on the net rateable value of £3,702,005 per annum; but it is to be remembered that this is the cost of relief alone, and does not include any other charge for which the poor-rates are liable; it is also to be remembered that fully one-third of the poor-rates cannot now be collected in the chief towns of these unions, and that therefore the pressure on the solvent ratepayers of those towns is heavier than that on the ratepayers of the unions generally.

I take the liberty of adding that the boards of guardians are, as it seems to me, meeting this crisis with prudence and humanity, and that the scheme of your Committee for aiding the unemployed workpeople through your own watchfulness and authority and through the medium of resident local committees, is the best and most benevolent means for mitigating the trying calamity.—I am, my lords and gentlemen, your obedient servant,

H. B. FARNALL,
Special Commissioner for Government.

Mr. Cobden addressed the meeting. He remarked that the loss of wages was stated at £7,000,000 a year. But there could be little doubt that it would reach at least £10,000,000 a year. The relief granted by the Committee, of £25,000 a month, was only 3 per cent. on the latter amount. But the loss of wages to the factory operatives was not all. The loss of the manufacturers was also enormous—perhaps nearly as great. The increase in the rates was £500,000 a year, and would be more. A large number of the ratepayers were unable to pay their rates; he had himself seen a case in which a poor shopkeeper, after paying her rate, had to ask for relief. Mr. Farnall had estimated the proportion of rateable property unable to pay the rates, at one-third. But Mr. Cobden thought it would be much larger. The default of the poorer ratepayers compelled the exaction of a higher rate, and this again increased the number of defaulters. The relief given was wretchedly insufficient. It was as low as a shilling a-head; sometimes it reached 1s. 5d.; in hardly any case did it amount to 2s. In prosperous times the parish allowance was eked out by neighbourly kindness; now, all were overwhelmed by a common ruin, and no working-man, however willing, was able to help his neighbour. The health of the people was in danger. Something more must be done. The Committee should become not a Lancashire but a National Committee, and should invite all men of leading official position—lords lieutenant, mayors, and so forth—to become members. Let a Relief Committee to collect subscriptions and diffuse information, be organized in every borough in the kingdom. It was important to dispel the false impressions which existed concerning the conduct of the propertied classes of Lancashire. Those classes had behaved well. They knew the importance of preventing the emigration or dispersion of the workpeople. Without the Lancashire operatives, the wealth of Lancashire would lose all its value, now suspended through what, Mr. Cobden hoped, would be the merely temporary suspension of the cotton supply. A national subscription of a million ought to be collected before the meeting of Parliament.

The Mansion-house Committee has received upwards of £100,000, besides parcels of clothing, blankets, &c.

This makes a total of £350,000, as follows:—

Central Relief Committee . . .	£150,000
Mansion-house Committee . . .	100,000
Local Relief Committee . . .	100,000

The increase of pauperism is over 12,500, as follows:—

Paupers.	Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne 2,320	Manchester . . . 1960
Blackburn . . . 890	Preston . . . 1110
Bolton . . . 400	Rochdale . . . 580
Burnley . . . 450	Salford . . . 410
Bury . . . 1080	Stockport . . . 230
Chorley . . . 150	Todmorden . . . 380
Chorlton . . . 620	Warrington . . . 30
Glossop . . . 160	Wigan . . . 70
Haslingden . . . 1590
Liverpool . . . 140	Total . . . 12,650
Macclesfield . . . 80

A meeting was held at Leeds, under the presidency of the Mayor, to consider the case of the distressed districts. Mr. Beckett, ex-M.P., read the following passage from a letter in reference to the conduct of the millowners, written by a large landowner and active member of the Central Relief Committee.

The answer to your question as to whether the Lancashire manufacturers have done all that might be expected towards the relief of their distressed population is rather difficult. There is no doubt that the names of the principal large manufacturers do not appear in the subscription lists, and there are a few who have not done what they ought; but the impression on my mind, from all I hear and see at our Manchester meetings, is that, on the whole, they are behaving very liberally. In most cases where they have not subscribed they have either kept their mills open for two or three days a week or, have given wages and food to their workmen to keep them off the rates. This, of course, can only be done by those who have capital, and the great distress is where mills have been recently erected in the villages up towards Yorkshire on borrowed capital, and hands attracted there by the work offered who are now quite destitute. The masters having to pay interest are nearly as badly off as their men.

He also stated that Preston would soon be paying a rate of six shillings in the pound. Mr. E. Baines, M.P., delivered a statistical speech, showing that a rate of over nine shillings in the pound would be required to feed the sufferers of the afflicted districts [He might have added that this would mean a rate of twenty shillings in the pound on the solvent rate-payers]. £4000 was subscribed before the meeting broke up.

The Earl of Derby, Chancellor of the Oxford University, has addressed the following letter to the Vice-Chancellor:—

Dear Mr. Vice-Chancellor,—I am very glad to learn that the University of Oxford, as a body, is about to contribute to the relief of the fearful distress which prevails, and is weekly increasing, in the cotton districts; and that the aid to be granted, as I hope, by Convocation, will be supplemented by contributions from individual members of the University. In answer to your inquiries as to the extent of the distress, I have desired our secretary in Manchester to send you the latest information that we possess, which I hope he will have done. There is also a weekly report made to us by Mr. Farnell, the Poor Law Commissioner attached to our Committee by the Government, which contains the clearest summary of the state of pauperism; this is published in the Times of Tuesday in each week; and you will, therefore, by the time the Convocation meets, be in possession of later dates than I can now give you. I shall be greatly surprised if the next week does not exhibit a very large increase of pauperism. In the last two weeks the numbers have increased above 17,000; and we expect a further addition of 10,000 or 12,000 next week. The totals in twenty-four unions, as you will see, are now 186,000, against 43,000 last year; and we fear they may reach 250,000 before Christmas. And it is to be observed that this represents those only who are recipients of parochial relief, and is exclusive of a very large number who, after parting with the earnings of years in the struggle to maintain their independence, are still kept off the rate-books by the receipt of private charity, reluctantly received, to raise their means just above starvation point. Of the number of these persons I can give you no estimate, nor of the amount which is contributed locally for their relief. Their case is the special object of the "Bridgewater House Fund," which contributes at the rate of £8000 a month, being a portion of £25,000 a month which the Manchester Committee will be able to expend for four or five months now with their present means. All the funds, however, at present raised, including that which is liberally dispensed by the Lord Mayor's Committee in London, fall very short of the exigency of the case, and the vast numbers who are now dependent on one species or another of charity do not receive, and cannot receive more than 1s. 6d. weekly for the maintenance of each individual. You are at liberty to make any use of this letter that you think may be serviceable to the object you have in view. The statements in it are all, as you will find corroborated by public and official documents, and I feel that they represent a state of things, especially bearing in mind the admirable conduct of the population under sufferings arising from causes wholly beyond their own control, which cannot fail to command the sympathy, and, I hope, call forth a liberal response, both from the University as a body and its members in their individual capacity.

I am, dear Mr. Vice-Chancellor, yours faithfully,

DERBY.

The Rev. the Vice-Chancellor.

Mr. Disraeli has found an opportunity of uttering his views on the present and the future of the Established Church, at a meeting in aid of the Society for the Augmentation of Small Benefices in the Diocese of Oxford. He dwelt on the fact that the clergy—even the beneficed clergy—are as a body poor, because the Church has been despoiled. He noted the bitter and concerted attacks made on her by the Dissenters; and pointed out that the demand for her separation from the State virtually involved a demand for the total confiscation of her property. He admitted, what the late Primate had asserted, that the nation had outgrown the Church; there were millions who were not Churchmen, but who were not Dissenters either, and whom the Church might yet reclaim. In reclaiming them, she would vindicate her title to nationality; to do so, she must educate the people, she must enlarge her means of action, her clerical machinery, and she must admit a larger development of the lay element in all departments not purely spiritual.

Mr. G. W. Bentinck, M.P. for West Norfolk, has addressed his constituents at King's Lynn upon American affairs. He denounced slavery; but declared that slavery had nothing to do with the quarrel. The North were in favour of slavery as long as they could make profit out of it; now, by the emancipation edict they showed themselves disposed to make political capital out of it, wholly regardless of the consequences of their act, and of the common feelings of humanity. The South was fighting for independence—the North, not for empire but for dollars.

Why is it (he said) that wherever one goes in all parts of England one always finds—thoroughly as I believe that the institution of slavery is detested in this country—every man sympathizing strongly with the Southerners, and wishing them all success? We do so for these reasons—First, they have fought—to do them justice—with a degree of gallantry almost unexampled, under circumstances of the utmost difficulty, under every description of privation; they have fought like heroes for their homes, their wives, and their children. That alone is enough to enlist the sympathies of Englishmen, and I trust in God the time will never come when it will not enlist their sympathies. But there is a still stronger feeling. The turn of events has resolved into this—Englishmen love liberty, and the Southerner is fighting, not only for his life, but for that which is dearer than life, his liberty. He is fighting for his home, for his liberty; he is fighting against one of the most grinding, one of the most galling, one of the most irritating attempts to establish tyrannical Government that ever disgraced the history of the world.

He trusted that the events of this war would silence the eulogists of American institutions, and concluded as follows:—

What is to be done? I have ventured to think that there is but one rational, one just, one beneficial course for this country to pursue, and that is at once to recognize publicly and officially the independence of the Southern States. I am not speaking now under the impression of the events of the moment, because, however unimportant the fact may be (and I do not ask you to lay any stress upon that), I ventured to urge in the House of Commons the opinion which I am now venturing to put before you. I urged it to the best of my ability, and, like many other good intentions, it failed in its effect, and produced no result whatever. But I then held, as I now hold the opinion that the attempts of the North to reconquer the South must be futile and hopeless; and all I ask you to consider is this, whether, if I was justified in holding that opinion, which I held and expressed in March last, the present position of affairs in the Northern States does not at least confirm that opinion tenfold? It appears now to be perfectly hopeless that the North should ever conquer the South. There is no prospect of a termination of this horrible sacrifice of human life except by the recognition of the Southern States by this country and by France; and, therefore, upon that ground alone I venture to urge it. The only argument I have ever heard against it is this:—We are told by learned men that it would be an outrage upon what they are pleased to term international law. That is a subject much too abstruse to enter upon. I do not understand it; I am not equal to it; but all I know is this, that as far as international law is concerned there is ample precedent for the recognition at the present moment, and even at a much earlier period of the war, of the independence of the Southern States by the Government of this country. Recollect what we did with respect to Belgium, recollect what we did with respect to Greece. Those in themselves are precedents perfectly sufficient to satisfy, in my humble opinion, all those who choose to argue the question upon the point of international law. But there is a much more serious view of the question than that. What has been the effect of this war in America upon an immense portion of the population of this country? What is the amount of distress which is now being endured, and that with an amount of patience, forbearance, sound judgment, and good feeling, which I say reflects honour upon the people of this country generally—what is the amount of distress which is being endured, and which can be attributed solely to the effect of this war? Why it is incalculable. We are told day after day that the numbers of those who are suffering are increasing. There seems to be no limit to the extent of it. We are told that if cotton were once introduced that distress would cease. I say again, with precedent in our favour, with the existence of enormous distress in this country—and putting aside as I do as a mere piece of hypocrisy and absurdity the introduction of the element of slavery into the discussion, I say without reference to party, without reference to anything but what I believe to be indispensable to the welfare and character of this country, that we are bound at once to recognize the independence of the Southern States of America.

A person named Jewett, from the Colorado Territory, who has undertaken the task of reconciling the American belligerents and restoring the Union, has elicited the following characteristic letter from the Member for Birmingham:—

Sir,—From your published views but little good can come from an interview. If you are for union, and think it can be procured by conciliating the South, I confess I am amazed. They have made war upon you because they suspected that you would yield nothing more to them. Are you to yield more under compulsion of the war, or because you can neither conquer the South nor yet subside as an independent State without her? If you love slavery and wish to continue it, and if you think you can build up with honour a restored and united republic by humbling yourself to the South, I can only express my surprise at the dream. You may separate, or you may fight out this contest and win; but to leave the slave still a slave will expose you to the contempt of the civilized world. I applaud the proclamation of the President—as does every man in Europe who is not a foe to freedom or moved by a base hostility to the American republic, because it is a republic, and because it is powerful. When in town will see you.

I am, respectfully yours,
JOHN BRIGHT.

Mr. Bright happens to be wholly ignorant of American history, or he would know that the North never yielded anything to the South. Every "compromise" was a concession by the South of some part of its strict constitutional rights to secure the remainder. The Fugitive Slave Law was merely a formal and effective re-enactment of a clause in the Constitution, without which the Union never could have been established; the Dred Scott case only the decision of the Supreme Court, that Congress could not deprive any State, or class of States, of its equal rights in the common territory. Nor did the South make war on the North; she merely defended her own soil against Northern invasion. Secession accomplished, the Confederate States sent Commissioners to Washington to negotiate a peaceable separation. The Government pledged itself that no hostile movement should be made without notice given to these Commissioners. A fleet was secretly prepared at New York; it sailed with sealed orders; and when it ought to have reached its destination notice was given that the President intended to reinforce Fort Sumter. The hand of Heaven defeated the infamous stratagem. A storm delayed the fleet; Charleston received warning in time; and when the enemy reached the harbour, the United States' flag had disappeared from Fort Sumter. Thus the war was begun by the North, and begun by an act of nefarious treachery. Mr. Bright's approval of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation surprises no one; we doubt not that he also warmly admires that of General Butler. His denunciation of all who differ with him as foes to freedom is in his usual style, as meaningless and invariable as the stereotyped epithets of his example, O'Connell, who thought to crush his adversaries by denouncing them as "base, bloody, and brutal." Every organ of a considerable party, nearly every man and newspaper that does not belong to the narrow and despised school of Messrs. Bright and Cobden, has pronounced the edicts both of Lincoln and of Butler to be "infamous." It is well known that Mr. Bright has no conception of what Englishmen generally call freedom. When he speaks of liberty he means equality; and his beautiful ideal of government is the absence of an aristocracy. A despotism based on universal suffrage, reducing all to an equal servitude, seems to realize his idea of liberty—and the Northern States are still in his eyes the one free country of the world. He means what he says, therefore, when he says that all who condemn the emancipation ukase are foes to freedom; but then the category of foes to freedom embraces every educated and nearly every uneducated Englishman.

EUROPE.

ITALY.—A consultation has been held on Garibaldi's case, and the doctors have come to the conclusion that the ball is still in the wound, but that it will be possible to extract it. Their report of the General's health is on the whole a favourable one.

Everything else is in statu quo. The French are not going to quit Rome; brigandage is not suppressed; Parliament has not met; and the Rattazzi Ministry has not resigned. The French have, however, arrested a few banditti in the Roman States. It is much to be wished that they should persevere in this laudable practice; and if they would hang or shoot these gentry as soon as they arrest them, it would be better still.

We give the following exactly as it is given by the daily papers, without pretending to explain it:—

Turin, November 3, evening.

The Discussion of to-day says:—On the 1st inst. an encounter took place on the right bank of the Po, upon the Austrian frontier, between a body of Italian Carabiniere and some Austrian soldiers. The Italians fired upon the Austrians, and after a few shots the two parties engaged in a hand-to-hand contest, without regarding the boundaries. The Austrian armed Customs' guards were repulsed from Italian territory. The Austrians were finally compelled to take to flight.

GREECE.—The ex-King has arrived at Munich. A few details relative to the revolution have reached us. It appears that the insurrection was preconcerted for some time beforehand; that no resistance was made, and no mischief done; that Otho, by the advice of the Foreign Ministers, resigned himself to his fate, and allowed the Provisional Government to take his place without a struggle. They have issued a proclamation accusing Otho of "trampling under foot the respect due to the laws of the State, and the conscience of the citizens," declaring his deposition and the downfall of the Regency of the Queen (provided by law in the event of the death or absence of the King); promising to fulfil the national obligations towards the protecting Powers, to keep the peace towards other States, and to resign their authority into the hands of the national assembly on its meeting. The ex-King has also issued a manifesto, saying that he has deemed it best to leave Greece "for the moment," and invoking upon her the Divine blessing. At least, he has himself now conferred upon herself the only benefit she ever received at his hands. The one beneficent act of his reign is his abdication.

CHINA.—There has been a Mahomedan insurrection in the Province of Shensi, in the north of the Celestial Empire, which appears to have been very successful, and to have assumed most formidable proportions. A conspiracy, supposed to be connected with the Taeping rebellion, has been detected and frustrated at Canton. We have no details; and neither movement is at present intelligible.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, November 5.

Our last report left the market dull and lifeless, with a drooping tendency. On Thursday, with sales of 2000 bales, lower prices were accepted. Middling Orleans was done at 22½, and Fair Dhollerahs at 15d. On Friday the great decline in American and Egyptian cotton reaching in some cases 8d. to 10d., induced speculation, and a good business was done at 1d. advance on the depressed sales of the previous day for longstaples; the sales reached 4000 bales, and of these 2000 were to the trade. The week's returns likewise showed the spinners had taken two-thirds of the total sales, so that there seemed grounds for expecting a larger and healthier demand from the trade than for weeks past.

On Saturday the market was very strong, at a further general advance; the sales reached 7000 bales, and of these 3000 were taken by the trade.

On Monday we again opened very strong, with a large attendance of spinners; and as the day advanced, the market became almost excited, the sales summing up 10,000—4000 to the trade; and prices closed at 16½ for Fair Dhollerahs, and 25 for Middling Orleans, showing an advance of a full 1d. in Sarat, and 2d. to 3d. in longstaples, from the depressed sales of Thursday.

On Tuesday the market was steady, with sales of 5000 bales.

The report from Manchester was looked forward to with interest, as it was apparent that the immediate future of our market would be regulated by the nature of the response there to our advance. The state of the market there yesterday was far from satisfactory; though firmer in tone, no general advance was obtainable, and the business was only to a limited extent. Our upward movement, accordingly, has been checked; spinners have withdrawn again from the market, and a dull, stagnant tone prevails. The sales only reach 1500 bales, with a little easing-off in the prices; the following quotations may be given:—21½ for Middling Orleans, 17½ for Fair Broach, 16½ for Fair Omrawuttie, and 15 for Fair Dhollerah.

It seemed, at the close of last week, that the trade were inclined to buy pretty freely, and on the basis of 15d. for Fair Dhollerahs. It is probable that a good and increasing trade demand would have set in, but as prices were forced up whenever they entered the market, they have been obliged again to stand aloof, and will likely do so unless they can obtain a considerable advance in Manchester until prices here have again reached the lowest point recently touched.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday November 4.

Since Thursday last, the tone of our market has changed for the better, and altogether there has been a much more cheerful feeling displayed than has been experienced during the two previous months.

The heavy arrivals of cotton at Liverpool during the past few weeks, and the small quantity taken by the trade, has had the effect of bringing the prices down to a moderately low figure, so much so, in fact, that some of our spinners could see their way to producing certain yarns without loss, and left here with the intention of putting a portion of their spindles in work; but the sudden rise in the price of cotton since then has been so great, that they have been deterred from carrying their intentions into effect. As Liverpool market so much depends, at the present time, upon the Manchester market for estimates, it is not to be expected that a rise of from 2d. to 3d. per lb. in the course of two or three days will be readily resorted to by buyers here.

On Friday, there was some trade inquiry for yarns suitable for the home trade, especially 32's and 40's twist cops, for which an advance of ½d. per lb. on Tuesday's quotations were realised. Printing cloths were also in moderate request.

To-day our market opened very firm, and a moderate business has been done in cloth and yarn, especially the latter. Yarns suitable for the home trade, from 32's to 50's, have sold at an advance of 1d. to 1½d. per lb., and 60's twist cops at 2d. per lb. upon Tuesday's rates. There have also been some inquiries for 15's to 21's water in bundles for which an extra 11 per lb. has been obtained, and the same can be said of 40's, 50's, and 60's double.

Seven lb. and 8 lb. India shirtings are 3d. per piece higher; 35 in. 17 by 17 printers are much looked after, but there is a difference of 6d. per piece between buyer and seller. Madapolams longcloths and T cloths are very firm in price, but there is not much doing in them.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

The Mobile Tribune says that large supplies for the army have been made in and shipped from Atlanta within a short time. The following is a part of them:—30,000 garments to General Tilghman, 5000 to the army of Western Virginia, 7000 to the army of Arkansas, 3000 to Texas Rangers, and 17,000 to Bragg's army.

In reference to the quantity of land in the South respectively under cotton and general cultivation, the tax book of Stewart county, Georgia, shows—that General Tombs has in the ground 560 acres of cotton and 800 of corn. John Fontaine, a wealthy planter of the same county, has in the field 894 acres of cotton, 1,285 of corn and 450 of smaller grains.

The Southern papers state that the 3rd Alabama Regiment was the first to put foot on the soil of Maryland.

NASHVILLE.

The following interesting letter is taken from the correspondence of the Montreal Commercial Advertiser:—

If you have never lived in a beleaguered town, it may probably interest you to learn something of the condition of the inhabitants of this city at the present moment. I will, accordingly, furnish you with a few items culled partly from observation and partly from experience. We are at present under Federal rule. There are from 10 to 13,000 Federal soldiers domiciled in the city or encamped within its limits. At least 6000 of these are in hospitals or convalescent camps, leaving about 6000 or 7000 effective fighting men for the defence of the city. But when I say the "city" pray do not confound the urbs with the civitas, the city with the citizens, for the protection which the latter receive from the Federal army is very much akin to that which the wolf vouchsafes to the lamb. The condition of this army has for some weeks past been of a very unpleasant character. This you will readily understand when, bearing in mind how in the affections of a Yankee soldier pay and rations take precedence even of patriotism itself, I state that for five or six weeks past the prospect of his getting much either of the one or the other has been constantly diminishing, becoming "small by degrees and beautifully less." All communication with the North has been so effectually cut off that even the paymaster of the forces has to confess to the efficiency of the blockade which the "rebels" have established. So complete is the isolation to which this band of heroes has been subjected, that they are compelled to do business entirely on their own hook. His Excellency President Lincoln and the chiefs of the War Department no longer control the railroad and the telegraph lines, and have consequently no means of conveying their behests to this helotry. In like manner they are prevented from sending them supplies, till at last they have had to be put on quarter rations. There is, indeed, in the immediate neighbourhood everything necessary for the sustenance of man and beast; but the Yankees can't get it. Squads of Confederate cavalry have to be encountered whenever they make the attempt, and in whatever direction. So disastrous has been their experience in this way that now whenever they venture on a foraging expedition they take out with them a considerable cavalry force, 4 or 5 pieces of artillery and about 1500 infantry. With this force they have on two or three recent occasions succeeded in bringing in from 150 to 200 loaded wagons. But they are likely to be quickly blocked out at this game. Several misadventures have befallen them, showing that with all the appliances of men and artillery at their command this is a hazardous enterprise. All their wagons and a large part of their force have again and again been captured. Yesterday a good part of a cavalry force detailed on this kind of service was taken by the "rebels." The Federal lines do not now extend more than three miles in any direction from the city. Farmers and market gardeners living beyond that line are now averse to come to town in consequence of the annoyances and delays to which they are subjected before they can get out again. They must have a "pass" in order to return, and before they can get this they have to be catagorised touching their loyalty, and—unless they have the good fortune to be aliens—to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States. Rather than submit to all this they stay at home resolved to garner up their stores for more propitious times. Too often, I regret to say, they express themselves somewhat profanely, and say they will see Lincoln and the United States Government—well, subjected to damages severe and irreparable, before they will take the oath of allegiance to sustain one or the other. This state of things, as you will understand places the citizens in a very disagreeable fix. Every article of consumption for food, except meat, flour, and corn meal—and Heaven be thanked that these are excepted—is run up to famine prices. This results naturally from the operation of the causes just referred to, necessarily restricting the supply to a point much below the demand. But besides the hardship thence ensuing there is another resulting from what seems to be a sort of tacit prohibition given by the military authorities to the soldiers, to buy the citizens under contribution for the supply of any food they experience in the quantity and quality of their daily rations. Accordingly the robbing of hen roosts and the slaughtering of cattle are things of daily, or rather nightly occurrence. If complaint be made at head quarters it is sure to be unavailing. But while the people thus suffer, they bear it willingly and even cheerfully, for this condition of things they see clearly results from the embarrassed and helpless condition to which the Federals are now reduced. At the same time the soldiery are almost maddened by the ignominy of their position. They eagerly seize on every opportunity for avenging themselves on those who have been the instruments of their humiliation. An instance of this occurred only a few days ago. Lieutenant-Colonel Bass, of the Confederate army, recently paid a visit to his family, who were staying with his father-in-law in their country, not more than five or six miles from Nashville. The fact came to the knowledge of the authorities here, probably through the malicious interference of some traitorous neighbours, and they sent a posse of men to arrest him. These arrived at the dwelling at early dawn before the family were up. They knocked at the door and Colonel Bass himself came down to let them in and enquire their business, having only his night dress and drawers on. The ruffians had no sooner learned that he was the party than one of them fired his piece at him, sending a bullet through his head and killing him instantly. This spirit of ferocity towards their enemies, moreover, is not redeemed by the considerate forbearance which they are accustomed to exercise towards their friends. It is true they have no provocation for those wanton cruelties with which they delight to visit men of Southern principles. But when they are in search of plunder they know no difference between friend and foe, in this respect resembling those marauding borderers of a former age—

"Who sought the beeves that made them broth,
In England and in Scotland both."

It is as clear as day that this state of things cannot long continue were it practicable by exhausting all the resources of the citizens, with the addition of which chance luck might bring them from the limited district of country to which they have access, to sustain themselves a few weeks longer, the case is very different as regards their horses and mules. There is not enough fodder in the city, exclusive of that belonging to the Government, to last them a single day. I am happy to believe, however, that a very few days will settle their fate. I think it is now put beyond question that Breckinridge's force is advancing with rapidity towards Nashville. There is good reason for believing that his advance guard is within fifteen miles of us, and that the bulk of his division is rendezvousing at Murfreesboro, a city only thirty miles distant, connected with us by rail. There is every indication that within less than a week there will have been a great battle fought in this city or immediate neighbourhood, and one more added to the brilliant victories already achieved by the Confederate arms; or what, perhaps, is more probable, that the Federals will, when the demand is made, surrender themselves unconditionally into the hands of the Confederates. I have no doubt, but the latter will be able to invest the city with an army of at least 50,000 men. For the Yankees to attempt to fight against such odds would be little short of madness. Their defeat would be inevitable, even granting what they claim, that their defences here give them advantages in fighting equal to an army of 10,000 men.

The entrance of a Confederate army into this city would be hailed by the people with the utmost enthusiasm. The tyranny under which they have been suffering for the last eight months is becoming to them intolerable. Free speech and a free press are things of the past. Everything connected with the Government whether general or local; Federal, state or municipal, all is moulded after the most approved despotic models. If two or three persons meet and converse, they speak in an under tone and look around to see whether any person is sufficiently near to overhear them. They are in constant dread of spies and informers, a class of persons whose services the Government not only avails themselves of, but liberally reward. Moreover, these creatures make use of the power they obtain to gratify their spleen, and vent their spite on individuals to whom they owe a grudge. Cases of this kind are occurring daily. Add to these things the stagnation of business, the scarcity and high price of provisions, our state of isolation from the outside world occasioned by the cessation of all postal communication whatever, and you will be at no loss to account for the impatience with which the people await the advance of the Confederate army into this city.

It is amusing to observe the expedients which are resorted to avoid the necessity of taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. As the taking of this oath is indispensable to the procuring a pass from the military authorities for permission even to cross the river to Edgefield, a suburban village where almost half our merchants reside, or to go to any point beyond the city limits, this is obviously a matter that comes home to almost every man's business and bosom. A large number of people who had never been suspected of being of foreign origin have very suddenly been transformed into Britishers. In other cases where this metamorphosis seemed scarcely practicable, the contumacious "rebel," or "rebel sympathizer," as the case may be, will borrow the Englishman's pass; and as the Yankee pickets don't know Smith from Jones, Brown, or Robinson, this expedient succeeds to admiration. I have known of instances where a man in this way has travelled over hundreds of miles of territory to which he could have obtained access in no other way.

I sent you a letter about three weeks ago, also one dated, I think, August 13, whether you have received them I suppose I shall have no means of knowing until the war is over, and a Royal mail steamer be running from Montreal to Baltimore or some other port in the Confederate States. I send this by a friend, who expects to make his way from this to Louisville driving his own horse and buggy the whole distance and then back.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, October 24.

The quotations for gold and exchange are still very variable; so much excitement prevails in Wall-street that values change every hour. The tendency for all articles is upward, while Government Securities, as they are called, remain stationary, for such they are, as they represent only pens, ink, and paper. Mr. Chase is ill and the Federal Treasury is idle; there is some hopes for the recovery of the former but not for the latter. The Federal Government is broke; it pays nobody just now, but the most pressing creditors.

Political affairs are very bright for the Democrats. Their successes in the Northern Border States will assist in the election of Seymour, the moral effect of which, coupled with the break down in finances, will, it is thought, bring hostilities to a close. The emancipation proclamation, having been received so coldly in Europe, has given quite a chill to Mr. Lincoln, and has set him shaking in his shoes. He will no longer be able to "put his foot down."

PARIS, November 4.

The Court has left St. Cloud for Compiègne, where their Majesties intend spending the remainder of the month. The political opinions of the guests are a subject of interest to us Parisians, who have nothing to do but watch the political weathercock and throw up straws to see which way the wind blows. The persons who are to share the hospitalities of Chantilly, are, on this occasion, enthusiastic supporters of the Pope, but nevertheless, it seems drawing inferences a little too fine to argue that it is all up with Italian unity because M. Heckeren or M. de la Guéronnière have been enjoying themselves shooting pheasants on the Imperial preserves.

On Thursday, the Emperor and Empress honoured with their presence, a banquet given by M. de Persigny at his chateau of Chambrande, a pleasant country residence, which he owes to the munificence of his Imperial master. The only remarkable feature at this symposium, in a political point of view, was the presence of Lord Malmesbury—it has given rise to a report that in the event of a change in the Government, the French Cabinet would agree much better with the next, than they do with the present occupant of the Foreign office.

Mr. Slidell had the honour of an interview with the Emperor at St. Cloud last Tuesday.

It is generally believed here that the relations between the English and French Cabinets are by no means on a satisfactory footing, and judging from appearances, that belief is founded on something more solid than mere rumour. It has been observed with surprise that during the last stay of Prince Napoleon in England, not a single member of the English Government thought fit to pay his respects to the Emperor's cousin. Had the visit of the Prince been incognito, one might understand Cabinet Ministers' ignoring his presence in London, but the Prince travelled under his own name—he dined officially at the French and Italian legations, and paid daily visits to the Exhibition. And yet not even Earl Granville once came near his Imperial Highness. What, ask people here, can be the meaning of this? It is impossible to account for it, as whatever may be the differences between England and France, no one supposes them to be such as to involve so complete a dereliction from the usages of common courtesy.

A certain impression has been caused here by the studied neglect of all the duties of hospitality in the case of Prince Napoleon, and you may be sure that whatever the feeling may be between two courts it has caused much dissatisfaction in high quarters here.

It is worthy of notice that on all the great questions of the day the French and English Governments seem to be totally at variance. On the question of Italy, it is well known that the two Cabinets entertain diametrically opposite views, and that they are engaged in an as yet unicable contests for influence in the peninsula, which sheds a tone of acerbity over all their relations. In the Mexican affair the French think, and not without reason, that they have not been fairly dealt with by England; and with regard to America, England seems to oppose as determined a non possumus as the Pope himself, to all the proposals of the French Emperor to join him in an attempt to put an end to the barren conflict between North and South. The Emperor has arrived at the conclusion that the Southern States have fully established their claim to be considered an independent nation, a conclusion which is that of all Englishmen, save perhaps two, or at the utmost, three members of the Cabinet. This entire absence of a good understanding is fraught with serious consequences for Europe. There are, however, symptoms in abundance, which lead one to suppose that early in the coming session a change will take place in the councils of the British Government, and then, I think, we may look forward to a recognition of the South by England and France combined, unless, indeed, the arrogance of the North forces England into a war, or Southern victories bring about total collapse of the Federal Government before that time.

The Constitutionnel to-day publishes an able article setting forth the atrocities perpetrated at New Orleans by the miscreant Butler, a name that shall be handed down to the execration with those of the blood-thirsty buffoons of the French Revolution:—

The reign of terror in France (says the writer, M. Craver) never carried to such a point the ingenuity of cruelty as the trade of espionnage. It did not inspire revolutionary fury with byzantine cowardice. At New Orleans, by degrees, under one form or another, proscription slowly fastens not upon declared enemies alone, but also upon persons that are merely compromised or suspected; the innocent, those who have emigrated, or who are merely absent, do not escape. Will it be credited? These rigorous measures are not sufficient to reassure General Butler, or appear to him too mild a punishment, and the citizens of New Orleans are not only individually subject to confiscation, hard labour, and judicial assassination, but they are, moreover, collectively and hourly threatened with a general massacre. The executioners are already designated; they are ready and at their post: there are 5000 slaves garrisoned at Toms Asylum, two miles below the city, and as many at Carolton, five miles above. The negroes are armed and drilled; care has been taken to excite their vindictive passions, and their most perverse instincts; they await from day to day the order which is to let them loose in the whites, and that New Orleans should not be in ignorance of the fate in store for it, General Butler instructs his papers to print and repeat that, "If the forces of the United States are compelled to abandon New Orleans, no living creature will be left there save the crocodile and the mosquito."

That is an unequivocal sentence of death. There is no mistake about it. The North will not abandon one particle of its pride, its hatred, or its ambition, and will carry out its threats. Thus New Orleans is in a state of agony whenever the news comes of any Confederate success. All who can succeed in eluding the vigilance of the police, and of the bands that surround the town, sacrifice their property and escape into exile. Those who are condemned to remain are prepared for the worst. They have but one hope—that the indignation of Europe will be roused by the narrative of their sufferings, and that she will avenge them one day.

Endeavour (writes a correspondent) to make our cry of anguish heard by civilized nations. Describe the servitude ignominy to which we are reduced, we who were once so proud of our freedom. If it be too late to protect and save us, call down upon our murderers the malediction of the universe; the curse of the present and future test upon them!

BERLIN, November 3.

It would be hazardous to foretell that the King and his Ministers are about to retrace the false steps of the last month, but symptoms are not wanting from which a good augury may be drawn. It is true that in his answers to the loyal deputation which fast and furious tread on each other's heels, the King continues to protest that he sees in the rejection of the Budget only the determination to thwart his patriotic intentions. He asks how the safety of the country can be secured when 180 battalions and 44 squadrons are deducted from the forces which he considers necessary for its defence. But on the other hand, I hear that every effort is being made to reduce the expenditure within the limits of the ordinary Budget, so that the Chambers, on their reassembling in January, will only be asked to provide for the extra outlay already incurred at the time of the prorogation. There are even appearances of yielding in regard to the length of military service, as the soldiers of the third year are receiving furloughs, which is, in fact, conceding the point in dispute regarding the army. In this way we may hope that a compromise may be effected, and the dignity of the Crown saved, while the rights of the nation are asserted. The Prussian people are so sincerely attached to the throne, and appreciate too well the blessing of an orderly Government, not to accept with enthusiasm the termination of a difference which is all in their favour. Meantime they remain on the defensive. A national fund has been organized to supply the deficits in the private budgets of the gentlemen whom the Executive was so hasty in punishing for their votes. Contributions are coming in from other States besides Prussia, so that they will not be even monetary losers by their disgrace, while they have gained by it the honours of an easy martyrdom, and the popular sympathy which attends it. Dr. Oppermann, the dismissed Advocate-General, is invited to become second Burgo-master of Dantzig, and there was a report generally current yesterday that Herr Borkum-Dolffs, instead of an obscure exile in Gumbinnen, would only leave Gumbinnen to be elected Burgo-master of Cologne. This manifestation of public opinion has had its effect on the Government, and we hear of no further persecution of the office-holders who voted against the Budget.

Germany, even more than England, is the country of associations or leagues. Here we have scientific leagues, and leagues juristical gymnastical, political, musical, economical, and whatever other epithets the dictionary of private and public life affords. The Feudal or Junker party has just established a new one here, in aid of the hapelid monarchy, under the appropriate designation of the People's League. At Frankfurt the Reform League has been inaugurated to represent the Gross-Deutsch theory of a perfect Confederation under Austrian patronage, as opposed to the National League with Prussian tendencies, which holds its sittings at Cologne. The two associations are based upon the recognition of the present unsatisfactory relations of the thirty-five States into which Germany is divided; and a few words will explain the necessity of the movement which both are intended to promote, although it would be more difficult to give any clear idea of the measures which they severally advocate. It is often easier to see an object than to distinguish the road which leads to it; and the members of these leagues are far from being united among themselves on more than the broad proposition that all is not as it should be. A German thinks for himself; he has, therefore, an individual opinion, and this tendency is unfavourable to party organization. He is also a conscientious thinker, and gives such fair weight to his adversary's reasons that he generally ends by having not only one but two opinions, and this is adverse to any effective action. I shall therefore content myself with stating the case as it is allowed on all hands, leaving events to determine the consequences it involves.

Germany, in its present condition, represents an idée Napoléonienne—that is to say, an idea of bygone times and an effete society, for Napoleon was the last great man of the Old World. When the conqueror deprived Francis II. of the title which alone remained as the symbol of the feudal agglomeration called the German or Holy Roman Empire, he declared the larger States independent, giving the Royal title to four of them. The smaller ones he formed into the Confederation of the Rhine, a loosely constituted body, intended not for German purposes, but as a sort of earth-work to cover the eastern frontier of France. He had buried, not killed the old empire, which was dead and corrupt long before his time, and on his fall it was not even attempted to resuscitate it. But while the sovereigns would have been well pleased to leave things as they were, German patriotism demanded some guarantee against the recurrence of times when Germans were armed against each other at the bidding of a stranger, and to satisfy this desire by a fancied reconstruction of a common Fatherland, the Confederacy was reconstituted on an extended scale, including all the countries and provinces which had formed parts of the empire. The ineffectiveness of this clumsy contrivance—an embarrassment to all, a defence to none, and at best an instrument of tyranny to the subjects of the smaller States—soon made itself felt. The events of 1848 aroused in Germany the spirit which had led to victory in '13, and the Diet at once sunk into insignificance before the unanimous outcry of the people. A national Parliament, with a directing Executive took its place at Frankfurt, and the fears of the princes, threatened by their own subjects in their capitals, gave it legitimacy and authority. But this short-lived attempt at unity fell before the traditional hesitations of the Brandenburg, "who would rather hold the exar and basin at the coronation than be crowned himself without the election of his peers"; and the speculative dualism of the German mind. Again, in 1859, these aspirations after unity became predominant, favoured as they were by the war in Italy, the Regency in Prussia, and the humiliation of Austria. A war with France seemed imminent, and on reviewing their forces, the blindest admirers of the status quo were forced to recognize their inadequacy to cope with such a foe. The Peace of Villafranca alone saved Germany from the disasters of defeat. The Diet had had time to prove its inefficiency in the hour of danger; and the military organization of the Federal army, without a common leader or a common discipline, was equally found wanting. All parties joined in the cry for reform. The Nationalverein, or National League, was the first in the field; but the immediate danger had already passed, and instead of including Germans of all parties, it was joined only by one class of politicians. These advocate the unification of the army, the establishment of a Reichsrath, or national representation, with an Executive headed by Prussia, to which Power the command of the army and the direction of the foreign policy of the country should be confided. In such a Constitution, Austria would be reduced to an inferior rank, as its German provinces form the smallest part of the Empire. This was, therefore, equivalent to the exclusion of Austria from the German Empire, and hence the nick-name of Klein Deutschland, or Little Germany.

Whatever may be the final results of its agitation, the National League deserves credit for preventing the public opinion of Germany from again sinking into indifference to the Constitution of the Confederation. The Feudal party, whose still existing privileges it speedily attacked, but who cannot deny the necessity for some change, endeavours to turn the movement to its own advantage by a counter agitation, in which they are joined by several of the Liberals of Southern Germany, to whom Prussian selfishness is odious. In furtherance of this, Austria presented to the Diet last year, a plan of Federal reform, including a national representation, composed of members elected by the Chamber of each State. This is called Gross Deutschland, and is represented by the Reform League, which has just held its first meeting at Frankfurt. Its members found it difficult to agree on matters of detail, and contented themselves with taking as their programme, the integrity of Germany, and opposition to all proposals which should exclude any portion of the race.

While in Prussia the King still speaks of the machinations of the majority of the Lower House, we hear from Cassel of the opening of the Chambers with a speech which is greatly to the credit of the Elector and his advisers. The Hessian difficulty had for ten years kept Germany in constant agitation, and not long ago threatened to be the spark which would set it on fire. An ultra-liberal modification of the Constitution of 1831 had been forced upon the Elector in 1848, and this, when the period of reaction came round, was abolished by the reassembled Diet, and the forces of Austria and Prussia. Since then the Elector has been at feud with his subjects, who refused to accept the ultra-conservative Constitution which he bestowed upon them. Each time that he has called his new Chambers together, they have protested against the illegality of their own elections, and have been dissolved. Unvoted taxes were levied by military force, the judges who pronounced them illegal were exiled or imprisoned, and the Diet received yearly appeals against the Sovereign. The Elector was obstinate, but so also were his people. Again and again the Diet interfered with recommendations, until at last, multiplying its previous acts, it this year enjoined upon the Elector to restore the Constitution of 1831, with some modifications to bring it into harmony with the Federal laws. In case of refusal on his part, the military execution of the decision was entrusted to Prussia, which showed itself eager to interfere, and at once assembled troops on the frontier. At the same time the King sent a warning letter to the Elector, treating of the sacredness of popular Constitutions, but his messenger was ill-received, and the letter irreverently thrown unopened on the table. The Elector, however, yielded, and if he did so with a bad grace—for he also has his version of God and Fatherland—he has accepted the consequences frankly, and in the Chamber elected by the old law, he has declared that so soon as the electoral law, in conformity with the Constitution of 1831, has been voted, as required by his people, he will dismiss them for re-election. Having fewer troops at his disposal than His Majesty of Prussia, His Royal Highness has abstained from the very obvious Tu quoque which present circumstances must have suggested to him.

I have little gossip to send you. The merrier of the Old Saints are still held in some sort of honour here, and as to-day is the feast of St. Hubert, patron of sportsmen, the King has a grand hunting party, with red coats and white ties, at Grunenwald, to be followed by others during the remainder of the week at another royal chateau. Count Bernstorff's nomination as Ambassador in London, is only remarkable as being the first resident Ambassador named by Prussia in later times. For many years Russia and Prussia have only been represented abroad by Ministers. The papers report that the Queen of Naples is in very delicate health, and give this as the reason for her refusal to accompany Cardinal Grassellini, who has returned to Rome alone. It is added that she has consented to join her husband in the spring. A judgment of the Upper Tribunal is worth mentioning as a specimen of the pretensions of the Feudal party in Prussia in the second half of the nineteenth century. In 1848, a Count S— married the daughter of a sub-officer. The legitimacy of her son was called in question as being the offspring of a mesalliance. The Kammer-gericht before which the case came in the first instance, decided in favour of the validity of the marriage, on the ground of a rescript of 1746, by which sub-officers were ranked with the higher middle class, or, as the French would say (for I can express so foreign an idea only in a foreign language), with the bonne roture. On appeal, the higher tribunal at once rejected the grounds of this decision, on which the son pleaded that his mother was not only the daughter of a sub-officer, but also a ballet dancer, and that as such having danced petits sautés, she was an artist, and therefore of bonne roture. The appellant rejoined by a prayer that the Court would inquire whether her manners were those of the station alleged, and the Court has directed information to be taken as to whether she was really a good enough dancer to be the mother of a count, and whether she behaved herself as such. The Marriage Bill of 1860, rejected by the Upper House, would have prevented this question, as it did away with distinctions of birth as causes of nullity. The King exerted all his influence to get it passed, but the defenders of the Crown only respect it so long as what they think their own interests are served by it.

HAVANNAH, October 6.

With this letter you will receive a file of Southern papers to the 29th ult. The Confederate army has achieved victory after victory in such rapid succession, and so momentous in their effect upon the great issue of national existence, North or South, as the Northerners would have it, for they at one time assumed to introduce their principle of "irrepressible conflict" into the result of the war; but now stand amazed, each asking his neighbour, "Upon what portion of our devoted army will 'Stonewall' Jackson next hurl his victorious columns? Will Lee invade Pennsylvania? Will General Smith penetrate the State of Ohio? Will Bragg go into Indiana? Will the North-West, disgusted at the management of the war, secede and leave us to pay or repudiate our mammoth debt? Shall we accept a military dictator, or force Mr. Lincoln to acknowledge the independence of the South?" While the mass of the people are panic-stricken, a few army contractors and paid journals continue to support the war, and have the mendacity even to claim a victory at Sharpsburg. General Lee admits this to have been "a severe engagement," and writes to President Davis, "The shock of battle was tremendous, and damaged the Federals more than any other engagement of the war. He further says, "Our army encamped upon the battle-field on the second night, and was ready to renew the fight in the morning, but the enemy had retired." He estimates his own loss in killed, wounded, and missing, at 5000, and that of the enemy at 20,000. Why he returned to Virginia is not stated; but as he estimates the number of arms captured at Harper's Ferry, in the fight between Jackson and Burnside, and the battles in Maryland, as sufficient to equip an army of 50,000 men, together with large quantities of munitions of war and commissary stores, we are naturally led to the conclusion that he could not march or fight encumbered with so much valuable property, and returned to place it in security.

The news from the South West is equally important and gratifying. Kentucky was thoroughly aroused; 23,000 volunteers from the "dark and bloody ground" had already enrolled themselves in the Confederate army, and others were reporting themselves faster than our generals could organize them into companies and regiments. The ladies hailed our victorious army as their especial deliverers from Yankee insult and oppression, and strewed their path with flowers. Old Kentucky! the land of brave men and beautiful women, has wheeled into the line of the Confederacy, and her war cry will be heard above the roar and din of battle. Missouri literally swarms with Partisan Rangers ready to co-operate with General Price in redeeming this younger sister from Northern thralldom. The Confederacy, after eighteen months' struggle with her vain-glorious invaders, under disadvantages which would have appalled any nation not sustained by manly patriotism and a holy cause, is now stronger in national resources and effective materials of war than her enemy. Mr. Randolph, our Secretary at War, on August 12, reported to Congress as follows:—

Since the adjournment of Congress, our stock of arms has been largely increased by importation and capture. Our small arms alone have increased from these sources no less than 80,000. Our supply of ammunition has also been increased by importation and manufacture; and, as already stated, we may expect at no distant day that the active and methodical operations of the Nitre Corps will supply our demand, and make us independent of foreign importation.

The operations of the army since that date, without taking into the account, large importations, has added to the stock of small arms, certainly 60,000 more, to say nothing of even 100 pieces of artillery captured with them; while the Governor of Pennsylvania calls imploringly for volunteers to defend Philadelphia, and asks them to bring their short guns and family rifles, as the Government has no arms to give them. And yet, European Governments still hesitate to acknowledge the independence of the Confederate States. Why? It is whispered that Lord Lyons, as the price of the Northern surrender of their principle of the right of visitation and search, of their vessels upon the high seas, promised Mr. Seward that England would never interfere in the American question to the prejudice of the Federal Government. If this pledge was made (I merely give it as a rumour), it is not binding on the English Government or people; yet it may be secretly operating to our great injury. A brief review of the history of the slave trade, will show the monstrous injustice of giving to the Federals an advantage over the Confederate Government for a concession which the Northerners never would have made in prosperity and which never could have been forced from the Confederates in adversity, though their hearty co-operation in the suppression of the slave trade is fully guaranteed by their past history.

The African slave-trade was first prohibited by South Carolina in 1786, acting in her capacity as a State sovereignty; in the following year, on the motion of the delegates from Virginia, in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, a clause was inserted, after modification, authorizing Congress to prohibit the importation of African Negroes into the United States after the year 1808. This provision was resisted by Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and other New England States, and history tells us that, that Constitution would have been defeated by New England opposition, had not Virginia yielded her consent to an extension of the time at which the African slave trade was to be prohibited—the year 1808 being a compromise between the Southern opponents of the African slave trade, and its Northern advocates. Texas, now one of the Confederate States, was originally settled by emigration from the Southern States, and in 1840, soon after the recognition of her independence as a republic, she entered into a treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade, and for that purpose yielded the "right of search," and in the Constitution adopted by the Confederate States, the African slave trade is for ever prohibited. Would the Northerners have entered into the Seward-Lyons treaty but for the existence of this war? I answer, emphatically, No! In 1858 the Yankee press, without exception, thundered forth their threats and maledictions against England, because of the visitation by her cruisers of American ships on the coast of Cuba, suspected as slavers, and President Buchanan, as late as 1860, referring to this subject, in his annual Message to Congress, says,—"The American people hailed with general acclaim the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, to our naval force in the Gulf of Mexico, to protect all vessels of the United States, on the high seas, from search or detention by the vessels of war of any other nation." Who has kept alive the African slave trade? The reports of your venerable, able, and faithful Consul-General for Cuba, on file in the Foreign Office at London, will doubtless inform you that Northern capital, Northern ships, and Northern seamen are responsible for the continuance of the traffic; and that the people of the Southern States of America have been faithful to their constitutional obligations and treaty stipulations, while the Puritans of New England and of New York have united in this traffic.

A CONFEDERATE PRISONER'S EXPERIENCE IN ST. LOUIS.

From the Mobile Register.

Vicksburg, September 23, 1862.

In narrating what matters of public interest I may be supposed to have picked up until the 8th of September, by over nine weeks' confinement as a prisoner of war at St. Louis, I would state first that the daily newspapers were always obtainable at the Gratiot-street prison (late McDowell Medical College), except in two or three instances, where a more than usually brutal Dutch lieutenant of the guard blockaded them. Secondly, there was a daily influx of St. Louis citizens, charged with "disloyalty," and a frequent importation of citizens from the rural districts—mainly Missourians, with a sprinkling of Illinoisans, Iowans, Kentuckians, Arkansians, and Tennesseans. Since the unfortunate evacuation of Missouri by General Price and Governor Jackson, Missourians arrested outside of St. Louis have been, with scarcely any exception, considered hushwackers by Federal authority. This rule applies to all Arkansians (not sick), yet imprisoned within the jurisdiction of the Provost Marshal General of Missouri, whose authority, by the by, has recently been extended into portions of Iowa and Illinois. In the latter State this fresh violation of State rights created quite a fuss the other day—even its Governor, Yates, for a while, at least, refusing to deliver up some muskets claimed by the United States authority. But to return to the prisoners (not in hospital) yet remaining in aforesaid Provost District; deducting the very few bogus ones employed as spies, and some who vainly imagined that a neutrality could save them from arrest, the remainder are true Southern men—a number being as regularly enrolled Confederate soldiers as myself, yet their companies having, from one cause or another, been unable to join regimental organization, they are refused the privilege of exchange. I need not give the definition of "hushwackers" or "guerilla."

In July last the Military Governor of Missouri, Gamble, ordered out the entire militia of the State. This had the effect of obliging every able-bodied male between the ages of 18 and 45 who refused to join, (under penalty of property confiscated) to leave the State, hide in the bush, turn guerilla, or go to gaol. Lincoln's subsequent draft has not eased matters. Happening to be in St. Louis at the time, it needed no personal liberty about the town to observe the effects. Guerilla raids largely increased; such Southern leaders as Porter, Quantrel, Poindexter scouring the State, and greatly augmenting their forces through the militia draft. Although they had numerous skirmishes, the guerilla policy this time appears wisely to have been that of retiring gradually towards Arkansas, where they can reorganize according to the rules of military discipline, for it is evident that guerilla fighting should be looked upon as a means, not an evil. No language can describe the horrible condition of Missouri this past summer.

In St. Louis Federal police improve upon their Austrian brethren in Italy. Do charitable ladies open a fair, it is not enough that they do not display the supposed Confederate colors of red, white and red; they must show on their stalls the red and blue, or as in the case of Mrs. Coons, be given a choice between loathsome lodgings in Gratiot-street prison, or a ticket to the Southern lines, and the utter separation from husband and children. If a child be seen in public dressed in white with trimmings and scarlet socks, something blue about its head gear can alone save its parents a summons to the Provost Marshal. In short, for such trivial remissness, have several of the most respectable ladies of the city, been arrested and banished. The tenant also will frequently question his landlord's loyalty, and force the latter to dance attendance upon the Provost Marshal before rent can be collected. For some days the brother of General Joe Johnston, along with his wife, were confined in a prison ward adjoining mine. They were released as mysteriously as arrested. In instances where, after the citizen's arrest, a petition has been forwarded by his Union friends, said document, in official parlance invariably gets mislaid amongst the enormous accumulation of "you know" similar papers at the Provost's office, and official lacqueys have finally to be lickspittled and bribed into pressing a duplicate upon the great man's attention. According to city papers, in St. Louis country many wealthy planters have recently been assessed in a special tax from supposed Southern sympathy.

As to the treatment of prisoners in the Missouri Provost district, personally I can only give my St. Louis experience, never having been sent to Alton. Yet the statements I have gathered from my fellow-passengers (prisoners exchanged from the latter prison) generally corroborated one another. In quantity our food was sufficient, yet at St. Louis it was filthily served up to well prisoners. And just fancy seven hundred and fifty men gasping for air in the lower rooms of the Gratiot-street jail for an entire week? Its hospital being on the uppermost story receives some good air, while its diet and attendance are pretty good.

But the crowning abomination to every exchanged Confederate is the Western Dutch of the present day, as represented at least in the Federal uniform. In my previous Western travels Hans was a different animal. He seems now to bear no blood relation to German settlers in the cotton sections, or anybody in Fatherland. I saw at Shiloh how nobly Confederate Germans can fight, but these Western fellows have become completely metamorphosed through their Black Republican orators. Where once civil they are now insolent; where once humane, most cruel. I have seen no exception among them from the day I was taken prisoner after the Corinth evacuation. It seems to make no difference whether they have seen hard military service or not. In the Missouri district the authorities appear to prefer them for prison guards, as being less goodnatured than the most rabid native born Abolitionists. When not shooting out an offensive prisoner's brains, as in the recent case of one Morrow, at Alton (said to be a Memphis carpenter), they daily amuse themselves with such gambols as stabbing (a notoriously crazy but harmless Irishman once, in my presence) and knocking down aged decrepid men with the butts of their guns. Yet I try to be a reasonable rebel, expect and even desire some discipline in any prison.

However to all this there is occasionally a laughable feature. Long as I have been forced to make this letter, I cannot refrain from relating one recent affair: as the gunboat Essex, bound down, was approaching St. Louis, a Dutch clerk at a sawmill on the bank, in the fervency of patriotism, rushed to the safe, and untying a package marked "Flag Steamboat Von Phul," displayed to the Essex crew what he supposed to be the Stars and Stripes. Greatly to his own surprise and much more to the astonishment of workmen busier than he at the mill, a squad of armed gunboatmen came to arrest and convey them all to Gratiot-street prison. The clerk had unwittingly waved the Stars and Bars. His employer happened to be the owner of the aforesaid steamboat, and after the discontinuance of her trips South, owing to the blockade, this flag, which prudence had dictated to be displayed in Secesh waters, was packed up and deposited at the mill. Although they only remained two days imprisoned, how long they would have probably remained there but for being Dutch, may be perhaps judged by the preceding remarks.

THE SOUTH AND THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

(From the Morning Herald.)

It does not surprise us that one or two of our contemporaries, driven to their wits' ends for arguments, should accuse the South of wishing to reopen the slave trade. Politicians who regard history as a collection of old almanacks are naturally ignorant, not only of the past, but of the present; and if any of their readers are as ill-informed as themselves, writers of this school may possibly delude some simple persons into the belief that those who advocate the recognition of Southern independence are advocates, or at least, are not resolute opponents, of the revival of that infamous traffic. For our own part—and we have been throughout this struggle, the first to advise, and the most strenuous in urging the recognition of the Confederate States—we do not think it necessary to deny that we have any tenderness or toleration for the most loathsome of the crimes to which unscrupulous avarice or mistaken philanthropy ever contributed. Not being disciples of Mr. Cobden, or Mr. Gladstone, and never having preached the doctrine of free trade according to the Manchester school, we have no hesitation in declaring our intense abhorrence of free trade in human flesh, and our satisfaction at the inconsistency which gives us, on this topic, the support of so eminent a Free-trader as Mr. Bright. If we had not taken the trouble first to remember that the South could not reopen the African slave trade if she wished it ever so much, and, secondly, to ascertain that if she could do it she would not, we should hardly have been disposed to urge her claims upon the sympathy of Englishmen and the alliance of England. But we are a little surprised that the few educated and intelligent men who have adopted the Northern cause have been content to repeat without correction, qualification, or doubt, the palpable falsehoods on this subject which have been circulated by Northern Abolitionists. It is very difficult to understand how such a man as Mr. John Stuart Mill has contrived to live in ignorance that the statements on this subject to which he has given the sanction of his authority are wholly without foundation—utterly contrary to every fact in the past history of the Southern States, and at variance with every declaration of their statesmen, every indication afforded by their constitution, and every expression of the popular sentiment. He is above the vulgar error—which no man who ever read history can make—of confounding together slavery and the slave trade. Why did he, without evidence, assert that because the South unhappily cherishes the former, therefore she must wish to revive the latter? How did he contrive to remain ignorant, of the evidence which conclusively establishes the fact that the Southern Slave States abhor the slave trade, and always have abhorred it; that so far from desiring its revival, they have done all that can be done by any single generation to make its reopening utterly and for ever impossible? Mr. Mill may have avoided American history as too insignificant to be worth his study; but unless he has steadily eschewed all Southern and all neutral writings, he must have seen, since the war broke out, abundance of proof that the Confederates never were, and that the Northerners always have been, slave-traders; that the former have always denounced, the latter habitually carried on the trade; that the South has in no way defiled her conscience with the abomination; and that she has not the slightest intention ever, or under any circumstances, to allow the renewal of a system which she considered not less impolitic than inhuman.

"It is hard," a Southerner lately said to us, "that we, who are entirely innocent of it, should be for ever taunted with the slave trade by the two countries most guilty in regard thereto—by England, which grew rich by it, and forced it upon us; and by Massachusetts, which to the last upheld and carried it on."

We would remind our Americanising contemporaries that Great Britain not merely introduced slavery into her American possessions, but compelled them in their own despite to submit to a continual importation of negroes from Africa. Jamaica protested more than once; South Carolina resisted and protested up to the severance of her connection with the mother country, and up to 1804 prohibited the trade even under the Union. Between 1804 and 1808 she found herself compelled to permit it; but as soon as Congress was able to put an end to it, the several Southern States, with South Carolina at their head, passed State enactments to the same effect; and since that time not one hundred negroes have been landed at any Southern port. And yet the Palmetto State, above all, is taunted with a desire to reopen the traffic! The slave trade has flourished under the American flag; but the slavers have not sailed from Charleston and New Orleans, but from Boston and New York; they have been manned and commanded by Yankees; they have been owned by Northern merchants and fitted out with Northern money. The South has not even been their market; she has not even borne a passive part in their crime. Cuba was their market; the Stars and Stripes were their protection. And yet it is the establishment of Southern independence—the reduction of the slave-trading North to insignificance—that is to bring about a revival of the slave trade! But, again, the Southern people detest the slave trade. The planters know that it would reduce by two thirds the value of their property, degrade their favourite institution, brutalize Southern society, and render the negroes discontented and dangerous. The white labourers that it would depreciate enormously the value of their labour. The educated people of the South abhor it from interest, from humanity, from motives of social and political prudence; the uneducated detest it from prejudice, as a Northern practice, anti-pathetic to Southern manners and Southern feelings. To advocate it would be the ruin of any Southern politician, and there is no Southern newspaper which dare now undertake its defence. And, whereas the constitution of the United States merely gave to Congress power after twenty years to enact a prohibitory law, which might at any moment be repealed, and thus rendered its existence for twenty years, and makes its repeal always easy, the Confederate constitution abolishes it at once and for ever, by an express clause, which there would be great legal difficulty in repealing. And yet we are warned not to recognize the Confederacy for fear of reviving the slave trade! Can hypocrisy more gross and more extravagant be conceived?

But, it is asked, will the South bind herself by treaty never to reopen the slave trade? Will she accept, as binding on her, the treaties formerly concluded by the United States? We have no doubt that she will do all that we have a right to ask, and all that we need desire. She will not consent to put any stigma on her own domestic institutions. She will not submit to be treated as a Power peculiarly liable to suspicion of an offence of which she has hitherto been entirely innocent. But she will give us all reasonable guarantees that we should ask from a friendly country; she will cordially accede to our policy of making the slave-trade a crime against international law, and she will take such measures as will ensure the fulfilment of her engagements in loyalty and good faith. More than this we may not, less than this we could not, as a nation, demand. We want from the South no African squadron, no humiliating or inconvenient concession, but simply an effectual aid in putting down a traffic which is abhorrent to civilization. And as the Southern nation fully concur in our views of that traffic we shall have no difficulty in securing their honest concurrence in our policy with regard to its suppression.

A rich Northerner made an effort to escape the Lincoln draft by dressing himself as a woman, and with a child in his arms attempted to pass the bridge into Canada. He was arrested, and the offer of a bribe to the sentinel failed to procure his release.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS IN THE NORTH.

Philadelphia, October 21.

Sir,—Herewith I send you a leading article from the North American of this morning. It contains a pretty correct account of the financial condition of affairs in this country, but the views of the editor are not at all consistent with sound principles of economy, and show clearly that great degeneracy has taken place in the current of thought. While Mr. Chase is blamed for the issue of vast quantities of paper money, thereby causing the inflation, no one seems to think that there was no other course open to him. The public generally have not subscribed to over $70,000,000 of Government bonds, yet the entire indebtedness is bordering on $200,000,000. Speculators never have the power of running up prices, as is charged by the North American; they merely anticipate, by the exercise of mental talent, the rise that is going to take place.

The Democrats have carried the State ticket, and also secured about one-half of the Congressmen. They, too, have a majority in joint ballot in the Legislature, which enables them to return an United States' senator. Since the Presidential election, the Democrats have gained 70,000 votes in Pennsylvania, 60,000 in Ohio, and 50,000 in Indiana, besides great accessions in Iowa. There is no doubt whatever but that there is a large majority of persons in all the Federal States outside of New England that are entirely opposed to the policy of the Lincoln Administration, and that the Washington Government will, therefore, be unable to sustain itself much longer, now that the people have had an opportunity of expressing themselves through the ballot-box.

GIRARD.

THE CRISIS AND THE IMPORTERS.

Of all the humbugs by which the stock market has ever been deluded, that by which non-dividend paying "fancy" railway shares have been run up from 20 to 50 per cent. is the strangest and most unaccountable. Look, for example, at the subjoined statement, prepared by the financial editor of the New York World, and covering the time since April 7, when there were no legal tender Treasury notes in circulation:—

	Week ending April 12.	Sept. 18.	Oct. 18.
Erie	36½	38½	59½
Erie preferred	60½	70	86½
Cleveland and Toledo	45	54½	70½
Cleveland and Pittsburgh	17	24	39
Harlem	12	15½	23
Harlem preferred	30½	39	51½
Michigan Southern	22½	31	43
Michigan Southern guar'd	46	61½	82
Hudson River	36	50	67½
Cumberland preferred	—	—	14½
Illinois Central	61	61½	81
Galena	67½	70½	85½
Rock Island	54½	66½	82

While all these stocks have thus appreciated so enormously in price, United States' securities have remained stationary, and thereby are relatively depreciated. What reason is there sufficient to justify such a discrimination as this? If stocks which pay no dividends are so much more valuable, and goods of all kinds are also suddenly found out so much more, why are not the securities of the national Government, which represent the wealth and resources of the whole country, proportionately higher in price? Yet day after day, and week after week, and month after month, this contrast has stared everybody in the face. At one period, indeed, United States Treasury notes were worth 37 per cent. less than gold.

We warn the public of Philadelphia that this bubble has collapsed in New York, and that prices are coming down, in consequence of the speculators seeking to realize at the expense of the "outsiders." The World says:—

"This stock speculation is evidently a bubble of the flimsiest texture that has ever been blown up to delude and rob a credulous public, and its collapse is not far distant. The shrewd operators realized some weeks ago, and the prudent outside men sold during the last week, being content with the large profits of 20 to 50 per cent. realized by them on the prices paid a month ago. The market is now supported by weak brokers and street operators, and—we regret to have to state the fact—by some of our city bank Presidents and their friends."

These statements are confirmed by nearly all the well-informed journals of New York. So far as we can learn, our Philadelphia banking interests have not been engaged in this speculative movement, and our Stock Board yesterday set an example by striking off the stock list gold as an article to be bought and sold at the Board. This and other causes brought gold down to 127½. Last week it reached 137½ under a deliberate effort to push it to 140, in expectation of ultimately getting it to 150. Exchange of course kept ahead of gold all the time. The rate reached 153, and then fell to 143. Now, let any man of common sense imagine an importing merchant in New York or Philadelphia undertaking to do business with affairs in such a pickle as this. He cannot regulate his transactions at all. If he carries on his purchases and sales constantly at any thing like fixed rates with any one, tell us how he is to arrive at a conclusion whether he makes losses or gains.

In fact this fluctuation of rates is ruinous to commerce. The importers all complain of it as intolerable, and if it goes on it will be impossible for any one to conduct the business with any safety. It operates as a complete embargo on the importing trade, just at a time when the prosperity of the loyal States would have caused a flourishing commerce to revive, and poured a largely increased revenue into the coffers of the national Government. We have already shown how it has hindered the export of breadstuffs and produce; but the reader may rest assured that great as is the injury done in that way, it bears no comparison to the mischief inflicted on the importers and jobbers of foreign goods. Hallett's circular says:—

"Importers who have sold their goods at 10 per cent. profit have, in many instances, lost more than their profits in the rapid advance in foreign bills, by means of which their payments were made."

"The effect of the present enormous premium on such bills is undoubtedly to check importations."

Many persons imagine this condition of things to be exceedingly desirable. They think that if we did not import any foreign goods at all we should be better off, forgetting that there are great quantities of foreign goods which we do not and cannot expect to raise or make in the United States. We cannot conjure up silk factories and coffee and tea plantations, nor produce the drugs and spices, and the luxuries and comforts which the arts of civilization bring us from all parts of the world, by simply checking importations. Most of these articles must be imported, or we must do without them. We do not foster American industry by stopping the influx of these commodities. Moreover, if we do stop them, we stop the exportation of our own produce also; for the one stimulates the other. When we import largely we export largely to pay for the goods. But in the present state of affairs commerce of all legitimate kinds is thoroughly blockaded. Our Western supplies are interrupted because the West is stripped of currency to feed the insatiable maw of Eastern speculators, and our foreign supplies are stopped because of the enormous premium on gold and exchange.

The question, therefore, is, shall we suspend the legitimate business of the country in order to devote all our energies and capital to a wild and reckless movement, prompted by some crazy theory about gold? Shall we tie up our ships, and cease importing and exporting? Shall we leave the West to get along by itself and stop trading in its produce? Shall we ruin our merchants, and so throw out of employment all who have lived by the commerce of these great cities, in order that we may all engage in an unbridled speculation in gold? Let every business man ponder over this, for it is, without exaggeration an immediate issue to be met. It is not the Government which is imperilled, for that can save itself. But our trade is threatened, and all who live by it are interested in keeping down the fever.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1862.

Burning Ships; Belligerent and Neutral.

The exploits of the infant navy of the Confederate States have excited the admiration of the world, and the terror of their enemies. The North, with a navy ready to hand, with immense maritime resources, after spending millions on its dockyards and on jobs less profitable to the country than to the officials of the Navy Department, has not performed a single brilliant achievement on the element which it claims as its own. In quality, its navy is scarcely superior to its army; what either has accomplished has been done by mere force of numbers. We need not recall the feats of the Confederates in their own waters; the terrible onslaught of the Arkansas on the Federal flotilla before Vicksburg, or the consternation excited throughout the North by the short-lived Virginia. Valuable as were the services of those vessels, they did not accomplish half as much for the advantage of the South and the injury of the North as has been achieved by the three or four vessels which from time to time have made their appearance on the high seas—the crazy Sumter; the Nashville, a shell which one shot from a twelve-pounder might have sent to the bottom; the Oviato, and the Alabama. The latter craft has made a terrible impression on American commerce; one or two more such vessels might ruin the whole merchant marine of New York and Boston. It is not necessary to destroy any large proportion of the enemy's ships; it suffices thoroughly to frighten the underwriters. And this has been done. Insurance on American ships is very high; and English houses have notified to their correspondents that they will not accept bills drawn against goods shipped in Northern vessels, nor advance on bills of lading for such goods. The shipowners are frightened and furious; the New York Chamber of Commerce is terrified out of its wits, its logic, and its grammar. It has published a frantic protest against Captain Semmes, in what may, for aught we know, be good American, but certainly is not English of any sort. The Alabama is denounced as guilty of detestable outrages upon humanity, and of an atrocious violation of "neutral rights"; and Great Britain is threatened with the high displeasure of the Chamber and the condign vengeance of New York for allowing such a vessel to leave Liverpool unmolested, and to prey on the defenceless shipping of the Northern States. It would seem that the merchants of the Empire City imagined that the war was to be all on one side. Plundering Southern plantations, burning Southern towns, consigning Southern men and women to chains and hard labour, is a right and legitimate method of warfare; but seizing Northern merchandize, setting fire to Northern ships, and fettering Northern prisoners until they can be safely released and set on shore, are crimes against mankind, violations of the rules of civilized war, horrible, detestable, and unnatural villainies.

Now, we are ready to grant that the shipowners of New York have reason for complaint and indignation. The achievements of the Alabama are utterly disgraceful—to the Federal Government and the Federal Navy. That vessel ought long ago to have been in New York, a prize to Captain Wilkes, or some of the other heroes who are busying themselves with the pursuit of safer game; plundering neutral vessels in neutral waters, blockading the harbours of a friendly Power, and insulting with impunity the flag of Great Britain. It is scandalous that a navy like that which the United States now possess—a navy equal to that of any other third-rate Power—should be unable to protect their commerce against such depredators as Captain Semmes. But their inability, whether it arises from weakness, cowardice, or simple stupidity, should be visited on the shoulders of the Government at Washington. It affords no ground for abusing the dashing captain of the Alabama, or reviling the English Ministry. The Confederate cruiser has done nothing which she had not a perfect right to do; nothing, indeed, which it was not her clear and bounden duty to do. The ships of war of every belligerent country are bound to do their utmost to "capture, sink, burn, and destroy" the ships that bear the enemy's flag; and this is exactly what Captain Semmes has done. To make prizes of his captures, and carry them into a Southern port for condemnation, was impossible. Neutral ports are shut against him; if they were not, loud and furious would be the complaints of the North. What, then, can he do with the vessels he captures? He is not bound to waste powder and shot by firing at them till they sink. He chooses to burn them; and he has the fullest right to do so. We ourselves, even when absolute masters of the sea, never hesitated to burn a captured vessel which we could not remove with safety. The merchants of New York ought to know that the formalities of a Prize Court are not intended for the benefit of an enemy's ships. These are always and ipso facto at the mercy of the captor; their condemnation merely enables him to sell them and receive their price, instead of destroying or handing them over to his Government. If, indeed, it were true that Captain Semmes had deliberately waited till nightfall to destroy his captures, in order to attract other vessels to the spot by the glare of their conflagration, neutral countries might have some right to complain of his conduct. It is not right that an English ship, accidentally on fire, should lose the chance of aid she might enjoy from the humanity of an American vessel in her neighbourhood. If such an offence has been committed, we might indeed protest, as we protested against the destruction of Charleston Harbour; but the North, which perpetrated that monstrous outrage, would have no right whatever to complain. Until, however, this charge against the Alabama is established by the evidence of witnesses less thoroughly discredited, less notoriously untruthful, than the Northern newspapers, we shall decline to believe it.

What the New York Chamber means by a violation of "neutral rights," in the case of the Alabama, it is not very easy to understand. New York is not, though she once promised to be, neutral in the present war; and therefore she can have no complaint to prefer under that head. Is there a confusion in the minds of her merchants between rights and duties; and do they mean to charge Great Britain with a neglect of the obligations of neutrality? We suppose, from the very American paragraph in which they accuse her of "a change in sentiment transferring a friendly nation into a self-styled neutral Power," that this idea was in their mind; but we confess ourselves unable to comprehend what is that "offence against neutral rights" which is "aggravated" by the destruction of British as well as American property. With regard to the alleged infraction of neutrality by the building of the Alabama in a British port, we would observe, first, that the Americans fitted out, armed, and sent to Russia more than one vessel to be used against us in the war of 1854-56, and that they are therefore estopped from any complaint on this score; and, secondly, that it is difficult to see at what point the British Government could possibly have interfered. There was no proof that the Alabama (then the "290") was sold to the Confederate Government when she quitted Liverpool. She was not armed or ready for war. On what pretence could she have been stopped on her "trial trip"? Or ought we to have seized the cargo of the vessel which carried out to her her arms and equipment? We have never interfered with the shipment of arms to New York; we have therefore no right to prevent their shipment for a Confederate port, or for Confederate use. It is impossible to see any other course which was open to the British Government except that which they actually took, or to discover in their proceedings any violation of the obligations imposed by their neutral position.

There is not the shadow of a pretence for the allegation that Captain Semmes has violated any neutral rights. He has not knowingly destroyed any British property, even on board the enemy's ships; if he has done so unwittingly, England must demand reparation, and the Confederate States must accord it. We believe that the captain of the Alabama has acted with signal care and discretion in a very difficult position. A neutral vessel conveying contraband of war is liable to seizure and confiscation; but she must be condemned by a Prize Court. The captor has no right to do more than detain her; she is, like other presumed offenders, legally innocent till she is legally condemned. It was the neglect of this law that was made the ground of English reclamations in the case of the Trent; the question whether or no the Trent was carrying contraband of war being waived, though every sane man knew that she was not. Now, there are many valuable English ships, engaged in a regular trade with the North that habitually carry contraband of war. These Captain Semmes might lawfully arrest, and if brought into port they would unquestionably be condemned. But he cannot take them into a Southern port, by reason of the blockade, and from all others he is excluded by the policy of the neutral Powers. He cannot destroy them, however clearly guilty, without giving us a casus belli technically indisputable. And therefore he will not meddle with British vessels, even if engaged under his very eyes in giving aid and comfort to his enemy and the enemy of their own country.

The Northern cruisers are much less scrupulous. The same mail that brought the remonstrance of the New York Chamber of Commerce also brought the news of an unparalleled outrage committed by a Federal vessel in Spanish waters. The British ship Blanche was bound from Matamoras to Havannah, with cotton. While thus pursuing a lawful voyage between two neutral ports, she was desecrated off the coast of Cuba by a Northern man-of-war, conceived to be the Montgomery. The latter gave chase; and the captain of the Blanche, knowing how little the American was likely to regard the lawfulness of his voyage or the innocence of his cargo, ran his vessel ashore. The Spanish Alcalde came on board, and hoisted the Spanish flag. The Americans boarded the Blanche; slapped the magistrate in the face, and drove him and his attendants back to the shore; kidnapped and carried off the pilot, and set fire to the Blanche. On receiving the news of this outrage on his flag, the Captain-General of Cuba showed more of Castilian spirit than of British patience. He ordered a Spanish frigate in the harbour of Havannah to chase and capture the offender; but the Montgomery had disappeared from the scene of her exploit. What will Lord Russell do? A clear act of piracy, even more outrageous than that on the Trent, has been in this case perpetrated. The Blanche was innocent; had she been otherwise, the cruiser had no right to touch her in Spanish waters; had she been on the high seas, he had no right to burn her, but was bound to take her into port for adjudication. Spain has a right to demand the surrender of the culprits to be tried for an act of piracy committed within Spanish jurisdiction; Great Britain is bound in honour to exact full compensation and an ample apology. It will not be gratifying to British pride if Spain should be more prompt than England to avenge her wounded honour. But whatever may be its result, the exploit of the Montgomery is an excellent comment on, and answer to, the outcry of the New York merchants against the exploits of the Alabama.

The South and Slavery.

Let any people other than that of the Confederate States of America exhibit one tithe of the same heroic determination to be independent and free, the sympathies of civilized mankind would gush forth towards it with an impetuosity which neither the timid hesitations of Cabinets nor the statecraft of rulers could withstand. There is something so sublime in the spectacle of a whole nation rising as one man to a great and sustained effort, that with whatever bias we behold it, we finish by submitting our individual judgment to what we cannot fail to recognize as the fiat of the Almighty. If ever the voice of the people is the voice of God, it is on such rare and solemn occasions. Why, in this one instance alone, and this in the instance of a people so closely akin, has the generous British heart been slow to yield its sympathies; and why have these sympathies so long remained passive and faint of utterance? Why were more cruel tests exacted from this people than ever were from any other struggling for its independence, and this in the face of powerful motives of self-interest prompting leniency in the application of the tests? No man can doubt that the one reason is slavery. The nation of the South has a system of labour which the other nations have united in condemning and warring against.

In vain is it pleaded on behalf of the people thus mercilessly placed under ban, that this system is not one of their own creation; that they inherit it from a not remote period, when it was almost as generally approved, or, at least tolerated, as it is now denounced; and that the circumstances of their position do not even now leave to them the choice between this system and any other. The worst that can be reproached to the South by the most inveterate haters of her institutions, is that she has lagged one generation behind themselves. Within the memory of living men, every nation of Europe approved of slaveholding by the example of its practice. In the case of every other nation, its industrial and commercial development favoured and promoted the change of sentiment which led to the abandonment of the practice. In the case of the South alone, her industrial and commercial development welded the system more closely to her, and at this hour she cannot suddenly abandon it without shaking the very foundation, not only of her own, but of the world's prosperity. Such pleas are rejected, and the South is treated not as a criminal to be tried but as a felon already convicted.

We venture, not only as the avowed friends of the South and advocates of its cause, but even more the interest of humanity and civilization, to question the justice or the policy of a proceeding which thus isolates one nation from moral and intellectual communion with the rest. It is but common justice to distinguish between the wilful wrong-doer and him who errs from ignorance. It is but common humanity to listen to an offender before he is condemned. The people of the South do not feel guilty of the enormous villainies which are so persistently laid to their charge. They are conscious of having the same failings which everywhere pertain to human nature, but they are conscious also of not being destitute of those redeeming features which everywhere adorn it. When they are painted in the grotesque colours of stage morality, as is the too prevalent custom of certain orators and presses, it is surprising that they do not recognize themselves in the picture, and spurn with scorn or indignation the absurd caricature? When they are exhorted by the argument of facts which their daily experience proves to them to be gross and often wicked fabrications, is it surprising that they should look upon their advisers as traducers, or at best, as teachers who should learn before presuming to teach? Were the anti-slavery world once to persuade itself to treat the Southern slaveholders as ordinary men and women, such as we meet with in our walks of life at home, and to be appealed to and reasoned with as such, it would be the greatest step yet made towards bringing the South under the influence of European public opinion. As it is, the South sends her youths to be educated in our schools and colleges, her travellers to mix in our society and study our institutions; she reads our books and periodicals; and though on all other subjects we find her a quick and docile pupil, in this one subject alone we succeed only in convincing her the more thoroughly of our ignorance. It is but stating the simple truth to say, that if the institution of slavery needed advocacy or defence in the South, it would find the most efficient of both in the vulgar tirades which a certain class of philanthropists delight in lavishing upon it. In this manner, indeed, have the outpourings of the Abolition press been used for years.

We have now before us a sermon delivered on Thanksgiving-day, in November 1860, by Dr. Palmer, of New Orleans, an eminent Presbyterian divine, distinguished and beloved for the possession of many brilliant gifts, united with the conscientious practice of all Christian virtues. Politics in the pulpit have never been tolerated in the South; and though this sermon can scarcely be called a political one, it would have been deemed irreverent on the Sabbath-day. On this day, appointed by the Chief Magistrate as a day of thanksgiving, but which in the South was a day of mourning, when the nation girded its loins for the fearful trials which even the most hopeful could plainly foresee, the pastor departed from his lifelong reticence on all matters political, and addressed his congregation on what he considered their duties in the approaching struggle, especially as regarded the institution of slavery. One expression from this exhortation has been often, and sometimes malignantly, quoted. He told his hearers that the institution of slavery was for the South a solemn and Providential trust, for the faithful discharge of which they were individually, and as a nation, accountable before the Judgment-seat of Heaven. Those who have quoted this passage to prejudice the South, and convict her of hypocrisy as well as a crime, have overlooked the other passages in which the orator elaborates his meaning. It is not for the selfish interest of the master that the trust is given:—

This duty is bound upon us again as the constituted guardians of the slaves themselves. Our lot is not more implicated in theirs than is their lot in ours; in our mutual relations we survive or perish together. The worst foes of the black race are those who have intermeddled on their behalf. We know better than others that every attribute of their character fits them for dependence and servitude. By nature the most affectionate and loyal of all races beneath the sun, they are also the most helpless; and no calamity can befall them greater than the loss of that protection they enjoy under this patriarchal system. Indeed, the experiment has been grandly tried of precipitating them upon freedom which they know not how to enjoy; and the dismal results are before us in statistics that astonish the world. With the fairest portions of the earth in their possession, and with the advantage of a long discipline as cultivators of the soil, their constitutional indolence has converted the most beautiful islands of the sea into a howling waste. It is not too much to say that if the South should, at this moment, surrender every slave, the wisdom of the entire world, united in solemn council, could not solve the question of their disposal. Their transportation to Africa, even if it were feasible, would be but the most refined cruelty; they must perish with starvation before they could have time to relapse into their primitive barbarism. Their residence here, in the presence of the vigorous Saxon race, would be but the signal for their rapid extermination before they had time to waste away through listlessness, filth, and vice. Freedom would be their doom; and equally from both they call upon us, their providential guardians, to be protected. I know this argument will be scoffed abroad as the hypocritical cover thrown over our own cupidity and selfishness; but every Southern master knows its truth and feels its power. My servant, whether born in my house or bought with my money, stands to me in the relation of a child. Though providentially owing me service, which, providentially, I am bound to exact, he is, nevertheless, my brother and my friend; and I am to him a guardian and a father. He leans upon me for protection, for counsel, and for blessing; and so long as the relation continues no power but the power of Almighty God shall come between him and me. Were there no argument but this, it binds upon us the providential duty of preserving the relation that we may save him from a doom worse than death.

We accept Dr. Palmer as the exponent, in this respect, of the conscientious convictions not only of his own religious denomination but of all God-fearing people in the South, of whatever sect or creed.

The Southerners defend slavery not as men defend a favourite sin, to which they knowingly cling, but as an inherited obligation of mutual and reciprocal duties. The fact that it is so intimately interwoven with their entire social fabric, is to them a proof that it should not be rudely touched by wanton or inexperienced hands. The moral and intellectual infancy of the enslaved race teach them that in the treatment of the question they, as men and Christians, cannot consider their own interests or their own wishes alone. The relation which slavery sustains as one of the most important pillars of modern commerce, warns them that as statesmen they must not rashly venture upon doubtful experiments when failure would involve such momentous consequences.

Whatever be the evils of slavery, let them be as great as the wildest fancy has depicted them, it does appear to us that the true philanthropist should congratulate himself that the people most immediately concerned in it hold themselves accountable to God and to their fellow-men for the conscientious discharge of solemn duties. And it does also appear to us that a people burdened with the solution of so grave a question, and which so fully recognizes its responsibility in the solution of that question, is entitled to great forbearance, and at least credit for good intentions, at the hands of those who are absolved from the immediate responsibility. The South is amenable to the tribunal of the world's opinion for the manner in which it discharges this trust of the material and spiritual welfare of four millions of fellow-creatures, and it is not so stubborn in self-conceit as to believe that it can dispense with all advice and assistance. But that advice has been heretofore tendered in the shape of bitter taunts and reckless accusations, and the assistance has come in the shape of attempted annihilation by fire and sword.

Recognition of the Confederate States, and the Price of Cotton.

The death of Dives enriches his heirs—the death of the pauper puts a few shillings into the purse of the parish undertaker. When there is a commercial crisis involving wide-spread bankruptcy and ruin, accountants and lawyers reap a splendid harvest. To paraphrase a popular saying, and indeed to give expression to an indisputable and palpable truth, there is no such thing as an ill wind which does not benefit some individual or class. War, in its ultimate results, may not be an unmixt evil, for it often develops those virtues upon which national greatness and security depend; still its immediate effects are hideous and heartrending. Men prate about the horrors of the battle-field, about the dead, wounded, and maimed, about the desolation of once happy homes, about the sufferings of the mass of the community from the many evils with which war afflicts those who, by remaining at home, escape the pestilence of the camp and the dangers of the fight; but all such descriptions fall short of the actual miseries entailed by warfare. Language is too feeble to portray them; they cannot be appreciated by the most powerful imagination. Yet war is of considerable and instant advantage to many persons. If it were not so, we might have some hope of a speedy ending of the contest in America. A large army of contractors, a great body of speculators, men who, through soldiering, hope to attain fortune, are all determined opponents of peace. As it is in America so it has been in Europe. During the long wars waged by this country, when we were accumulating the national debt, which, though it may be rivalled by that of the United States, is nevertheless of highly respectable dimensions, many of our most eminent firms laid the foundation of their fortunes, and not only colossal but a multitude of smaller fortunes were made. It was the period when farmers kept their wine “on tap,” and when the great middle classes of England became a power in the State. Nor are these things exceptional or inexplicable. By far the largest portion of the money devoted to military and naval purposes does not go abroad, but what is collected from the pockets of the whole people finds its way into the pockets of a part. If war did not profit many persons it would be less frequent and of less duration.

The American war has produced much suffering in Europe and notably in England, and in this country, by a natural sequence, it has been of great benefit to many individuals and trades. Not only have dealers in warlike stores and holders of cotton been gainers, but our manufacturers and merchants have been saved from the ruin that threatened them from the unprecedented glut of cotton goods in every market. We need not dwell on the good this war will do to the whole commerce and industry of England, by breaking down the Northern monopoly

Southern trade, and bringing us into direct relations with eight millions of customers, whose wants are many and whose means of payment are ample. Some people are angry that all have not suffered equally from the war in America. There has been a vulgar and ignorant outcry against speculators in cotton. They have been accused of keeping the mills closed, whereas the reason of the whole of our cotton not being worked up is not the price of the raw material, but that the stock of manufactured goods was so heavy at the outbreak of the war that there was no demand which would enable dealers to concede the additional price of the raw material; and if the American supply had not been cut off, there is no doubt Lancashire mills would have stopped working from the want of orders. The American disruption could not have occurred at a better time for Lancashire. The high prices which have ruled were not the consequence of the supply of cotton being insufficient for the supply of the demand for yarns and cloth, but because it was foreseen that when the stock of fabrics was exhausted there would be a scarcity of the raw material. The supposition that cotton speculation has in the slightest degree added to the distress of Lancashire evinces contemptible ignorance of the simplest laws of Political Economy and of the practical bearings of commercial transactions. It would be easy to show, if it were worth the pains, that the advance in price in the prospect or presence of a dearth—a dearth from which speculators may reap a benefit proportionate to their risk, but which they cannot bring about, and which they cannot foster without ultimate loss—is a safeguard and an incalculable advantage to the community. If scarcity did not check demand by causing dearth, it would result in absolute, not comparative, famine.

But the charge of "wicked monopoly" preferred against the speculators or holders of cotton is not more absurd than the whisper buzzed about, that to recognize the Confederate States would ruin the owners of cotton. The frank and manly declaration of Mr. Gladstone has been denounced as a species of moral delinquency, because anxious holders thought it had a tendency to unsettle the market. We need hardly observe that if recognition meant the instant return of the nominal price of cotton and heavy losses to holders, it would not justify the withholding of recognition for a single hour. We have no quarrel with speculators in cotton, saltpetre, iron, corn, or any other article; but whilst they are free to speculate, it would be preposterous to suppose that a regard for their speculative interests should induce us to postpone an act of justice to a kindred nation, and put off doing that which would be a benefit to the country at large. We do not believe that shrewd men of business ever expected the Imperial welfare would be made subservient to their speculations. Besides, the impression that recognition and a fall in the price of cotton would be simultaneous is utterly unfounded.

Our able correspondent, Mr. George M'Henry, whose communication on the subject we are discussing will be found in another column, combats and successfully refutes this idea. Before offering a few remarks on the question so lucidly stated and argued by our correspondent, it is necessary to inquire why it is thought recognition would send down the price of cotton. We are told by the friends of the North,

—it is particularly urged by the Northern Government—it is the staple argument of that section of our commercial men who oppose recognition—that such a proceeding on the part of European Powers would be useless and worse than useless; that it would not open the Southern ports; and instead of shortening, would embitter and prolong the war. It is always suspicious when the opponents of a proposition resort to the pleas of utility and impracticability. If a scheme has no power for good or evil, it may not find friends; but, on the other hand, it will not be troubled with enemies. It is evident Mr. Seward and his Government would not protest so earnestly against recognition if they did not feel assured that the Northerners would then learn they are fighting against an independent nation, and for the conquest of a country which would need at least half a million of men to garrison it; and being thus informed of the true issues, a majority of the people would resolve not to risk their lives and fortunes in the continuation of a contest equally unjust and hopeless. It is also manifest that gentlemen on this side the Atlantic who protest against recognition on the score of its futility are so far insincere that they are not convinced by their own reasoning, or they would not associate recognition with a fall in the price of cotton. Indeed, the opponents of recognition are far more sanguine about its influence on the termination of the war than we are. We ask for the recognition of the Confederate States because it is an act of bare legal justice and of policy; and we also feel assured that unless peace is to be brought about by extermination, it must be preceded by European recognition. Further, if immediately after the battles of June, Europe had seized the decisive moment for recognition, we think it might have led to a suspension of hostilities. At present we are of opinion it would have no influence in bringing about an immediate peace. It seems to us that recognition is no longer urgent, except on the grounds of justice and international policy. We must, however, to meet the suggestion of the price of cotton being sent down by recognition, assume that the stoutly-opposed proceeding would forthwith put an end to the war, and so open the ports.

In the first place, we must notice the exaggerated notions about the quantity of cotton in the Confederacy. The British Consul at Charleston estimates it at four million bales, but we need hardly remark that his calculation is based upon probabilities, rather than on any actual data. We happen to know that on some of the largest cotton farms cotton this year does not form more than a fifth of the crops, and probably the South has not so much as four millions of bales. But, accepting this estimate, we must remember that in consequence of the war a far larger quantity of cotton has been spoilt than destroyed; and out of the entire quantity of cotton in the States, it is highly probable that 25 per cent. is waste. That is, the stock of cotton in the hands of European manufacturers and holders is smaller than at any former period, and is not equal to a three months' supply, and yet the stock of cotton in the States is not equal to one year's supply, taking the average of 1858, 1859, and 1860.

The stocks of fabrics are also being rapidly reduced; and, despite the high price of the raw material, manufacturers will, ere long, be full of orders. This reduction of stock is the case with America, as well as in Europe, India, and Australia. When peace is restored the Confederate States will be large buyers of cotton goods, and by their own necessities will enhance the price of their staple. The Northern States will not be able to do without cotton or cotton fabrics, and in the face of the Morrill tariff will have to import the raw material or the cloth, and so do their part towards enhancing the value of cotton. Mr. M'Henry is fully justified in the opinion he expresses that much of the cotton "in the possession of the planters may command more than double the ordinary value." Under the most favourable circumstances we do not expect a return of the prices of 1860 until four or five years after the conclusion of peace.

But the holders of cotton are protected from any sudden fall in the price of cotton by the difficulty of transporting it to Liverpool. A great portion of it is unginned and nearly all of it unpacked. To prepare the material for shipment white labour is necessary, and also the gummy cloths and other materials for packing. Moreover, the cotton cannot be brought to market all the year round; we must wait for the season when the rivers are swollen, and the bales can be put on board the river steamers. And where are the steamers to be obtained? Many of them have been destroyed, many have been used for war purposes, and there has not been the usual annual supply of new vessels for this traffic. For months after the opening of the ports, and the return of peace—which alone makes the opening of the ports useful, by enabling the white population to return to the pursuits of commerce, and attend to the packing and shipping of the cotton—very small quantities will reach Europe. But the demand for manufactures will be immediate. Before the raw material gets to Liverpool, the South will be buying extensively in Manchester; and, as we have seen, there will be a brisk demand from other quarters. So far from peace bringing down the price of cotton, it is highly probable that after a temporary fluctuation, holders may realize higher prices from the unusual demand.

We think the candid reader will admit, though the holders of saltpetre may suffer from the advent of peace, that that happy, though, we fear, distant event will not injure the holders of cotton. We do not agree with those who say that recognition will be forthwith followed by peace; but we are quite sure that recognition, even if it should suddenly put an end to hostilities, will not diminish the value of the present or then stocks of cotton.

The Majority of the Prince of Wales.

It is our duty and privilege to join in the loud chorus of congratulation that will on Sunday next greet the twenty-first anniversary of the birth of the Prince of Wales. If the future of Albert Edward is as bright as the present prospect, the hearty good wishes of the nation will be fully realized. A more dazzling and happy position could not be conceived. He is heir to the throne of an empire upon which the sun never sets. In every quarter of the globe subjects of Queen Victoria will hail with cordial loyalty the auspicious event. In North America, in India, in Australia, in the West Indies, in the Ionian Islands, and from the fortifications of Gibraltar, the discharge of cannon will proclaim to the world that the future King of England has attained his majority; that the Prince of the mother country of the Anglo-Saxon race has entered upon the responsible duties of manhood. At home, from a thousand pulpits his name will be mentioned with affectionate solicitude, and congregations of every sect will wish him God speed in his exalted career. It cannot be expected that he will pass through life without trials, for trials are the adjuncts of greatness. If he should be spared to wear the crown, he will doubtless find that even the devoted loyalty of a united people will not remove, though it may modify, the cares incident to the kingly office. Those who think a constitutional monarch is free from anxiety, and has no difficulties to contend with, are much deceived. Is it possible a King of England can ever feel indifferent to the prosperity or adversity of his people? Their glory is his glory, their decadence detracts from his honour. Besides, it requires magnanimity, forbearance, and a high degree of patriotism, as well as excellent kingcraft, for a constitutional monarch to maintain and exercise his Royal prerogative, whilst at the same time he sets an example to his subjects of a rigid observance of that Constitution from which his power is derived, and a reverence for those laws which it is his duty to enforce. A constitutional monarch is often called upon to sacrifice his wishes and to submit his will to the opinions and guidance of his constitutional advisers and of the Legislature. It is far easier to play the role of an irresponsible sovereign than that of a king who has to obey the laws, and to rule within the limits of the Constitution. The former demands ability; the latter ability and the exercise of the high virtue of self-abnegation.

Albert Edward is not only fortunate in the greatness of his destiny, but also in the circumstances of his birth and education. He may reasonably be proud of his descent from a long line of kings, yet he has greater cause for rejoicing that he is the son of a Queen whose monarchical and womanly virtues have endeared her to her subjects, and made her respected in all lands; and that his father played his part in life so well that in his early death the community felt they had lost a pillar of the state, and who will be remembered by posterity as Albert the Good. The English people are imbued with a sentiment of loyalty that has no immediate connection with the personal virtues of their rulers. They honour the King for the sake of his office. Still, it is well for the monarch and the people when loyalty to the throne is associated with heartfelt affection for its occupant.

The education of the Prince of Wales has been comprehensive and befitting his high calling. The rugged path of knowledge in his case has been smoothed as far as possible by all the appliances and means which royalty can command, and which his illustrious parents judiciously and anxiously applied. After a long course of private tuition, he passed some time at each of the Universities. He has visited the principal capitals of Europe. He has been to Canada and also to the late United States, and thus had the opportunity of seeing the wonderful development of a people in whose greatness or downfall England is not only commercially interested, but still more so because they are our kindred and speak our language. Lastly, in the midst of mourning for his father's death he visited the Holy Land; and we cannot suppose that the solemn impressions produced on that journey can fail to have a salutary and lasting effect upon his mind. The education and training of the heir to the throne leave nothing to be desired.

The anticipations of the future happiness, and, let us add, usefulness of the Prince of Wales are increased by his intended alliance with the Princess Alexandra of Denmark. Such a connection with Scandinavia is historically and otherwise pleasing to the English people, and it is impossible to reject the general testimony as to the virtues of the future Princess of Wales,—virtues which peculiarly fit her to occupy a distinguished place in the Court of Queen Victoria, where the pomp of royalty does not eclipse the graces of home and of family life. For his own sake, and for the sake of England, may the future years of Albert Edward Prince of Wales realize the promise of his youth and early manhood.

SOME officious person, burning to see himself in type, has complimented the Times, in its own columns, with his "entire concurrence in the views expressed by it the other day, as to the impolicy of European interference in the American civil strife." No one could find fault with such a harmless indulgence of personal vanity, especially as the writer discreetly contents himself with basing his "entire concurrence" upon reasons "so obvious as not to need stating," had he not presumed to speak as an organ of Southern opinion, and even on behalf of "every prominent man in the South to whom he has appealed within the past two months." This affectation of authority, coupled with the fact that he uses as his patronymic a well-known and once honoured name, has, we are informed, led to some misapprehension. It is scarcely necessary to tell our readers that the "H. C. Crittenden" of the Times, is not the J. J. Crittenden, late United States' Attorney-General, Senator, and author of the "Compromise Resolutions"; but it may be as well to tell them that the Times' Mr. Crittenden has no authority to speak either for the people of the South, or for their representatives in Europe; that, so far as we can ascertain, he is not even known to them by name; and that the sentiments expressed in his letter to the Times are in violent contrast to those of all the authorized exponents of Southern views.

WE are indebted to the New York correspondent of the Daily News for the following "latest direct intelligence from the South," which appeared in that journal on Tuesday:—

But at the same time there is no denying the fact that the hatred of the Southern populace to Northerners is intense, and when directed against Federal soldiers it becomes doubly intense. If the clamour of the newspapers and the mob had been attended to, "the black flag" would have been hoisted long ago, and the barbarous tastes and tendencies which slavery always develops would have had full play. There is no doubt whatever that Yankee bones have been carved into rings, and other ornaments, and Yankee skulls used as drinking cups, by various individuals in the Southern army. I have had proofs of the truth of these stories from divers quarters too strong to be gainsaid; and there is no doubt, too, that Federal prisoners have been insulted by mobs, and in remote prisons have been badly fed and badly lodged, and generally neglected. But in a state of society in which an anti-slavery man is looked on as a demon, in which in our own time mobs, headed by the sheriff, burn men alive in open day, in which shooting people down unawares in the street is a recognized and legitimate mode of avenging insults, and in which a bishop of the Protestant Church is at one and the same time a slaveholder, a drunkard, and major-general in the army, it need excite no great wonder and no great indignation if enemies taken in battle are not very hospitably entertained. We do not expect the refinements of civilized hostility from semi-barbarians, and semi-barbarians the mass of the Southern people undoubtedly are.

Reviews.

A STRANGE CODE OF MORAL DUTIES.*

The translator of this work thinks that in it is to be found a vindication of the character of his hero. He is not altogether wrong. Whilst every chapter is a proof of the dreamy, dangerous, and demoralizing nature of the principles of the revolutionist who has devoted his life to stirring up strife and inciting his countrymen to conspiracy, insurrection, and dastardly assassinations, all the time taking good heed not to incur any of the risks incident to such adventures, this book shows the obliquity of its writer's mental vision, and that he has not the judgment necessary to distinguish right from wrong, or truth from error. It is, therefore, barely within the range of possibility that when he was hounding on his unhappy victims to the commission of atrocious crimes, and to their own assured destruction, he thought he was doing his duty; and perhaps, setting a very high value on his own teaching and influence, he was so far self-deceived as to imagine the sneaking cowardice of planning deeds of violence and bloodshed, and skulking from the danger of aiding in their execution, was in his case a virtue. This plea is a poor one, but we can suggest no other to palliate the conduct of Joseph Mazzini. Perhaps the translator is the secret enemy of Mr. Mazzini, and presents these addresses to the Italian workmen in an English dress to disgust the people of this country with the doctrines of the most unscrupulous, though not the ablest, of the Red Republicans. If so, he might have spared his pains. Englishmen have no sympathy with infidelity that would be hideously blasphemous if it were not supremely ridiculous, with political principles that would be dangerous if they were not thoroughly impracticable, and with appeals so wild and incoherent that they sound like the ravings of a lunatic, and which could only influence men maddened by excitement. Englishmen are too practical to pin their faith to a philosopher who should propose to abolish the law of gravity, and substitute some law of his own, or to blot out the sun, and in place thereof use gas. What Mr. Mazzini proposes is, to disavow all the natural laws of society, all the inherent impulses of mankind, and to act upon motives foreign to humanity, and to organize society upon principles that are antagonistic to all association.

Cleared of verbiage, the doctrine enunciated in this book is, that former revolutions have been based upon a wrong principle; that men should not be taught so much to clamour for their rights as to do their duty. Still, Mr. Mazzini does not give up the struggle for rights, but he says rights should only be sought for as a means to an end. Not a very novel idea, since no man seeks his rights except for the end of promoting his interests or enjoyment. The end and the duty inculcated by Mr. Mazzini is the very pleasant one of working less and getting more. "It is clear you ought to labour less, and gain more than you do now." To effect this, capitalists and middlemen are to be got rid of; and as, from a faulty arrangement, men are not born equal in physical strength and mental capacity, if a man is willing to give "that amount of labour of which he is capable, he ought to receive such amount of recompense for that labour as will enable him more or less to develop his individual life in each of the essential characteristics by which individual life is defined."

Did Mr. Mazzini ever read an elementary work upon Political Economy? Possibly he is too much opposed to such a matter-of-fact study as to have done so. But he has lived so long in the world as to have had ample opportunity for observing the everyday, palpable incidents of supply and demand. He cannot, we suppose, have failed to notice that the abundant provision made by the Creator for His creatures depends upon human labour for its adaptation to the wants of humanity; that bread, meat, wine, clothing, and habitations do not exist without labour. The more labour the greater the production, and greater production means cheapness; and cheapness means that the working man enjoys comforts he cannot procure in dear times. Less labour would result in less food and clothing, and the working man would have less to eat and less clothing. But, says Mr. Mazzini, all must be equal, and working men must be their own capitalists. That will not cause a blade of wheat to spring up without ploughing and sowing, or make the fleece of the sheep cloth without handicraft. From year to year the total production of food is consumed; and though the working man does not eat too much, he eats as much as the duke or manufacturer; and how would he fare if less food were given? We owe an apology to our readers for troubling them with the commonplaces of Political Economy, or for seriously noticing such a ludicrous proposition as that the working classes should labour less and gain more; but we have no choice. The notoriety of Mr. Mazzini entitles his book to a notice which is not justified by its intrinsic merits; and elementary truths are the only reply to puerile arguments.

Whilst M. Mazzini advocates equality, he admits a saving clause to cover the position of the demagogue. If the Italians read his book, they might ask why Joseph Mazzini taught them and sought to lead them, if all men were equal? So, although the working-man is told to "untiringly combat the existence of privilege and inequality in the land that gave you birth," he is also immediately informed:—

There is but one sole legitimate privilege, the privilege of Genius when it reveals itself united with virtue. But this is a privilege given by God, and when you acknowledge it and follow its inspiration, you do so freely, exercising your own reason, and your own choice.

In the same page the Italians are thus instructed:—
Be your Country your Temple. God at the Summit; a people of equals at the base.

Where is Genius to be placed? Any one who reads the chapter entitled "God," will find that the author's God is a kind of earthly mysticism, and Joseph Mazzini is his prophet. What the demagogue desires is, stagnant equality amongst the people, and his own exaltation.

Mr. Mazzini approves of universal suffrage, and says "it is the only legal means by which a people may govern itself, without risk of continual violent crises." This was written twenty years ago, before the American crisis; yet not before there had been many instances of universal suffrages resulting in violent crises. But our author is above being instructed by the lessons of history, and the following quotation shows that he equally disregards the dictates of common sense:—

Universal suffrage in a country governed by a common faith, is the expression of the national will; but in a country deprived of a common belief, what can it be but the mere expression of the interests of those numerically the stronger, to the oppression of all the rest?

Now, if universal suffrage is not to gauge the will of the greater number, of what use is it? What is the object of voting and representation if it is not to express the views of a majority? If there is "a common faith," by which we suppose Mr. Mazzini means perfect unanimity, we cannot see what use there is of voting. It is true universal suffrage does lead to oppression, but that only proves that the system is bad, and not that any good can result from putting a question to the vote when the voters (under the influence of a presiding Genius) are agreed; or that any kind of voting is of service if it is not for the purpose of giving expression to the will of "those numerically the stronger."

One of Mr. Mazzini's pet schemes is to place man and woman upon a political equality.

The Mosaic Bible has declared: God created Man, and Woman from Man; but your Bible, the Bible of the Future, will proclaim, that God created Humanity, made manifest in the Woman and the Man.

The italics in the above quotation are the author's. Surely such a sentence is the very essence of wordy trash. The Bible of the Italian artizan is a Bible of the future, but Mr. Mazzini knows what it will contain. Why does he not imitate Joe Smith, and make a Bible? If, however, Mr. Mazzini's book were a fair specimen of man's political sagacity and statesmanship, the world would be benefited by the government of old women. They could not be more bungling than Mr. Mazzini, and their policy would certainly be more honest and humane.

If any of Victor Emmanuel's subjects are afflicted with the revolutionary mania, he cannot adopt a better means of curing them than by having "The Duties of Man," by Joseph Mazzini, extensively circulated; and as a suitable, yet severe, lasting, and cruel punishment for political offenders, let them be compelled to commit a few chapters to memory.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Old Lieutenant and his Son. By the Editor of "Good Words." (Strachan and Co.)

Those acquainted with Dr. McLeod as a preacher would expect from his pen solid mental food, and they have it in "The Old Lieutenant and his Son," though so prepared as to be pleasant as well as wholesome. Dr. McLeod is not one of the "sour-faced" school. We do not mean that, like another popular preacher, he thinks that a little laughter, caused by some comic illustrations of solemn things, is not out of place in a sermon; but when he leaves the pulpit and addresses the world by the agency of the press, he knows how to put forth an excellent sermon without sermonizing. The "good words" of such a writer are valuable, and must cost him much patient labour. He strives earnestly and successfully to make his readers welcome the preacher under the guise of the novelist. There is nothing in "The Old Lieutenant and his Son" that the most rigid Puritan can object to; nor is it that kind of religious novel in which the story only makes the moral more difficult to understand and less prepossessing. This work does not depend for its circulation upon critical commendation. Its popularity is insured by the reputation of its author and by its intrinsic merits.

Flax and its Products in Ireland. By WILLIAM CHARLEY, J.P. (Bell and Dally.)

If Mr. Charley should induce a single farmer to increase his cultivation of flax, or rather, give him a hint how to do so profitably, he will have done something for his day and generation, which is more than can be said of gentlemen who lay claim to a great discovery because they tell the world that if any one can find out a method of spinning woody fibre, and of so changing the nature of that fibre as to make the cloth as durable as cotton cloth, there will be an all-sufficient substitute for cotton. Flax is a substitute for cotton, though not the only one. But it is well to define what is meant by the word "substitute" in this case. It does not mean that all the uses of cotton are replaced and supplied; it does not mean that having the substitute, it is a matter of indifference whether we get any more cotton. When the American war is over, or rather, when the cotton trade returns to its normal condition—an event which will only follow peace after a long interval—flax, jute, and all other substitutes for cotton hitherto brought into use, will not displace a single bale of cotton. During the potato famine rice was used as a substitute, but when potatoes became plentiful rice was no more eaten as a vegetable. We do not seek to damage the development of the growth of flax; for though it can only temporarily, and to an extremely limited extent, replace cotton, it may with advantage come into more general use. Mr. Charley is practically acquainted with the subject of his book, rather an exceptional merit in these days of book-making.

The Home and Foreign Review. No. II.

This Review is well written and carefully edited. Indeed, the editorial supervision has been a little too careful and minute. The contents are on widely different subjects, and yet there is a certain sameness of tone, which is proper in a book the work of a single writer, but decidedly objectionable in a Review produced by several writers. The best possible design for a house would destroy the architectural beauty of a street or town if it were constantly or too frequently repeated. The Home and Foreign Review is certainly one of the most liberal Roman Catholic publications of the day, and it ought to command the support of the enlightened members of the Roman Church in England. It has at the outset of its career managed to offend Cardinal Wiseman, and the article in reference to this pretty quarrel is rather smart. It commences by a profession of the most profound obedience to the Cardinal, praises his virtues and talents, and then proceeds to prove that the Cardinal's condemnation of the Review was unjustifiable, and winds up with a respectful declaration of war against what we expect his Eminence would call the prerogative of the Church in directing and controlling the opinions and conscience of her children.

The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined. By J. W. COLENSO, D.D., Bishop of Natal. (Longman and Co.)

The heresies of Dr. Colenso are well known. Any one who has read his "St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, newly translated from a Missionary Point of View," will be prepared in this work for an avowal of the fundamental infidelity which consists in discrediting the inspiration of the Scriptures. The difficulties of belief are clearly stated, but no reference is made to the still greater difficulties of unbelief. If parts of the Bible, and even of certain books, are false, why not the whole? How can we accept anything from men who, solemnly professing to write from Divine inspiration, write falsehoods? Moreover, no attempt is made to reply to the arguments which support the inspiration of the Bible. It is said that Dr. Colenso is about to resign his bishopric—we can only regret he has not done so before. It is not in accordance with our idea of honesty for a man whilst retaining the office of a Christian Bishop to attack what the Christian world regards as the foundation of the Christian faith.

THE TRADE OF BREMEN.

BREMEN, Oct. 22.

This city having long carried on an extensive trade with the South, and being one of the two principal German ports, its probable future relations to the Southern Confederacy may be interesting to consider. As the principal buyer of Southern tobacco, and a large importer of cotton, and other Southern staples, the importance of this little Hanse Free Town is not to be underestimated. The energy of its merchants has created for it a prominent place among the business emporiums of Europe, not to say of the world; and it is, perhaps, unnecessary to add everything else social, political, learning, or luxury, are made subservient to the grand object—business success. The large trade carried on during the present war between this port and the North, is not calculated to gain for Bremen much Southern business, or many friends there; but then, the South can safely reckon upon any amount of sympathy at the close of the war, when its trade is once more revived. This article "sympathy" is not regularly quoted in the market; but you may depend upon it, can be bought and sold, and is subject to fluctuations, as all the other articles. At present "Northern sympathy" commands a good price, but when the Confederation is recognized, Northern sympathy will stand at a much larger discount in this market than Northern Treasury Notes are at present in Wall-street. In point of fact the South ought not to bear malice on this account, because if Mr. and Mrs. Smith resort to fistieffs to settle their little domestic differences; the butcher cannot really be expected to care which whips, so long as his beef is taken and paid for. At the end of the war, I repeat, the South will have more sympathy than she knows what to do with, and those who now declaim loudest against her will probably beg most humbly for a portion of her trade.

In order to clearly indicate the extent of the trade between Bremen and the United States prior to the present war, and its importance as a buyer of Southern produce, and exporter of European manufactures, I enclose several tables marked I—XI, showing the amount and character of this trade in detail. I send also a cotton report, marked No. I., showing the imports of cotton here during the past twenty years, and finally tables marked XII and XIII, showing the "Arrivals and Departures of American Vessels," at and from this port from 1815—1858 with a comparative table of the "Arrivals and Departures of Bremen Vessels" during the same period.

From 1850, after various fluctuations, the cotton trade gradually increased, until it reached over 60,000,000 lbs. in 1859. This increase, however, does not result from direct shipments from Southern ports only. The City of New York, by an anomaly of trade, under which the South has suffered too long, sent us in 1856, over 3,000,000 lbs.; again in 1859, over 3,000,000 lbs.; and in 1858-9, a larger quantity still. In 1860 New York sends over 4,000,000 lbs., valued at 701,115 Bremen thalers. (A thaler at ordinary exchange is worth 78—80 cents). This sum is trifling against the grand total of cotton imports, but furnishes one of many examples, how New York insinuates itself into legitimate Southern trade and profits.

How is it that in 1860 New York sent us 17,772,103 lbs. of rosin, worth 250,000 thalers; also 1,089,469 lbs. of turpentine, worth 103,820 thalers; also large quantities of staves and cedar wood? These articles are the natural exports of the South. But commerce and the import of manufactures from Europe have been in the hands of the North, and for the sake of filling up ships, securing return business, and maintaining their commercial superiority over the South, the Northern merchants lay up these things, and ship them from their ports, though they are often not by any means a source of direct profit. In the ordinary course of trade these articles would be shipped to Europe from the South, and would yield then a handsome profit to buyer and seller. The Southern merchants have always had to pay the penalty of permitting this unnatural diversion of exports, and for allowing the reciprocal relations that ought to exist between producers and consumers to be governed by those who are nothing other than go-betweens, who manage to squeeze a commission from both. Take our port Bremen for example, which being a great entrepot to the Continent, affords a fair illustration. What did the North send us in 1860? Hops, Havannah tobacco, seedleaf, some dye-woods, rosin, cotton, turpentine, shoe-pegs, leather, &c., amounting in total value to the following:—

	Bremen thalers.
From Boston	900
„ Philadelphia	12,268
„ New York	3,786,708
Grand Total	3,799,876

Now, what did we get from the South?

Tobacco, stems, some copper, quercitron, corn, rosin, pine wood, and other woods, staves, cotton, little rice, no turpentine, no sugar, amounting in total as follows:—

	Bremen thalers.
From Baltimore	1,880,582
„ Richmond	610,209
„ Charleston	1,205,770
„ Savannah	1,082,737
„ Mobile	868,649
„ Galveston	1,004,306
„ St. Louis (Mobile)	1,000
„ New Orleans	5,938,938
Grand total	12,592,201

Thus we receive from the North per year something over 3,000,000, and from the South over 12,000,000; with the phenomenon that several of the most important articles exported from the North belong legitimately to the South, and should have been sent from her ports. But what does Bremen return the North for the 3,000,000 imports from there? Manufactured goods of cotton, linen, silk, woollen; toys, glassware, cigars, wines, beer, porcelain, pianos, fancy articles, window glass, mirrors, cutlery, &c., &c., in short, the various products of European skill, as follows:—

	Bremen thalers
To Boston	74,811
„ Philadelphia	968,086
„ New York	10,948,113

Grand total 11,991,310

Besides to various other places in the United States not specified 1,089,183

12,680,493

In exchange for the 12,000,000 from the South she sends, of the following value:—

	Bremen thalers.
To Baltimore	75,216
„ Richmond	14,723
„ Charleston	39,680
„ Savannah	3,781
„ Mobile	129
„ Galveston	101,591
„ New Orleans	465,232

Thus of a total export to the former United States, amounting to 13,680,145 thalers, only about 1,000,000 went to the South, over 12,000,000 to the North, to be retailed at raised prices to our merchants, who "go North" once or twice a year to purchase stock, which reaches New Orleans from Europe via New York. The effect of the liberal tariff of the South would be sufficient without any other inducement to divert shipments of European and other manufactures, to new ports and to place her business and commerce in a position which will not only far surpass what they were, but even outstrip the trade of the North. The vast benefits of this legislation to the South will be seen in the reduced price of every manufactured article, whether of use or luxury, and consequently in the general cost of living, while the raw products of the South may be sent to Europe at reduced prices also, leaving the planter as large a profit as ever before. For if the whole scale of prices be changed for those things we buy, we can also reduce the cost of what we sell. The per cent. of profit of the merchant, the amount of salary of his clerk, the price he has to pay for board, food, and clothing, will then be largely reduced, and we shall no more pay 50—100 per cent. more for every necessary of life in New Orleans than in New York. When we refuse to receive merchandise through the medium of New York speculators, brokers, bankers, and go-betweens of every kind, we shall inaugurate a new system of Political Economy for the South, and a new era of unexampled prosperity. Whatever then may be the results of the efforts to import cotton from India, Egypt, Algeria, Syria, Turkey, Italy, Brazil, Australia, Siam, China, or whence you will, the South will be able to put competition at defiance—a result growing out of, and due solely to, direct trade and low tariff. That this abnormal condition of things in the South has not been sooner ended is not explicable by any other conjecture than the difficulty of altering a long established system of trade, and the disinclination to bring about so tremendous a commercial convulsion. It has finally taken place, and caused the war now raging. Under its effects the North is writhing, and screaming with much patriotism, "Save the Union, save our customers, save our shops, our factories, our industry, save our pockets, save our brokerage, save the Union!"

That the two causes of the war, and the bitterness manifested by the North, are to be found in the unequal advantages of trade, and the possibility that the latter will be inevitably crippled by European opposition in every branch of manufacturing industry, is quite generally understood and believed in England and France, and is every day gaining ground in Germany, and in the rest of the continent.

Even before the withdrawal of South Carolina from the Union, measures had been taken both here and in Antwerp, and Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, towards inaugurating a "Direct Trade" between Europe and the Southern States of America. It was believed that a rupture of the two sections of the Union was inevitable; and though certain of a desperate opposition from their friends and customers in the North, European merchants made significant movements in several places towards encouraging the project of direct trade. The result of meetings held in Antwerp was the sending of a ship to the South, laden with a general assortment of manufactured goods, and the establishment of a company to continue the movement so bravely begun. In a despatch to the department of the then U. S. consul in Antwerp, we are informed that the company is styled "La Compagnie Belge-Américaine pour le développement du Commerce direct, avec le Sud des Etats-Unis." The consul states that,— "A large amount of the capital stock of the Company has been taken by wealthy persons, and during the present year several gentlemen of high respectability, representing the interests of the South have arrived here in aid of this project.

This measure, if carried on to success, will most unquestionably improve the interests of the great traffic of the Southern States."

He adds farther, that he has given considerable encouragement to the movement, but is sorry to say that some have based the chief success of the enterprise upon a dissolution of the American Union. The Consul, though discouraging, as he states, this view of the enterprise does not deny the importance of the movement or its popularity.

Again, Mr. Samuel Ricker, the very able late Consul General of the United States at Frankfort-on-Maine, reports to the department, under date August 7, 1860, that:—

"The plan of opening a direct trade between Europe and the Southern States of America was already to a certain extent realised by the inauguration of the 'Waaren und Industrie Borse at the Exchange Hall.' 223 firms were represented on the first day. Middle and Southern Germany were the most numerous represented, although Northern Germany, especially Berlin, Leipzig, Hamburg, and Hanover, contributed also. England sent from Liverpool, Manchester, Bradford, &c. France and Belgium from Strasburg, Lyons, Verrieres, Ghent, &c.; and Switzerland from Winterthur, Basle; and even Naples was represented."

The Consul from Nantes, in France, also mentions that a movement in favour of direct trade has also been made there. We thus have the assurance of the readiness of Europe to enter into direct commercial relations with the South upon a basis of mutual advantage. In conclusion the Consul General remarks:—

"It is remarkable that many favourable offers from Liverpool houses were unnoticed on account of the expected opening of a direct intercourse with the Southern States, that is of the saving of the expensive intermediation of New York and English agents."

In Bremen there are also a number of influential merchants who are ready to aid this movement whenever circumstances will permit, and to send to the South the products of European manufacture upon such terms as can be agreed upon. These views were entertained, as I have shown prior to the separation of the South, and looked only to a small part of the immense advantages now opened up to Europe by the adoption on one side of a liberal tariff, and on the other of protective and prospective measures suicidal of their own purposes, and highly effective in forwarding the interests of the South. The cessation of hostilities will be the signal for the commencement of this trade, and one year will be sufficient to develop it into gigantic proportions. The question is thoroughly understood here, and I am assured by prominent merchants that the terms of the South can be easily carried out, and credit extended, and capital advanced upon proffer, upon the system hitherto in vogue in trade with the North. There has been a great deal said by the opponents of the South of her inability to raise the means necessary to carry on a direct trade with Europe, or even to command the confidence and credit here, which made their business with the North so desirable, but if the efforts and offers already made by men of high commercial standing are to be taken as a guarantee for the future; the difficulty of obtaining credit and advances to an indefinite extent will be among the least with which the South will have to contend. In relation to this subject I have been put in possession of letters from Governor Pickens, George Brown, Thomas Howell Cobb, &c., and was assured of the determination of these gentlemen to support to the utmost the movement to establish this trade. It was suggested to make Bremen the port of shipment to the Continent, in view of its advantages as a cheap port, as accessible at all seasons of the year to vessels of the largest class, as being contiguous to the Zollverein, and connected with every port and place in Europe of importance by an unbroken line of railroad, by which goods can be conveyed from the side of the ship, without transshipment, to any point between St. Petersburg and Trieste. The energetic character of the people is constantly opening up new channels for the sale of their merchandise; and within the past two years considerable quantities of cotton have found their way from this port to Russia, Switzerland, and Austria. The port of Hamburg is objectionable on account of the want of docks—ships having to discharge in lighters—while the Elbe is in winter often completely closed to navigation. Our port, Bremerhaven, is never seriously obstructed by ice, and is connected with Bremen by a railroad lately completed. In the event that Government, or an association of planters—as was at one time contemplated—should ship cotton to the Continent on their own account, I would especially urge the advantages enjoyed by this port for the reception and sale of the same upon terms favourable to the shippers. As the entrepot to the Continent, and owing to the abolition of transport dues through the Zollverein, Bremen bids fair to surpass every other port on the Continent. The United States Consul at Trieste, writes under date September 20, 1859, that "Bremen is the most dangerous competitor of Trieste, feeding almost all the spinners of Southern Austria." Besides the rising importance of this port as a cotton market, it ranks among the first, if not the very first, market in the world for Southern tobacco. A line of trade between Bremen as the exporting agency of European manufactures, and the medium of import for the Continent, of Southern produce, would be establishing true and legitimate reciprocal relations between the two great factors, producers, and consumers, and quickly divert the shipment of manufactured goods to New Orleans, Charleston, Richmond, and Savannah, in return for the great staples sent us from the co. The true guarantee for the permanence of this trade would be found in the mutual advantage derived from it. These reciprocal transactions would establish exchanges upon a sound basis, and even without an effort would for ever transfer the banking business of the South to one of her cities. Under this system the statistician may find that the trade of New York can no longer be represented as in the following paragraph from a Northern Cyclopaedia of Commerce:—

"The trade of New York has apparently fallen off; a circumstance which discloses a satisfactory explanation in the large increase of transit business between the principal Southern ports and the markets of Europe. These operations are mainly made the control of parties in this city, acting in the capacity of speculators, brokers, agents for foreign spinners, &c. It has frequently happened that when the stock here was reduced to a comparatively low figure, parties who operate in transit would purchase from 20 to 30,000 bales per week, and not unfrequently turning the staple over two or three times, in the period which used to suffice under the old system of working but one fair profit out of it. . . . New York being the real seat of the medium financially, and every other way between the producer and the consumer, the planter and agriculturist here, and the factor and manufacturer there (Europe), New York being all this and much more, we repeat, it must continue to control the cotton trade of the country for a century to come." The alacrity with which New York has responded to the call for troops to subjugate the South shows how much she has the fulfilment of this prophecy at heart.

Having in the foregoing stated the proportions of the imports from the South at this port, and the inadequate returns made by shipments thither, under the old position of things, the great and unceasing popularity of direct commercial relations with the South, exclusive of the intermediation of the North; the importance of establishing such relations with Bremen as a great consumer of Southern produce, and the entrepot for the exports of the Continent, by appointing Government or Company agents here, or in any other manner aiding the movement, by which the interests of the planters may be best advanced, I now beg to call your attention to the prospects of the South enjoying a portion of the carrying trade between her ports and Europe.

The tables enclosed of arrivals and departures of American vessels extend from 1815 to 1857, and give a clear insight into the commerce of Bremen with the United States during this period. It will be seen that wherever the arrivals of American vessels in 1827, amounted to 67 against 14 Bremen vessels, they have diminished in 1858 to 22, (of which 11 were regular steamers, leaving only 11 sailing vessels.) against 166 Bremen vessels. The arrivals of Bremen vessels are estimated from the United States only; as to the trade between foreign ports and Bremen, the vessels of the latter have absorbed it almost to the entire exclusion of American bottoms. This is owing to a combination of causes, among which may be mentioned the cheapness of ships, of labour, of provisions, abundance of sailors, low wages, the fact of the owners residing here, and being thus enabled to settle all business connected with their ships without detaining them; but above all other causes of this successful position, is unquestionably the Treaty of 1827 with the United States. The former United States' Consul at this port, writing to Washington under date Sept. 5, 1859, reports:—

"Yet with this immense increase of trade (between United States and Bremen) we find the American shipping gradually falling off, and that of Bremen increasing beyond all precedent; thus conclusively showing that our shippers have been deprived of the benefits of a large and increasing commerce, which was formerly in their hands, and upon the ruin of which the present immense commerce of Bremen, has been built—a result inevitably following from the very favourable reciprocity treaty of 1827. But the injury done to our trade is not confined to the commerce with the ports of the Hanse Towns, though I think this to be very great; for the ships of the Hanse Towns also compete with our own in the trade from other countries to our ports, and especially from the East and West Indies, China, and the South Sea Islands. * * * This competition must, and always will, be successfully maintained so long as the terms of this treaty are in force. It could never have entered into the calculations of the framers of the treaty in 1827, that the effect of it in thirty-one years would be not only to drive our ships from participation in the trade of these ports, but actually to raise up and encourage competition with our shipping for the trade of the world. I have no hesitation in saying that the present great and growing commerce of the Hanse Towns, and of Bremen especially, is owing, in a great measure, to the privileges enjoyed by them under the treaty of 1827; and while it would ill become us to suggest to any interference with the proper and legitimate increase of the trade of those towns, the question arises whether justice to the interests of our own citizens does not require that we should withdraw equal privileges from a foreign nation, when it is clearly evident that they operate fatally to the disadvantage of our own commerce."

The Consul then suggests a modification of the treaty by withdrawing from Hanse vessels the right to enter our ports upon the same terms as American vessels.

Mr. Wheaton, the eminent author of the "Elements of International Law," when the United States Minister in Berlin, wrote to the American Consul at this port under date August 16, 1841, as follows:—

"I should be glad to have, at your earliest convenience, your opinion as to the actual working of the existing treaty between us and the Hanse towns, upon the interests of our navigation and commerce, especially in respect to the intercourse between Bremen and the United States. You are aware that our ship owners complain that its operation is very unfavourable to them."

To this the Consul replied:—

"United States' Consulate, Bremen, Sept. 20, 1841. * * * * "That the treaty has greatly aided in promoting the commerce of this place, I think, cannot be doubted, as it has thrown nearly the whole of the carrying trade between it and our country into the hands of the former and enabled it to share in that, from and to the United States, to and from other countries; that it has greatly facilitated the citizens of these ports in establishing themselves in our seaports to the detriment of our merchants; and that it has been the major part of the cause of this place having augmented its shipping to such an extent, that its owners, mostly merchants, have, at dull periods, been obliged to seek new branches of commerce, and in doing so have gone into that of the New England and South Sea Fisheries; thus, with respect to the former, supplying this market with part of what is received through the United States, and as regards the latter, coming directly in the way of our vessels. * * * To these advantages the Hanse towns have it not in their power to give anything like an equivalent, as they would not and could not retaliate in case the treaty should be abrogated by our country. Bremen and Hamburg being rival servants of Germany, the one that works cheapest and best will be preferred. This is what keeps either of them from attempting to impose heavier imposts on commerce than exist at present and even if it did not the Government of the German Customs League (Zollverein) would probably not suffer them to do so. Hamburg has not taken near as much advantage of the treaty as Bremen."

Thus so long ago as 1841, this treaty was seen to be injurious to the United States, and experience since then has but confirmed the truth of this view.

Whatever the policy of the Confederate Government will be in establishing future commercial relations with foreign countries, I desire to place on record the workings of the Treaty of 1827, as furnishing data for a future treaty with the Hanse Towns. If Southern vessels are to share in the carrying trade, which will hereafter spring up between the Confederate States and Europe, stipulations of a different kind must be made with these towns, for owing to the reasons given, their vessels will always be able to underbid ours, when placed upon an equal footing with them.

THE PRICE OF COTTON.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—The following remarks have been suggested by the perusal of the several letters from persons in Manchester, addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which have appeared in the newspapers during the past week, expressing uneasiness concerning the quotations for cotton and cotton goods in case of the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States. A long practical knowledge of the commerce between the late American Union and Europe, and an intimate acquaintance with the condition of affairs in the South at the present time, warrant the assertion that the fears entertained by the writers of those communications in reference to a decline in price, in such an event, are without sufficient foundation.

The average annual consumption of American cotton on both sides of the Atlantic for the last ten years has been 3,090,943 bales, as is proved by the result of the crops from 1851 to 1857, inclusive; those of 1858, 1859, and 1860, being excessive, viz.:—

Bales.
1852 3,262,882
1853 2,930,027
1854 2,847,339
1855 3,527,845
1856 2,932,519

or an average of 3,090,943 each year. The stocks of cotton and cotton manufactures at the close of the season in 1857 were about the same as those at the beginning of 1851. The crops for the three last years were as follows:—

Bales.
1859 4,669,770
1860 3,656,086

or 4,059,112 bales per annum; making a surplus of production over consumption at the time of the breaking out of the war of 2,904,507 bales. This extra accumulation was apparent from the increased stocks of cotton at New York, Havre, and Liverpool, and the enormous quantities of manufactured goods in all parts of the globe. If the produce of 1861 had come forward in due course, there is no doubt prices would have been lower than for many years. It may be remembered that great losses were made in nearly every branch of the trade during 1860, and the first half of 1861, and that prices were kept from ascending rapidly for a number of months after hostilities commenced, by reason of the overplus being equivalent to nearly a year's requirements. But now that a second season is passing away without the usual supply coming to hand, famine quotations are readily obtained for the scanty stocks of the raw material, while the manufactured articles are still in such comparative abundance that they do not keep pace with the rise. Although the earth's productions that are used for food are scarcely ever carried over the year of their growth, in consequence of their perishable nature, those commodities taken for clothing are most generally in sufficient quantity for two years; the world, therefore, is at present drawing upon its reserve of cotton. The crop of 1861 was about 3,500,000 bales; 500,000 bales have been destroyed, and 1,000,000 bales consumed in the South, leaving 2,000,000 bales; to which must be added the crop of 1862, 1,000,000 bales, making 3,000,000 bales for export. These crops cannot, however, be moved all at once; should peace be concluded immediately, it would be three months before any portion of them would begin to reach Liverpool; and for a long while afterwards cotton could only come forward in very limited quantities. The means of getting the produce to market are greatly interrupted, and it will be a year before the usual transportation facilities can be afforded; in the meanwhile the inland as well as the ocean freights may be three or four times higher than formerly, and a variety of additional expenses will much augment the cost. It is well known that there is not any cotton at the ports; that not over 500,000 bales are ginned and bagged, and that the burlaps, gunny cloth, and hoop iron for the latter purpose, will have to be imported before the remainder can be removed from the plantations. For the first time in the history of the trade, the demand for manufactured goods will, on the return of peace, be in advance of the supply of the raw material. Commerce generally, which is now, in a measure, paralyzed by the partial blockade of the Southern ports, will take a fresh start, and more than the usual vigour and life be imparted to mercantile operations. The Confederate States will want, without delay, upwards of twenty millions sterling in value of European manufactures, as in addition to their former requirements of foreign articles, principally imported through New York, the establishment of free trade with all countries, except the United States, will transfer their custom for coarse goods from the North to this side of the Atlantic. The major portion of these supplies, too, will have to be taken from the stocks now on hand here; their necessities will be so urgent as to render it impossible to wait for the crops of 1861 and 1862 to be passed through European looms. Fabrics made from surat and other inferior cottons will answer their purpose, and the strange anomaly will exist of the growth of the East meeting a profitable market in the West. From the fact, then, of this enormous demand for dry goods springing up, there is little chance for much decline in cotton; indeed, even that yet in the possession of the planters may command more than double the ordinary value, for the same reason.

The letter of Mr. Bunch, the British Consul at Charleston, to Earl Russell, which was published in the newspapers a few days since, contains, in the judgment of many persons familiar with the subject, several errors in reference to the cotton crops of the Confederate States for the years 1860, 1861, and 1862, and the quantity now on hand for exportation.

He says, "The crop of 1860 was disposed of, and, in a considerable measure, exported before the blockade of the seaports was established, but it is calculated that 750,000 bales still remain on hand." This is not correct; shipments were continued up to the close of the season in June 1861, the number of bales reaching the large figures of 3,656,086; not 50,000 could have been held over, as the fear of the blockade induced the planters and factors to bring forward the cotton. Again, he says, "The crop of 1861 amounted to about 2,750,000 bales; of these about 1,000,000 bales have been destroyed." That is also a mistake. The product of 1861 was about 3,500,000 bales; the planting took place before hostilities commenced, and the labour of the country not having been disturbed, the crops were secured. It is not believed that over 500,000 bales have been destroyed. Mr. Bunch, however, makes no allowance for the quantity consumed and wasted in the South during the past eighteen months, which must have been about 1,000,000 bales. He further remarks, in speaking of the growth of 1862, that "It is thought by some that the present crop will not exceed 1,000,000 bales, but has reason to believe that the supply from Texas has been underestimated," and therefore sets down 1,500,000 bales as being near the mark. Now, as the quantity cultivated in that State has never exceeded 252,424 bales (in 1860), and is most generally under 200,000 bales, it can make but little difference in the estimate.

Mr. Bunch's statement thus calls for 3,950,000 bales, or nearly a million of bales beyond what is actually on hand; the 50,000 bales which he estimates as having eluded the blockade, about balances the unshipped portion of the crop of 1860.

The augmented supply of cotton from India, Egypt, &c., induced by high quotations, will not more than compensate for the great waste for tents and other war purposes in the Federal States.

As there seems to be entire misapprehension concerning the attitude assumed by the Confederate Government in regard to the exportation of cotton, copies of the several Acts of Congress in reference thereto are herewith furnished.

Your obedient servant,
GEORGE M'HENRY.

No. 177.] AN ACT

To Prohibit the Exportation of Cotton from the Confederate States, except through the seaports of said States; and to punish persons offending therein:—

SECTION 1.—The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of June next, and during the existence of the blockade of any of the ports of the Confederate States of America by the Government of the United States, it shall not be lawful for any person to export any raw cotton or cotton yarn from the Confederate States of America, except through the seaports of the said Confederate States; and it shall be the duty of all the marshals and revenue officers of the said Confederate States to prevent all violation of this Act.

SEC. 2.—If any person shall violate, or attempt to violate or evade the provisions of the foregoing section, he shall forfeit all the cotton or cotton yarn thus attempted to be illegally exported, for the use of the Confederate States; and in addition thereto, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, or else imprisoned in some public jail or penitentiary for a period not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court, after conviction upon trial by a court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3.—Any person informing as to a violation or attempt to violate the provisions of this Act, shall be entitled to one-half the proceeds of the articles forfeited by reason of his information.

SEC. 4.—Any justice of the peace, on information under oath from any persons of a violation or attempt to violate this Act, may issue his warrant, and cause the cotton or cotton yarn specified in the affidavit to be seized and retained until an investigation can be had before the courts of the Confederate States.

SEC. 5.—Every steamboat or railroad car which shall be used with the consent of the owner or person having the same in charge, for the purpose of violating this Act, shall be forfeited in like manner to the use of the Confederate States. But nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to prohibit exportation of cotton to Mexico through its co-terminus frontier.

Approved, May 21, 1861.

No. 204.] AN ACT

To extend the provisions of an Act entitled, "An Act to Prohibit the Exportation of Cotton from the Confederate States, except through the seaports of said States, and to punish persons offending therein."

Approved, May 21, 1861.

SEC. 1.—The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the provisions of the above recited Act be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to the exportation of tobacco, sugar, rice, molasses, syrup, and naval stores, from the Confederate States, from and after the tenth day of August next.

Approved August 2, 1861.

No. 221.] AN ACT

To amend the Law in Relation to the Export of Tobacco and other commodities.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the Act passed at the present session, entitled "An Act to extend the provisions of an Act entitled, 'An Act to Prohibit the Exportation of Cotton from the Confederate States, except through the seaports of said States, and to punish persons offending therein,'" approved May 21, A.D., 1861, shall go into effect immediately after the approval of this Act.

Approved August 16, 1864.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

In the Confederate Senate, Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolutions relative to Lincoln's emancipation proclamation, states that a majority of the Committee favoured the following Bill:—

"Whereas, these States, exercising a right consecrated by the blood of our revolutionary forefathers, and recognised as fundamental in the American system of government, which is based on the consent of the governed, dissolved the compact which united them to the Northern States, and withdrew from the Union created by the Federal Constitution; and whereas, the Government of the United States, repudiating the principles on which its founders, in their solemn appeal to the civilized world, justified the American Revolution, commenced the present war to subjugate and enslave these States under the pretext of repressing rebellion and restoring the Union, and whereas, in the prosecution of the war for the past seventeen months, the rights accorded to belligerents by the usages of civilized nations have been studiously denied to the citizens of these States, except in cases where the same have been extorted by the apprehension of retaliation or by the adverse fortune of the war; and whereas, from the commencement of this unholy invasion to the present moment, the invaders have inflicted inhuman miseries on the people of these States, exacting of them treasonable oaths, subjecting unarmed citizens, women, and children to confiscation, banishment, and imprisonment, burning their dwelling-houses, ravaging the land, plundering private property, murdering men for pretended pretences, organizing the abduction of slaves by Government officials and at Government expense, promoting servile insurrection by tampering with slaves, and protecting them in resisting their masters; stealing works of art, and destroying public libraries, encouraging and inviting a brutal soldiery to commit outrages on women by the unrebuked orders of military commanders, and attempting to ruin cities by filling up the entrance to their harbours with stone; and

"Whereas, in the same spirit of barbarous ferocity, the Government of the United States enacted a law, entitled 'An Act to suppress insurrection, to prevent treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' and has announced by a proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln, the President thereof, that, in pursuance of said law, 'on the 1st day of January, 1863, all persons held as slaves within a State or designated part of a State the people whereof shall be in rebellion against the United States shall be thenceforward and for ever free,' and has thereby made manifest that this conflict has ceased to be a war as recognized among civilized nations, but on the part of the enemy has become an invasion of an organized horde of murderers and plunderers, breathing hatred and revenge for the numerous defeats sustained on legitimate battle-fields, and determined, if possible, to exterminate the loyal population of these States, to transfer their properties to their enemies, and to emancipate their slaves, with the atrocious design of adding servile insurrection and the massacre of families to the calamities of war; and whereas justice and humanity require this Government to endeavour to repress the lawless practices and designs of the enemy by inflicting severe retribution, therefore the Confederate States of America do enact:

"1. That, on and after the 1st day of January, 1863, all commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the enemy, except as hereafter mentioned, when captured, shall be imprisoned at hard labour, or otherwise put at hard labour, until the termination of the war, or until the repeal of the Act of the Congress of the United States hereinbefore recited, or until otherwise determined by the President.

"2. Every white person who shall act as a commissioned or non-commissioned officer, commanding negroes or mulattos against the Confederate States, or who shall arm, organize, train, or prepare negroes or mulattos for military service, or aid them in any military enterprise against the Confederate States, shall, if captured, suffer death.

"3. Every commissioned or non-commissioned officer of the enemy who shall incite slaves to rebellion, or pretend to give them freedom, under the aforementioned Act of Congress and Proclamation, by abducting or causing them to be abducted, or inducing them to abscond, shall, if captured, suffer death.

"4. That every person charged with an offence under this Act shall be tried by such military courts as the President shall direct, and, after conviction, the President may commute the punishment, or pardon unconditionally or on such terms as he may see fit.

"5. That the President is hereby authorized to resort to such other retaliatory measures as in his judgment may be best calculated to repress the atrocities of the enemy."

Mr. Phelan, of Mississippi, submitted a minority report from the same committee, in the form of a lengthy preamble and the following resolution:—

"Be it resolved, &c., that from this day forth all rules of civilized warfare should be discarded in the future defence of our country, our liberties, and our lives, against the fell design now openly avowed by the Government of the United States to annihilate or enslave us; and that a war of extermination should henceforth be waged against any invader whose hostile foot shall cross the boundaries of these Confederate States."

Mr. Hill.—I must be allowed to say for myself that I regard the Proclamation of Mr. Lincoln as a mere brutum fulmen, and so intended by its author. It is to serve a temporary purpose at the North. I fear we are dignifying it beyond its importance. As the Senate has concluded to notice it, I am in favour of the simplest and most legal action. We must confine our action within the line of right, under the laws of nations. In my opinion we have the right to declare certain acts as crimes, being in conflict with civilized war, and the actors as criminals; and a criminal, though a soldier, is not entitled to be considered a prisoner of war. While, therefore, I approve the general idea—to treat persons guilty of certain acts as criminals—contained in the Bill reported by the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. Semmes), and agree to that report as being the one most favoured by the majority of the Committee, I also in accordance with the understanding of the Committee, propose the following Bill, and ask that it be printed for the consideration of the Senate:—

"1. That if any person singly, or in organized bodies, shall, under pretence of waging war, kill or maim, or in anywise injure the person of any unarmed citizen of the Confederate States, or shall destroy or seize or damage the property, or invade the house or domicile, or insult the family of such unarmed citizen; or shall persuade or force any slave to abandon his owner, or shall, by word or act, counsel or incite to servile insurrection within the limits of the Confederate States, all such persons, if captured by the forces of the Confederate States, shall be treated as criminals, and not as prisoners of war, and shall be tried by a military court, and on conviction, suffer death.

2. That every person pretending to be a soldier or officer of the United States who shall be captured on the soil of the Confederate States after the 1st day of January, 1863, shall be presumed to have entered the territory of the Confederate States with intent to incite insurrection and abet murder, and, unless satisfactory proof be adduced to the contrary before the military court before which the trial shall be had, shall suffer death. This section shall continue in force until the Proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln, dated at Washington on the 22nd day of September, 1862, shall be rescinded, and the policy therein announced shall be abandoned, and no longer.

Mr. Clerk, of Missouri, read a preamble and resolution embracing his views on the subject under consideration. The resolution proposed to recognize the enemy as "savage, relentless and barbarous," and declared that it "is the duty of the Government of the Confederate States neither to ask quarter for its soldiers nor extend it to the enemy until an awakened or created sense of decency and humanity, or the sting of retaliation, shall have compelled our enemy to adopt or practise the usages of war which prevail among Christian and civilized nations."

On the motion of Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, the several bills and resolutions were ordered to be printed.

In the House of Representatives on the same day, Mr. Chilton, of Alabama, offered the following:—

"Whereas, it is manifest that, despairing of the subjugation of the Confederate States, or any of them, the Congress and President of the United States have deliberately set about the work of inciting the slave population of these States to insurrection by declaring them emancipated from and after the 1st day of January, 1863, which action on the part of the said Congress and President is in direct violation of the Constitution which they were sworn to support, in contravention of all laws human and divine, and has been resorted to for the diabolical purpose of involving the slaves and their masters, embracing innocent women and children, in one common ruin, and for the further purpose of maintaining themselves in power by catering to the fanatical spirit of Abolitionism; and whereas each of the States of this Confederacy has enacted laws punishing with death all persons engaged in inciting the slave population to insurrection or rebellion, and there is much stronger reason for inflicting this penalty upon persons who not only voluntarily conspire to perpetuate this horrible felony, but, in addition thereto, come to devastate our land, burn our dwellings, waste our substance, and murder our citizens; therefore, The Congress of the Confederate States do resolve that, so long as the Proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, the President of the United States, dated the 22nd day of September, 1862, proposing to emancipate the slaves of this Confederacy from and after the 1st day of January, 1863, shall remain unrevoked, all commissioned officers of the United States' army who shall be seized, captured, taken, or arrested within the limits of this Confederacy after the said 1st day of January, 1863, shall be deemed and held voluntarily to have entered the Confederate States for the purpose of maintaining said Proclamation, and of bringing about the result thereby contemplated—of servile insurrection; and the said officers shall in nowise be regarded or treated as prisoners of war, but as felons; and it shall be the duty of the President to cause to be constituted a sufficient number of courts-martial to try said offenders, and, if condemned, to see that they are promptly executed by being hanged by the neck until they are dead.

"2. Resolved, That should said Lincoln's Proclamation continue unrevoked on the 1st day of January, 1863, the President of the Confederate States shall make a proclamation that he will cause these resolutions to be strictly enforced."

Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

In the Virginian Legislature, Mr. Callin, of Petersburg offered the following:—

"Whereas Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by his recent Proclamation, is acting in stolid contempt of the principles of property in slaves, which is no less consecrated in the Federal Constitution than in ours, and is aiming by said Proclamation to excite servile insurrection in our midst.

"Resolved, therefore, that no person within this State shall be held to have committed any offence against the criminal laws thereof, or shall be tried or imprisoned or be required to answer at any time for an act done in driving from the State or putting to death any person, with or without arms, who may be found on our soil aiding in any way to give effect to the fiendish purpose of said proclamation."

WEST INDIES.

A private letter from St. Vincent, dated October 9, says:—

"St. Vincent is in a state of riot; the negroes have arisen, beaten the managers, burnt and destroyed property, and threatened the usual atrocities—such as possession of property, division of white women, murder of all whites afterwards, &c.—in fact, they say they will make it a second Hayti. But they have been put down for the present by the action of the principal people, who have formed a cavalry corps and dispersed them. The presence of H.M.S. Challenger, for whose assistance a message was sent to Trinidad, secures the town. These rebels are still dispersed over the country, and it will be a difficult matter to bring them to justice. About 100 of them have been taken, and about twenty killed and wounded in the cavalry charges.

"The feeling pervading these people generally is one of extermination for the whites. They want their own way, and desire to relapse into barbarity, are very averse to law and order, except when it suits them specially—nor is British law, as here carried out, at all applicable for beings so low in the order of humanity. In some outlying districts they actually took possession of some estates, one after the other. They hurried, saying, 'Black proprietor, black attorney, manager, and overseer—this field for you, Buddy (a negro word), that for me,' &c. The negroes, however, are slow and undecided in their doings, consequently they gave time for most of the people to escape into town, but the town is full of the greatest villains; and in fact life and property are daily becoming less and less secure in the British West India islands.

"This is a truthful report of the condition of things here, notwithstanding anything that may be written by those persons (officials or others) whose interest it is to make it appear things are going on swimmingly."

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

Nos. I. to XXVIII. NOW READY.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent commercial, however remote, however small the class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—startled Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Savannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

AMERICA.

When every other device fails, the Washington Government amuses its subjects by reporting that General McClellan is "on to Richmond." The farce is no longer particularly attractive. In the first place, the Northern public does not believe the often falsified rumour, and secondly, if McClellan had started for Richmond, and was sure of capturing the Confederate capital, it would not rejoice the Northern heart as the prospect of such an achievement would have done in the days of yore. What the people of the United States feel and know now is, that a single victory, or a succession of victories, will not enable them to conquer and hold the South. They cannot disguise from themselves the sheer impossibility of subjugating the eight millions of the South. Hence, except for the electioneering purposes, military affairs are less regarded than formerly. General McClellan is denounced as a traitor; not that his loyalty is really doubted, but in order to secure a few votes. Above the rumours of war we hear a half-smothered cry for mediation; we hear that the people of New York are anxious to know about the plans for European intervention, for it appears impossible, and is truly difficult, for the North to make peace and recognize the independence of the Confederate States, without the friendly intervention that is involved in recognition of the Confederacy, or an offer of mediation. If the European Powers now proffer their friendly offices, it is probable, judging from the tone of public feeling in the North, that they will be accepted. We are merely reproducing an impression that is at present prevalent in New York, and we do so without offering any opinion as to the chances of peace or the continuation of the war.

The elections, so far as they are published, have resulted in unexpectedly large gains to the Democrats. In a few days we shall know the issue of the contest for the State of New York. Mr. Seymour and his friends profess a determination to carry on the war, but no one believes this profession, and a Democratic triumph is looked upon as holding out a prospect of peace. The speeches of the Democrats are remarkably frank in reference to the conduct of the Lincoln Government.

The advance of the so-called Army of the Potomac in a movement which does not appear to be opposed and, as usual, the Federal commanders are ignorant of the whereabouts of their enemy. The Northern papers give several versions of the position of the Confederates and of their intended operations. The first reliable intimation that will be received in Washington and New York of Confederate movements will be the report of an engagement, or another change of the Federal "base of operations." If we could place the slightest faith in the assertions of the Northern press, we should conclude that McClellan was taking what he thinks a dangerous course, in deference to the wishes of the Government, or the clamour of the demagogues of New England.

The Lincoln Government, at the time it is threatening the Confederates with confiscation and death, trembles for the safety of Washington. A commission has been ordered to assemble to report upon the plan of the present forts around Washington, and upon the sufficiency of the present defences of the capital.

An attempt of the Federals to destroy the bridge of the Charleston and Savannah Railway has been defeated. The Federals landed at Mackey's Point, a junction of the Broad and Pocotaligo Rivers, about twenty-five miles from Hilton Head. After a well-contested fight the Federals retired, and admit their loss was "very heavy." The following is General Beauregard's official report:—

Savannah, Georgia, October 23.

The Abolitionists attacked in force Pocotaligo and Cossawatchie yesterday. They were gallantly repulsed to their gunboats at Mackey's Point and Bee's Creek Landing by Colonel W. S. Walker, commanding the troops sent from here. The enemy came in thirteen gunboats and transports. The Charleston Railroad is uninjured. The Abolitionists left their dead and wounded on the field. Our cavalry are in hot pursuit.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

The Richmond Despatch, referring to this affair, says:—

The fight at Pocotaligo resulted in a complete victory. Our loss is 15 killed and 40 wounded. The enemy's total loss is not less than 200 killed and wounded. The enemy's force consisted of six regiments, with one field battery and two boats' howitzers.

It is reported that the Federals have destroyed the Confederate steam salt works at St. Joseph's Bay, Florida; and it is added, "Georgia and Florida relied upon these works for the supply of salt for the winter's provisions for their troops." We may observe that sufficient salt for the whole of the Confederate States can be readily obtained from the Kanawha Valley.

General Bragg's official report of the battle of Perryville, will be read with interest:—

Headquarters Department, No. 2, Bryantsville, Kentucky, Oct. 12.

Sir,—Finding the enemy pressing heavily in his rear, near Perryville, Major-General Hardee, of Polk's command, was obliged to hold and check him at that point. Having arrived at Harrodsburg from Frankfort, I determined to give him battle there, and accordingly concentrated three divisions of my old command—the Army of the Mississippi, now under Major-General Polk, Cheatham's, Buckner's, and Anderson's—and directed General Polk to take command on the 7th, and attack the enemy next morning. Wither's division had gone the day before to support Smith. Hearing on the night of the 7th that the force in front of Smith had rapidly retreated, I moved early next morning to be present at the operations of Polk's forces. The two armies were formed confronting each other on opposite sides of the town of Perryville. After consulting the General, and reconnoitering the ground and examining his disposition, I declined to assume the command, but suggested some changes and modifications of his arrangements, which he promptly adopted. The action opened at half-past 12 p.m., between the skirmishers and artillery on both sides. Finding the enemy indisposed to advance upon us, and knowing he was receiving heavy reinforcements, I deemed it best to assail him vigorously, and so directed the engagement became general soon thereafter, and was continued furiously from that time to dark, our troops never faltering and never failing in their efforts. For the time engaged it was the severest and most desperately contested engagement within my knowledge. Fearfully outnumbered, our troops did not hesitate to engage at any odds; and though checked at times, they eventually carried every position, and drove the enemy about two miles. But for the intervention of night we should have completed the work. We had captured fifteen pieces of artillery by the most daring charges, killed one and wounded two Brigadier-Generals, and a very large number of inferior officers and men, estimated at no less than 4000, and captured 400 prisoners, including three staff officers, with servants, carriage, and baggage of Major-General McCook. The ground was literally covered with his dead and wounded. In such a contest our own loss was necessarily severe, probably not less than 2500 killed, wounded, and missing. Included in the wounded are Brigadier-Generals Wood, Cleburn and Brown—gallant and noble soldiers—whose loss will be severely felt by their commands. To Major-General Polk, commanding the forces; Major-General Hardee, commanding the left wing, two divisions, and Major-Generals Cheatham, Buckner, and Anderson, commanding divisions, are mainly due the brilliant achievements of this memorable field. Nobler troops were never more gallantly led. The country owes them a debt of gratitude which I am sure will be acknowledged. Ascertaining that the enemy was heavily reinforced during the night, I withdrew my force early the next morning to Harrodsburg, and thence to this point. Major-General Smith arrived at Harrodsburg with most of his forces and Wither's division the next day, 10th; and yesterday I withdrew the whole to this point, the enemy following slowly, but not pressing us.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BRAXTON BRAGG, General Commanding.

To Adjutant-General, Richmond, Virginia.

It is rumoured that another attack is to be made on Vicksburg, and this time with a considerable body of troops to support gunboats. The Confederates are said to be well prepared for the attempt. It is reported in New York that the Confederates have taken possession of Island No. 10 on the Mississippi.

Amongst the tales told to please the children of larger growth who have implicit faith in the rumours invented by the correspondents of Northern newspapers, is, that there is an intention of sending General Banks with a large force to conquer Texas, and that the Texans are anxiously awaiting "deliverance." We can promise General Banks, if he will only carry the rumour into effect, that he will meet with a very warm reception from a people who, in proportion to their numbers, have done as much as any State in the Confederacy towards filling the ranks of the Southern army.

General Sherman is jealous of the notoriety of General Butler, and desires to show that he can be as tyrannical, in Memphis, though not so vulgarly brutal, as the last-named commander is in New Orleans. We are told by the Northern journals:—"General Sherman has issued stringent orders for the government of Memphis. A Military Commission sits daily to try offenders under the laws of war. Vagrants and other disreputable characters are organized into gangs and set to work in the trenches or on the streets. Citizens are to keep indoors between tattoo and reveillé, unless attending church, places of amusement, or necessary business. After midnight all persons, except guards, must be in their houses. Assemblages of negroes are forbidden, except by permission of the Provost-Marshal." The term "disreputable characters" is very comprehensive, and may include all those who do not think the spoliation of Southern towns by foreign mercenaries a holy work.

General Buell "has ordered that all persons who have actively aided rebellion in Kentucky within the last three months shall be arrested and sent out of Kentucky, and forbidden to return." There is something grand in exiling all but a small minority of the inhabitants of a large State. Who are the naughty people from whom General Bragg obtained 4700 wagons of stores? Who are the naughty people who saw the 4700 wagons being prepared, and did not inform the vigilant Federal commander of the important fact? If General Buell cannot fight, he knows how to imitate "Lincoln thunder."

As a specimen of the respect for law in the North, we are told:—"The Writ of Habeas Corpus in the case of Mr. W. H. Winder, who is confined in Fort Warren, issued by Judge Clifford, of the United States' Circuit Court, has not been served, because Colonel Dimmick, Commander of Fort Warren, has refused a pass to the fort." Surely the people must be startled at seeing the writ of the United States' Circuit Court thus practically defied.

The Governor of North Carolina has made the following appeal to the people of his State. To carry on the war of independence, all must make sacrifices; and whilst the soldiers want warm clothing, carpets must be regarded as dispensable luxuries:—

After the most strenuous exertions on the part of its officers, the State finds it impossible to clothe and shoe our soldiers without again appealing to that overflowing fountain of generosity, the private contributions of our people. The rigours of winter are approaching, our soldiers are already suffering, and must suffer more if our sympathies are not practical and active. The Quartermaster's Department is labouring faithfully to provide for them, but owing to speculation and extortion will fall short. The deficiency must be supplied by the people. We shall have an active winter campaign, and how can our troops, if ragged, cold, and barefoot, contend with the splendidly equipped columns of the enemy? The articles most needed, and which the State finds it most difficult to supply, are shoes, socks, and blankets, though drawers, shirts, and pants, would be gladly received. If every farmer who has hides tanning, would agree to spare one pair of shoes, and if every mother in North Carolina would knit one strong pair of either thick cotton or woollen socks for the army, they would be abundantly supplied. A great lot of blankets also might yet be spared from private use, and thousands could be made from the carpets upon our parlour floors. With good warm houses and cotton bed clothing, we can certainly get through the winter much better than the soldiers can with all the blankets we can give them. The colonels of militia regiments throughout the State are hereby appointed agents for the purchase and collection of all such articles as can be spared by our people; who, through their respective captains, are ordered immediately to canvass every county and visit every citizen in their beats for this purpose. A liberal price will be paid for everything where the owner feels that he or she is not able to donate it, and active agents will immediately forward them to our suffering regiments. Expenses will be allowed the officers engaged in the duty, and transportation furnished the colonels or their agents to bring the articles to Raleigh. And now, my countrymen and women, if you have anything to spare for the soldier, in his name I appeal to you for it. Do not let the speculator have it, though he offer you enormous prices; spurn him from your door, and say to him that our brave defenders have need for it, and shall have it without passing through his greedy fingers. Do not place yourselves among the extortioners; they are the vilest and most cowardly of all our country's enemies; and when this war is ended, and people come to view the matter in its proper light, you will find that the most detested Tories are more respected than they. When they tempt you with higher prices than the State offers, just think for a moment of the soldier, and what he is doing for you. Remember, when you sit down by the bright and glowing fire, that the soldier is sitting upon the cold earth; that in the wind which is whistling so fearfully over your roof, only making you feel the more comfortable because it harms you not, he is shivering in darkness on the dangerous outpost, or shuddering through the dreary hours of his watch. Remember that when you come forth in the morning, well fed and warmly clad, leading your families towards the spot where the blessed music of the Sabbath bells tells you of the peaceful worship of the God of Peace, the soldier is going forth at the same moment, perhaps, half-fed, after a night of shivering and suffering, to where the roar of artillery and shout of battle announce that he is to die, that your peace and safety may be preserved. Oh, remember these things, generous and patriotic people of North Carolina, and give freely of your perishable goods to those who are giving all that mortal man can give for your safety and your rights.

Z. B. VANCE.

Raleigh, October 15.

A duel has taken place at Charleston, in which Colonel W. R. Calhoun was shot dead by Major A. M. Rhett.

Besides the difficulty of getting recruits, symptoms of insubordination have shown themselves in the Federal regiments. Isolated cases of insubordination are not so important as the general want of discipline in the Federal forces. The following has been published in the Northern papers:—

Too much laxity prevails with regard to soldiers leaving their regimental camps and wandering beyond the limits of their commands. Hereafter not more than two men of each company will be granted passes to leave camps. Provost Guards will arrest all absentees from camp without proper permits. The reports of recent inspections exhibit a shameful neglect of duty on the part of many officers of the higher as well as lower grades in this army in those lesser details of discipline, failure to attend diligently to which will produce the demoralization of any body of troops. Inspections in many organizations are rarely made, drills are poorly attended and unfrequent, cleanliness disregarded, the care of arms and ammunition but little attended to, and the instruction of officers in tactics and regulations entirely neglected. Brigade and division drills in some cases are laid aside, the general orders published from time to time by the War Department for the instruction and guidance of the troops are not promulgated to the regiments and batteries. The prompt distribution and promulgation of orders is one of the first duties of staff officers, and commanding officers are made responsible that staff officers are not neglectful in this respect. The Commanding General is convinced that some examples of summary dismissals of officers are necessary to ensure attention to this point of duty, before the importance of the subject will be fully realized. He gives notice, therefore, that any neglect in this respect of staff or commanding officers that comes to his notice will secure his immediate recommendation for the summary dismissal of the delinquent.

The Committee, composed "of the best Union men" in Baltimore, appointed to report on charges of disloyalty and corruption, was broken up by General Wool, and its members arrested. This was going a little too far for the present, and accordingly Mr. Lincoln has ordered the release of the prisoners. The officers of the United States either are guilty of unheard-of tyranny without orders, or the Washington Government repudiates its orders when it is politic or necessary to do so.

The British steamer Wachuta has been captured by the Federal gunboat Memphis. She was captured after a full day's chase off the coast of North Carolina.

In reference to General Butler's raid upon "the family spoons" placed on board the Prussian vessel the Essex, the Baltic Gazette contains a letter which thus describes the progress of the affair:—

If the most recent news from New Orleans is confirmed, General Butler, on the 9th ult., after having illegally detained the vessel for twenty-five days, and forcibly removed about $30,000 worth of valuable property from on board, had set her at liberty. According to the law in this case, the owners of the vessel will not be liable in England for the amount of the valuables in question, as the captain is not responsible for the consequences of an exercise of force by a foreign ruler or his representative, and it will be the business of the interested parties (partly English subjects) to demand at Washington the restoration of their property. However, the owner of the ship Essex, by means of the Prussian Minister at Washington, has made a claim on the Government of the United States for the loss caused to him in so shameful a manner, and has claimed the protection, and especially the support, of the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Berlin. The amount claimed as compensation is very considerable, and is comprised under various heads, including the maintenance of the numerous passengers during the twenty-five days' detention, the wages and support of the crew of twenty-five men for a month, the loss of the freight on the $30,000 worth of property removed, the interest on about 60,000 Prussian thalers invested in the ship, loss of time, and other items, so that the total amount of the claim will be about $25,000."

One of the most curious items of news brought by the last steamer is, that the Federal Governor of North Carolina has proposed to hold a conference with the Confederate Governor of the State, to discuss the position of public affairs, and the aspect of the war.

Even in Chesapeake Bay the Federal shipping is not safe. The Confederates carry on war in a most aggravating fashion. The New York ship Alleghany, bound from Baltimore to London, with a cargo of guano, was captured on Wednesday, in Chesapeake Bay, by a party of Confederates from the shore, and burnt. The captain, mate, and pilot were taken prisoners. We presume the New York Chamber of Commerce will protest against such an outrage on the humanity which applauds the conduct of Mitchell and Turchin.

The panic of the New York merchants is increased by the report, widely circulated and generally believed, that the "Merrimac No. 2" is ready for sea.

The Northern press is angry with General Mitchell on account of his repulse at Mackey Point and Pocotaligo.

It is reported that Mr. Lincoln "has expressed his surprise and regret at the turn which the elections have already taken." It is natural he should be surprised, for the most sanguine Democrat could not have expected such brilliant success; and if he is inclined to countenance a despotic rule he may well regret the revival of a Constitutional party.

ENGLAND.

The sufferings of the unemployed operatives are aggravated as their numbers increase. No man can now help his neighbour; the ruin of the operatives is dragging down the classes intermixed with and dependent on them; cottage owners have no rents, and shopkeepers no customers; and the muster-roll of paupers lengthens fearfully day by day. Last week the increase was nearly 12,000, distributed as follows:—

Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	2,230	Manchester	2,130
Blackburn	790	Preston	1,040
Bolton	370	Rochdale	1,120
Burnley	450	Salford	450
Bury	370	Stockport	320
Chorley	110	Todmorden	250
Chorlton	720	Warrington	60
Glossop	100	Wigan	70
Haslingden	990
Liverpool	150	Total	11,780
Macclesfield	60

Above one-tenth of the whole population of the suffering districts are now paupers, and as many more are dependent on the Relief Committees. Altogether, we may safely affirm that at least one-fourth of the population are without any other dependence than charity, public or private. This is the case in some districts containing a considerable population wholly unconnected with the cotton manufacture, and it is therefore clear that in those places which entirely depend upon it a large majority of the people must be almost starving.

Fever spreads in Preston—fever due solely to hunger and cold. It is said to be of the same nature as that which made such havoc in Ireland while the potatoe disease deprived the people of their food; in fact, that fatal form of typhus which is the peculiar companion of famine. For this new scourge, be it never forgotten, we have to thank Mr. Lincoln and the Northern people, for whom some men born in England still dare to invoke our English sympathies. There are in Preston 34,000 persons on the books of the Relief Committee; in Blackburn 24,000, of whom some are included in the 21,000 relieved by the Guardians of the Poor. In Stockport 24,000 are receiving relief from the parish or from charity. These unhappy sufferers do not—and scarcely can—receive enough to provide them with such food and clothing as are requisite to keep them in health; and if some further effort be not made, pestilence will, before the spring, have spread throughout the whole of the suffering districts. If the Government will not take courage to cure the calamity, the nation must come to the rescue at once, with ample means of alleviation.

The Mansion-house Committee met on Saturday, the last day of Mr. Cubitt's mayoralty. On that day and on Friday £6700 had been subscribed, and the total of the fund received by this Committee exceeded £125,000. They distributed £8000; making a total of above £68,000. A vote of thanks has been passed to the Times for its constant readiness to open its columns to all details relative to the distress of the manufacturing population; and the retiring Lord Mayor was similarly honoured.

The Central Executive Committee met at Manchester on Monday. Receipts exceeding £11,000 were reported; and £30,000 distributed, making £60,000 within the month. The Duke of Marlborough has commenced a collection in Oxfordshire, of which he is Lord Lieutenant. Lord Auckland sends another £1000, making in all £2600, the produce of a collection in his diocese of Bath and Wells. The Bishop of Lincoln has recommended a collection to his clergy. The subscription at Bradford is said to have reached nearly £15,000. Several spontaneous collections among bodies of workmen in prosperous trades have realized small sums.

The following is the weekly report of Mr. Farnall:—

Manchester, November 10.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—The distress which pervades the cotton manufacturing district has now reached the Unions of the Fylde and Garstang and the township of Saddleworth; those three places, therefore, are entered in the tabular report which I have the honour of presenting to you. The number of persons receiving parochial relief in these three places is 4252. In the 24 Unions on which I have hitherto reported to you there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief as compared with the number so relieved on the 25th ult., of 11,839. For the week ending the 1st inst. there were 224,712 persons receiving parochial relief in the 27 unions which are now included in this report; in the corresponding week of last year there were 48,426 persons so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 176,286 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 364.0 per cent. The total weekly cost of outdoor relief, both in kind and in money, is now £14,411 5s. 4d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2398 5s.; there is, therefore, an increase of £12,012 19s. 4d. per week, or 501.0 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions is now 11.3; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.4 per cent. The highest percentage of pauperism on the population of any one of the 27 unions is at present 22.3, and the lowest is 4.0. The average amount of outdoor relief per head per week, both in kind and in money, in these unions, is 1s. 4½d., the lowest 1s. 0½d., and the highest 1s. 8d., at Glossop. I have received no returns for the week ended the 1st inst., from the unions of Oldham, Stockport, and Todmorden, and therefore the figures inserted in this week's reports for those unions are the same as those inserted in my previous report. It is, however, right to add that the Guardians of the Todmorden Union meet fortnightly only. I beg to inform you that I have addressed notes to the secretaries of the various local committees of charity, requesting them to report weekly to me, in printed forms (with which I have supplied them), the number of persons, not being paupers, whom those committees aid weekly, and the amount of money which they weekly disburse. I hope, therefore, to be able to insert in each of my subsequent reports to you the important information which may thus be given me.

At a subsequent meeting of the General Committee, the Earl of Derby brought forward the following resolution:—

That, in order to give a more national character to the labours of the Central Committee, and to afford ready means of co-operation to all benevolent persons who may desire to assist in mitigating the distress which has fallen upon the population engaged in the cotton manufacture, a letter be addressed to the Lords-Lieutenant of counties, the mayors of boroughs, and others possessed of local authority or influence, suggesting the appointment of committees for the promotion of subscriptions in their respective districts, and for the transmission of the proceeds thereof from time to time to the Central Committee for distribution; that such committees, when formed, be requested to place themselves in communication with the secretary of the Central Committee, who will be directed to furnish them with every information in his power; that the chairmen of all such committees be invited to become members of the Central Committee, with the full right of attending and voting thereat.

Some debate took place, in the course of which

Mr. Cobden said the wording of the resolution entirely met his approval. What he had wished to suggest was, that the General Committee should be employed in collecting while the Executive Committee distributed it. He was afraid now, as he had been from the first, if the American civil war went on, a great gulf was yawning before them, into which they had not had the courage to look. We appeared to be advancing in destitution at the rate of nearly 3000 per day. He thought the case of Lancashire was that of a strong man suddenly struck down by paralysis, and unable to help himself. There was a mistake in Manchester being confounded with Lancashire, because the town itself was a great emporium, the merchants of which might yet be able to do something; but the case of Oldham and the manufacturing towns was a very different one. He understood £300,000 would be wanted for clothing before Christmas, which was more than they had yet raised altogether. He would not wait a day in appealing to Manchester and the rest of Lancashire, but appeal to the whole country at once. Manchester and the rest of Lancashire would do its part in time. He mentioned instances in his own knowledge of the noble help given by individual manufacturers. He differed from the noble lord as to the Queen; he did not think they should abstain from asking the patronage of the Queen. He called attention to the suggestion from Birmingham, that no time should be lost in distributing clothing. Typhus fever was no respecter of persons; and to say that England, with abundance of provisions in the country, could not find the means of supporting a mere section of the working community he thought was out of the question if proper efforts were made.

The motion was carried unanimously.

There has been a disgraceful riot at Blackburn; wholly unconnected, however, with the terrible distress which prevails there. Some poachers had been taken in the neighbourhood, and were tried and condemned by the borough magistrates. A mob surrounded the court, and threatened the rescue of the criminals, and a violent attack upon the witnesses for the prosecution. Being defeated in their attempt, they smashed several windows, and proceeded to amuse themselves in the same fashion in several of the principal streets, caring very little to whom belonged the windows that served them as targets. Several of the rioters were arrested. The Relief Committee investigated the matter, and published their opinion that it had no connection with the distress of the operatives; the ringleaders of the riot being the relatives and associates of the convicted poachers, and their misguided followers, chiefly young lads—always ripe for mischief in Blackburn, as elsewhere, when they have nothing to do.

The Lord Mayor's procession and dinner took place on the 10th (the 9th being Sunday). As the Prince of Wales, born on Lord Mayor's Day 1841, has just come of age, his Royal Highness's majority and expected marriage with the Princess Alexandra of Denmark were among the principal topics of the evening. In returning thanks for the toast of her Majesty's Ministers, Lord Palmerston touched slightly and cautiously on American affairs. He said:—

The Lord Mayor has adverted to a topic which must excite the deepest feelings of sorrow on the part of every man and woman in the country. I allude to the distress which unfortunately prevails in a part of our manufacturing districts. Let us hope that the cause of that distress may not long continue, although it must be owned that there is not at present any immediate prospect that more humane feelings and more kindly sentiments are likely to prevail between the contending parties on the American continent; but we may trust that India will supply to a certain degree that raw material which is essential to the industry of our manufacturing population; and if those products which India may send us should be sedulously used in this country, and we be not tempted by the wants of other nations to send that cotton away as fast as it arrives (hear, hear, and laughter), I trust that India may find the means of supplying in some measure the wants which the civil war in America has created.

In the course of a speech worthy of his best days, Lord Brougham vindicated the Lancashire operatives from the charge of improvidence, and declared that the cotton famine was an event which no one could be expected to foresee or provide against. He said:—

I would fain entertain a hope, but I cannot more than my noble friend at the head of the Government, who has admitted that he cannot foresee any speedy termination to the war. (Hear, hear.) The fact is that we, England and France, have looked on with great interest, and with perfect feelings of kindness and friendship towards both the contending parties, for which reason we have not been much liked by either. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) But if there is little chance of any effectual advice being given or an intervention of any other description being resorted to by the Powers of Europe, at least let Americans listen to their own advocates in this country—to us, who supported them half a century ago, when nobody said a word in their favour; to us, who were charged with being almost seditiously, if not treasonably, the advocates of America as against our own country in her disputes with America. (Hear, hear.) Let them listen to our advice, to our strong and earnest entreaties, that they would, as speedily as possible, put an end to this cruel and unnatural war. (Great cheering.) I will tell them, that besides its ordinary evils; besides the waste of blood, the waste of treasure, the suffering of every kind, the misery and anxiety which involve the whole country, and which they ought by every means to put an end to, there is another fear—there is another risk which they run, a risk which they run more and more every month that this cruel contest is continued—I mean the increased numbers of armed men habituated to blood, habituated to rapine and to pillage, to every sort of evil attendant on war, and in whom the habit is becoming a second nature; these men, these multitudes, with arms in their hands, will be increased in numbers, and their habits will become more inveterate every month that the contest is prolonged. Then we shall see the whole of America consist of armed men, brought up in war, and in the habits that war always engenders. There is nothing worse than the tyranny of a tyrant. (Hear, hear.) Yes; there is one thing still worse, and that is the tyranny of an armed mob. (Loud cheers.) And if that people will continue with arms in their hands, imured to war, incapable of peaceful occupations, habituated to pillage and bloodshed, that habit, I repeat, will become their second nature—they will be the worst kind of tyrants under which men can live—the worst kind of foes that liberty can encounter. For heaven's sake then, for their own sake, for humanity's sake, I trust they will avoid that lot which I have just described—a lot that is at once deplorable and degrading.

Mr. Corrie, late Secretary of the Admiralty in Lord Derby's Administration, and Mr. Buxton, son of the famous Abolitionist, Sir Fowell Buxton, have spoken out on the American war. The former writes to the chairman of a meeting in Ireland:—

The neutrality we have hitherto observed, for which we have received small thanks from the Northern States, has been admitted by Mr. Gladstone to have told practically against the Confederates; and I confess it is a subject of painful regret to me that any part of the weight of this great empire should be placed in the balance against a brave people fighting for independence against fearful odds, and whose heroism and patriotism are so well deserving of our admiration. I believe there is no doubt that it is the influence of England which has hitherto, from a comparatively early period of the war, prevented the recognition of the Confederate States by one, at least, of the great European Powers. If that be so, the greater will be the responsibility attaching to us if we make no attempt to terminate this fratricidal and hopeless struggle.

He thinks the time has come for an effort to bring the war to a speedy conclusion. Mr. Buxton says:—

I look to the time when it may be possible for all the European Powers together to offer intervention, not by recognizing the South, but in the way of mediation. At present, however, there seems to be nothing for England but the most absolute neutrality, and she may well be neutral, not only in policy, but in feeling. We have no reason to love the Southern slaveowners. On the other hand, I can discover no real ground for wishing victory to the North.

The following correspondence has taken place relative to the destruction of neutral property on board Federal vessels by the Alabama.

THE RIGHT HON. EARL RUSSELL, ETC., HER MAJESTY'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

My Lord,—I have been requested by the Council of this Chamber to inform you that they have had brought before them the facts of the destruction at sea, in one case, and of seizure and release under ransom bond in another case, of British property on board Federal vessels (the Manchester and the Tonawanda) by an armed cruiser sailing under the Confederate flag, the particulars of which have, no doubt, been already laid before your lordship. As the question is one of serious importance to the commerce of this country, the Council wish me most respectfully to solicit the favour of your lordship's acquainting them, for the information of the mercantile community, what, in the opinion of her Majesty's Government, is the position of the owners of such property in those and other similar cases. Submitting this question, with every respect, to your lordship,

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your most obedient humble servant,
THOMAS CHILTON, President.

Chamber of Commerce, Liverpool, November 6.

TO THOMAS CHILTON, ESQ., CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, LIVERPOOL.

Sir,—I am directed by Earl Russell to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th inst., calling attention to the recent proceedings of the armed vessel Alabama with regard to British property on board the Federal vessels Manchester and Tonawanda, and requesting the opinion of her Majesty's Government with regard to the position of the owners of such property in those and other similar cases which may arise, and I am to request that you will inform the Council of the Chamber of Commerce that the matter is under the consideration of her Majesty's Government. I am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,
Foreign Office, November 7, E. HAMMOND.

At a meeting of the Juridical Society, a discussion has taken place on the law of blockade. Lord Stanley, advertent to the recent propositions of Mr Cobden, said:—

There were three questions they would have to consider in advocating the proposed alteration—first, whether they were not equalizing the powers of the combatants, and enabling them to continue the contest; secondly, whether they were not taking away the inducements to neutrals to bring about a peace; and, thirdly, would they not diminish the interest of the people of the belligerent countries in asking for a cessation of hostilities?

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The great topic of the week is the proposal for a joint intervention by France, England, and Russia to urge upon the American belligerents the conclusion of an armistice. The Morning Herald announced last week that such a proposal had been or would be made by France; on Saturday, that it had been made, and that Russia had accepted it. The Patrie of Monday has the following:—

We yesterday confirmed the news already spread for some days in England of an attempt at mediation projected by France and Russia in America.

The initiative of this step is due to the Imperial Government. The proposition emanating from France has been immediately accepted by Russia, and it is with this important adhesion that the same proposition has just been made to the British Government. What will be the reply of the Cabinet of St. James's? Public opinion is anxious to ascertain it. The joint action of France and of Russia might, perhaps, suffice to assure at Richmond and at Washington the success of an offer of mediation. France exercises a legitimate influence in America, due to her conciliating and frank policy, and recently to her intervention in the Trent affair. Russia, on her part, still entertains intimate relations with the Northern States, formed by the exchange of services the least forgotten of which date from the Crimean war.

But we do not hesitate to admit that on this occasion the concurrence of England is almost indispensable. The common action of the Cabinets of Paris and of St. Petersburg would be powerfully strengthened by the adhesion of Great Britain, whose political position is especially understood on the other side of the Atlantic.

Yet, if we are to credit the still somewhat vague reports in circulation, the proposition of France and Russia has not met with a favourable reception at London. A Cabinet Council is to be held on Tuesday, and at this Council the Palmerston Cabinet will adopt its resolutions.

The Times of yesterday had an article against the project, but intimating that the Government had not yet arrived at a final decision.

The Emperor has received Mr. Slidell at Compiègne.

SPAIN.—The Spanish Government has sent five frigates to the Havannah, and has demanded the punishment of the officers of the Montgomery. It is believed that the American Government will make sufficient reparation—which, indeed, Mr. Seward has always shown himself willing to do, when he dare no longer refuse it.

The latest advices confirm our opinion. The spirited remonstrance of Spain has made the Lincoln Government offer a humble, almost abject apology. The American Minister at Madrid has been instructed by his Government to state that the conduct of the captain of the Montgomery was unpardonable; to offer to punish him; and to give satisfaction to the Spanish Government.

DENMARK.—Though the German Confederation shows a disposition to renew its series of encroachments on the Danish monarchy, and though Lord Russell—without regard to justice, truth, reason, honour, or consistency—has given the support of England to the nefarious schemes of aggression hatched at Vienna and Berlin, the Danes are not disposed tamely to submit to insult, or to endure without resistance the dismemberment of their country. At a dinner given by the King to the Chambers (the Parliament of the "kingdom," not including Schleswig or Holstein) the President of the Upper House addressed his Majesty in a speech full of loyal feeling and patriotic resentment against the foreign disturbers of the peace of Denmark. The King replied:—

My friends, my true friends, receive my thanks for the toast this moment proposed. I heartily thank you for the many good wishes expressed therein. I have taken note of all, and I am confident that my faithful, good, and affectionate Danish people will stand by me (yes, yes) in my endeavours to preserve the integrity of my country. Should it be God Almighty's will that I should be forced to draw the sword, I know that you will all gather around me.

GERMANY.—A conflict on a point of privilege arose the other day between the two Houses of the Reichsrath at Vienna; the Lower having struck out certain items from the estimates of the Foreign Office, which the Upper House thought fit to restore. The matter was compromised by a general reduction of the supplies voted by the amount which the Lower House had struck out.

ITALY.—The policy of M. Drouyn de Lhuys is, it seems, at last declared, and the Italian Government has been distinctly told that it shall not have Rome for its capital. France acknowledges the vigour and good faith with which the Italian Government acted in the suppression of Garibaldi's rash and deplorable attempt; but declines to reward those virtues by abandoning to Italy Rome and the Papacy. At no time did France engage to do anything of the kind; on the contrary, she has constantly expressed a firm resolution to defend Rome against all aggression, and to protect the independence and the sovereignty of the Pope. This is all very well; but if France insists on staying at Rome to protect the Pope, we must hope that she will compel His Holiness to withdraw his protection from the banditti who issue from the Roman States to do in the Abruzzi the work which the Federal armies have been doing in Tennessee and Virginia. The real grievance of Italy is not that the Patrimony of St. Peter is withheld from her, but that it is allowed to be the asylum of hordes of brigands, who plunder and assassinate on Italian soil, and then take refuge beyond the Papal frontier. If the Emperor would give orders for the suppression and condign punishment of Schiavone and his fellows, he would remove the strongest ground of complaint against the occupation of Rome by his troops.

The following remarkable passage occurring in a letter, written by M. de Persigny to the Archbishop of Bordeaux a year ago, has been published by the Indépendance Belge:—

We went to Italy, because an interest of the first order, a vital interest for France, did not allow her, without great danger to herself, to abandon the peninsula to Austria. After our victories we proclaimed the independence of Italy, because, in addition to the great consideration of respect for peoples, France could not, without incurring the greatest danger, assume the invidious, dangerous, fatal character of reducing that country to servitude in her turn. Unfortunately the double necessity we lie under of destroying the dominion of Austria and not replacing it by our own, inevitably brought the Court of Rome into a very serious situation. Unable, long before the Italian war, to govern his diminutive State, unless Italy was under the yoke of Austria or France, the Government of the Pope was thus stricken with impotency in the eyes of all, and thus, out of those circumstances, quite independent of any individual will, has arisen the grave difficulty we have to deal with. It is, indeed, a strange situation. Whilst on the one hand the interest of France requires the free self-government of Italy, without entailing upon us any sacrifice of blood or treasure in a hateful mission, on the other the interest of religion requires that the Pope—whether he be in the enjoyment of his temporal power or no matters not—should be equally independent. Hence the duty for us of neither sacrificing the Pope nor Italy to each other. Hence that double cause which is difficult, but which it is not impossible to conciliate. Hence the criminal hope of parties that the Emperor will allow himself to be pressed into betraying the interests of France by sacrificing either the independence of Italy or that of the Pope.

Mr Partridge has again visited General Garibaldi, and made, in conjunction with Dr. Pirogoff, chief of the medical department of the Russian army at Sebastopol, and perhaps the first authority on wounds in Europe, a careful examination into the state of the wound in the ankle, and the general health of the illustrious sufferer. M. Nelaton, the eminent French surgeon, imagined that he had felt the ball in the wound, but this appears to have been an error; though the doctors differ as to the probability that the ball is still in the wound. These repeated examinations do the patient harm, but his general condition is excellent; he eats, sleeps and looks well. He is troubled with visitors, especially English; but means have been taken to keep the swarm at a distance. Amputation will not be necessary, and with rest, quiet, and good air, the injured limb may probably recover, if not all, yet a great part of its former powers. The General has a bed and a swing for his foot, which have been sent from England; he has also asked for a wheel-chair, which will be procured for him. He has been removed, by the advice of the doctors, to Pisa, and has borne the journey well.

GREECE.—The Greek revolution remains in statu quo. Bulgaria, and not Mavrocordato, is the chief of the Government, which has repeated its promises to keep the peace, and has exerted itself to prevent any outrage on the Turkish frontier. The Porte has not taken any of the violent measures which were attributed to it; it has not sent a fleet to the Piræus, and it has not threatened to disperse by force the armed bands collected at Vomitza. But it has prudently ordered the concentration of a strong force, under the name of an army of observation, on its Southern frontier. The astute foreigners and insane Englishmen who are so anxious to deprive Great Britain of her foreign possessions see in the present crisis an excellent opportunity for urging the surrender to Greece of the Ionian Islands, which never at any time belonged to her. It is rumoured that differences of opinion exist between the great Powers, France and Russia being united in pressing the claims of the Duke de Leuchtenberg to the Greek throne, while England, who knows what would be the consequences of a Greek kingdom under the sway of a philo-Russian Prince, in the interests of Turkey and of peace, opposes the Russian candidate. General Grivas is dead.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, November 12.

At the date of our last report, the upward tendency of our market had been checked; the trade had been driven out by the recent advance, and with nominal quotations of 16d. for Fair Dhollerahs, and 24½d. for Middling Orleans, it seemed probable that a smart reaction would ensue.

A dull, lifeless tone has accordingly characterised the market throughout the past week, and with daily sales of 1000 bales, prices have gradually declined, till we are again verging on the lowest point touched a fortnight ago. The sales to-day reached 3000 bales, with a shade more tone, but no improvement in prices; and the increase in the business is attributable to the low prices ruling, which have induced some speculation. Middling Orleans may be quoted 22½d., and Fair Dhollerahs 15d. to 15½d.

Rumours of European mediation in American affairs have been prevalent for some days past; these have mainly emanated from Paris journals, which assert that the French court is willing to join Russia and England in friendly mediation. They further assert that Russia has expressed her willingness to act, if supported by England. The Times, however, to-day, contradicts this assertion, and states that she is only willing to lend the friendly advice which she has tendered since the outbreak of the war. At present there seems no possibility of friendly mediation in America; to propose an armistice and a raising of the blockade would so visibly favour the Southern interest, that the Northern Government would by no means entertain it; and for armed intervention, our Government is not prepared.

The news from America is not of a nature to produce much effect on our market. The grand armies in Virginia have avoided a general engagement, and though McClellan is reported to be advancing, he makes little progress, partly through the want of necessary supplies and the bold front shown by the Confederates, who threaten to take advantage of any false step he may make. Large armaments were in readiness to penetrate the rivers, and the opening of the Mississippi was soon to be attempted. The result of the New York elections of the 4th November is looked forward to with interest; the general feeling here seems to be that even though the Democrats carry the day, as they do not take their seats in Congress for twelve months to come, such a result would have little effect on the duration of the war, though Lincoln's policy might thereby be modified, and some of his most unconstitutional measures rescinded.

Trade in Manchester still continues depressed, and though great firmness is shown by holders, little business can be done at existing prices. The decline here is likely to tempt spinners to come in to a moderate extent, and if so, our market will assume a more steady appearance with greater regularity in prices, but there seems little chance of an immediate advance.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday November 12.

We have to report a very quiet state of things as having pervaded this market since this day week, and as far as yarns are concerned, whether for export or home trade, the advance obtained last week has been completely lost.

The buyers for the German market hold aloof, their orders from their friends amounting to almost nothing.

Gray goods, although not much inquired for, maintain the extreme quotations of last week; there being no disposition shown to concede in the slightest degree, on the part of holders. 36-inch printers might be cleared off in very little time if holders were to yield at all, but the small amount of stock of these goods in Manchester induces no one to press for orders.

To-day our market opened very quiet, and continued so throughout the day. Home trade yarns were offered at a decline of from 1d. to 1½ per lb., but no business resulted.

Cloth was very firm, but we hear of very little actual business.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE LETTER.

The following letter is from an influential Marylander, addressed to a friend in London. It will be found to contain an interesting estimate of the Confederate loss in Maryland, and an account of the conduct of the respective armies in their relations with civilians:—

Baltimore, Maryland, October 4.

I have just returned from the Upper Potomac, where, for the past fortnight, I have been ministering to the sick and wounded, and by your patience, will give you a plain but truthful account of what I saw and heard in the vicinity of the late battles in Maryland. Allow me to preface what I have to say by stating that during my trip I visited Frederick, Buckeystown, Petersville, Burkillsville, Boonsboro, Kudysville, and Sharpsburg; in all of which towns and villages there are hospitals, and it was my custom, when I approached a hospital, to apply to the surgeon in charge for a catalogue of the cases under his care; and therefore I have some confidence in the correctness of the information I may give you.

Official reports, you know, are now regarded in this country as official burlesques of facts, and I am sorry to say that the recent report of so respectable a man as General McClellan has not served to increase my respect for this particular kind of public document. Indeed, sir, as I have gathered up a good many facts touching the results of the recent battles in Maryland, I feel strongly tempted to review General McClellan's report; and as I am not writing to an editor, and therefore need not have the fear of Fort Warren before my eyes, I will just yield to the inclination and allow my pen to proceed.

The first thing I have to say about this report is, that it is a remarkable one; remarkable for what it does not state, and more remarkable for the want of accuracy in what it does state.

Why, sir, General McClellan altogether fails to mention one of the battles of Sunday, a battle in which he lost 500 men and more than one field officer. I refer to the fight at Crampton's Gap. This engagement, while progressing at the same time with that of South Mountain, was nine miles nearer the Potomac, and perfectly distinct from it. The Gap had been left undefended, but as McClellan advanced more rapidly than was expected, General Howell Cobb was despatched from Sandy Hook to take possession of the Gap, and delay General Franklin two hours. This he succeeded in doing, though it was accomplished with the loss of one-half his force, not less than 1000 of the Confederates being killed, wounded, and captured. I walked over the field with —, and saw the spot where the gallant Lamar fell. It was in this brief but fiercely fought battle that Colonel Mathieson, of the 1st California Regiment, was killed. General Franklin's force numbered 35,000, though not more than half of them were engaged.

Another singular omission in this report, but one that is usual with General McClellan, is that he gives us no idea of the strength of the force he commanded. From information derived from a variety of sources, I have concluded that McClellan had from 125,000 to 150,000 men, while Lee awaited his attack with about 60,000.

Nor did the statements I received from officers and men on both sides accord with General McClellan's report as to the results of the battles. I wandered over the battle-field of Antietam for six miles, with —. He pointed out to me the position of McClellan during the battle, the house to which General Hooker was taken when wounded, the general and even the particular arrangements of the two armies; and as he was in the Confederate camp on Thursday, I have full confidence in his declarations. He told me that it was not true that McClellan held the field on Wednesday at dark. The Confederate army, on the right wing, commanded by D. H. Hill, and also on the left, led by Jackson, so far from losing ground during the day, had actually advanced, while the only ground lost was in the centre, under Longstreet, and that gave McClellan no material advantage. That General Lee held the field till Thursday after sundown, and offered battle to McClellan twice during the day, I heard not only from —, but from half-a-dozen other respectable citizens, as well as from soldiers also. McClellan was surprised when Lee crossed the river. He did not know that he had crossed till after 10 o'clock on Friday morning; and — above alluded to told me that he had great difficulty in convincing the officer commanding the first reconnoitering party sent out, that Jackson was not still on this side lying in ambush for them.

General McClellan estimates the entire loss of the Confederates in Maryland at 30,000, of which number 4000 were killed; 18,742 were wounded, 5000 were taken prisoners, and the residue (nearly 5000) were stragglers gathered up after the battles. What a wide discrepancy between his estimate of the Confederate losses and that made by General Lee, who gives in killed, wounded, and missing, in the three battles, something less than 6000 as the entire damage sustained.

From the statistics which follow, you can judge which estimate I think nearest the truth. I know nothing of the killed; all were interred before I reached either field of strife, but the wounded I did see by hundreds and thousands, and I will let the wounded furnish data for my calculations.

McClellan says he captured 1200 wounded Confederates. In this statement he is about correct.

Total Confederates in hospitals	1502

Now, from these figures we must deduct 300 sick left at Frederick and points above, which reduces the total Confederate wounded to 1200 on this side of the Potomac. As regards the other side of the river, I cannot speak so definitely. A friend of mine, Dr. —, a volunteer surgeon, received a pass and visited the hospitals in Sheperdstown and vicinity, and he reported to me 1000 wounded there. I saw yesterday that some 400 had reached Richmond from the battles in Maryland; that would make the number on the other side 1400, which added to the 1200 on this side, adds up 2600 as the Confederate loss in wounded in the three battles of Crampton Gap, South Mountain, and Antietam. Now, sir, suppose we grant I have underestimated the wounded on the other side of the river—for as to this side I am satisfied 1200 will include every man—and that, instead of 1400, there are 1800 or 2000 there; then the aggregate Confederate loss in wounded would amount to nearly 3200, which is something less than one-third of 11,222, McClellan's acknowledged loss in wounded. In fact, sir, no Federal soldier with whom I conversed, hesitated to confess that their loss in wounded was far heavier than the loss of the Confederates, but they accounted for it in this way. "The Confederates" said they "use buck and ball cartridges, while we shoot Minieballs altogether and therefore, while more of our men were wounded, many more of theirs were killed." This explanation would be very good if it were true, but I am sorry to assure the newspaper correspondents who have made so much of it, that it is absolutely false. I saw on the edge of the battle-field a dozen large boxes marked U.S., and labelled, Buck and Ball Cartridge. Moreover, many of the Confederates were wounded with round ball and buck shot; my own brother received a buck shot in the face. Nor is that other statement made by visitors to the battle-field, to the effect that they saw more Confederate dead than Federal, to be relied on; for I could prove in a court of justice, by unimpeachable witnesses, that when the Federal army got possession of the field on Friday, they brought up the Confederate dead from the hollows and obscure places, and laid them in piles along the public highway, that the passers-by might receive the impression that fearful havoc was made among the rebels.

Now, if the Confederate loss in wounded was not more than 3000 or even 4000, then, according to the usual proportion, between the killed and wounded, their killed could not have exceeded 1000. But the Surgeon-general says they buried 3000 dead rebels! So he does, and he also says the Federal loss was only 7800 in killed and wounded, while General McClellan admits that it was 12469, with above 1000 missing. The Surgeon-general also says they captured from 35,000 to 40,000 stand of arms, while General McClellan puts the number as low as 14000; and I happen to know that among these 14,000 there were as many Federal guns as Confederate, for all that were picked up on the field were counted as trophies, no matter to whom they belonged before the battle.

The most amusing thing in the whole report, to one who has been up the country in the neighbourhood of the battle-fields, is the singular manner in which McClellan makes the poor stragglers fill up that magnificent number 30,000. He makes a most generous estimate of Confederate killed and wounded, but still he is short of the desired figures; so he drags out of the mountain fastnesses near 5000 frightened stragglers to fill up the number. I was near a fortnight, wandering at will over hill and dale, riding on horseback and in vehicles, and sometimes walking. I travelled on the public roads, and by the bridle paths which lead over steep mountains and through dark defiles, and I neither saw nor heard of a single straggler who had come from Virginia into Maryland. I did see four boys who had run away in a frolic from Frederick, returning to their mammas, but not a single man who had ever carried a musket as a Confederate soldier. The truth is, sir, General McClellan's friends are constrained to smile at the peculiar manner in which he makes out his 30,000. A Washington paper remarked yesterday, that General McClellan admitted a loss of nearly 15,000, and as the rebels ought to have lost twice as many, he just puts it down at 30,000, though he has hard work to bring up the items.

Is it not strange, too, that the young general does not even hint at the existence of such a place as Harper's Ferry? He tells us, with much particularity, that he captured 13 guns, 7 caissons, 9 limbers, 2 field forges, and 39 colours; but he says not a word of the 73 guns, the 40,000 stand of arms, the $1,500,000 of contrabands, the 100 tons of powder, and the 12,000 men that Jackson captured at Harper's Ferry; and he preserves an equally wise silence in respect to the result of a reconnoissance in force on last Saturday week, when more than half of those who crossed the Potomac failed to report the next morning. And yet, surely, these things ought to be taken into consideration when we make a summary of what has been done by both armies in Maryland.

Why, then, if Lee was not defeated, did he cross the river? Not because his ammunition was exhausted, or his men discouraged; but because by so doing he could the sooner receive supplies and reinforcements. The case was this with him: His rearguard had been engaged on Sunday; Monday and Tuesday, his troops were under arms, constantly expecting the attack; Wednesday, they fought all day, and Thursday, they stood to their arms during the entire day. Lee's army was in the bend of the river, he had therefore, a very small district of country from which to draw supplies; and besides, during the four days above mentioned they had no time to forage, or even to cook, and thus were very much fatigued, as well as very hungry. Lee was willing to await McClellan's attack on Wednesday, he was also willing to meet him on Thursday; but he was not willing to fight General McClellan's original army twice the size of his own, and the 60,000 fresh troops who came to his support during Thursday and Thursday night. As a wise and prudent man, he therefore, in a manner the most dignified, retired across the Potomac, to meet the supply trains which had been ordered from Winchester. As evidence of the decorum observed in his departure, there was but one old battered field-piece left behind while surgeons and nurses were detached from every regiment to care for the wants of the wounded remaining on this side.

You ask in regard to the comparative morality of the two armies, and wish to know if I heard the reports respecting the good behaviour of the Confederates confirmed. I will let facts speak for themselves. Mr. —, one of the wealthiest and most respectable farmers in Maryland, told me that 25,000 men of Jackson's corps were encamped on his farm, and did not destroy so much as an ear of corn. "But, sir," said he, "these Yankees rob me every night, and have nearly ruined me. Why, sir, they came the other morning and asked for something to eat, and while breakfast was being prepared, they broke open my crib and stole my corn." Another farmer told me that the Confederates came to his house, and wished to buy corn and hay. He replied that he had sold all he could spare, when they turned away and left him. "But, sir, when the Federal army came they took my hay and corn at the point of the bayonet, and besides, stole four of my best horses." I saw a wagon-master ride up to a farm-house and inquire if they had any hay to sell. The lady of the house told him they had none for sale, and very little at all, for the army had taken it all. The wagoner said no more, but seeing two stacks of hay behind the barn, he let down the fence, and filled his wagons with a Union man's hay, leaving no money, nor even a receipt for the property taken. There is a very strong Union man in Frederick, who raises much fruit. While the Confederates were there his fruit was unmolested, but when the Federals returned, depredations were committed every night. Becoming thoroughly indignant, at last the old gentleman applied to the Provost-marshal for a guard to protect his property. The guard did not appear until after dark, and while the proprietor slipped into the house for a light to show them where to take their positions, so as to be safe custodians of his fruit, they stole his rarest peaches. Such are a few of the achievements of the Yankee troops in the way of self-appropriation. One or two anecdotes illustrative of the inevitable mendacity which characterizes them, from the Commander-in-Chief, General Halleck, down to the humblest soldier, must suffice, as I have already written too much.

The Rev. Mr. —, a gentleman well and favourably known in Maryland, told me that he assisted on one occasion in burying fifty Federal soldiers in one large hole, and when their bodies were covered up their comrades placed a board above them, on which they wrote, Five Federal soldiers lie here. Mr. — asked them what they did that for, when they replied, that it was none of his business. At another place, I was told, a board was to be seen, on which is written, General Anderson and eighty rebels are buried here. General Anderson certainly does not lie there, for he is alive and among his friends, but slightly wounded; and I very much question whether the eighty rebels could be found.

But before I close, I must tell you of the beautiful humility and heroic piety which seemed to pervade the hearts of all the Confederates I saw. I have never seen a strong religious sentiment so generally prevalent as I find it among them. Of twenty men with whom I conversed one afternoon, seventeen were professors of religion, and the eighteenth said he was a man of prayer, and looked to God as his protector. A plain, unlettered Georgia boy said, "In all my intercourse with these Yankees, I have never heard them allude once to what God can do. They talk about what twenty millions of men can do, and what hundreds of millions of money can do, and what their powerful navy can do; but they leave God out of the calculation altogether; but, sir, the Lord is our trust, and He will be our defence." The Rev. — was with me during a part of my tour. He was asked on one occasion to lead in prayer, in a barn filled with wounded, near Sharpsburg. After a season of most solemn and affecting devotion, a young man called the rev. gentleman to his side, and said, "I am dying, sir, but I am not afraid to die, for I hope to go to heaven. Nor am I sorry that I have been slain in battle, for I would willingly sacrifice a dozen lives if I had them, for such a cause as we are fighting for."

Time and again I heard the 124th Psalm quoted: "If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, when men rose up against us; then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us. Blessed be the Lord who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth. Our help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth."

They are not given to vaunting themselves; there is nothing at all of the spirit of bravado about them; and so far from manifesting a ferocious disposition, they very frankly confess they are tired of the war; but at the same time they are animated by a determined resolution that, God helping them, they will never be subjugated. When one of them was asked if he did not fear that the prodigious armies now organizing against them would utterly overwhelm them, he replied, that "with God above, and General Lee at their head, they feared nothing that man could do." History, sir, furnishes no legends more touching and glorious than are exhibited in the sacrifices and endurance of the Southern people. Such a people merit the admiration of the world, and deserve to achieve their independence.

Pardon me for saying so much, but incident after incident arose in my mind, and so clamoured for relation that I could not sooner stop.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, October 31.

The "decree" requesting the brokers to strike gold from the stock list, has caused some of the timid holders to sell out their hoardings, thinking that the premium will decline, and that they may re-invest on better terms; hence there has been a fall in the quotations, which will shortly be followed by another smart advance, for so long as Treasury notes continue to be issued and not redeemed, they make the precious metals more valuable, until the period is reached when paper currency gets to be worthless, and genuine dollars and sense again rule supreme in conducting the transactions of life.

The elections in this State take place in three days, and will no doubt result in the triumph of the Democrats. The extraordinary success of the Southern rights men in carrying Pennsylvania so handsomely, will contribute much to the achievement here. In fact, people are becoming bolder every day in their expressions against Lincoln, Seward, and Company; each rising of the sun causes us to see more men who are going to vote in the right way. With a Democratic Governor in New York, and the fall of the war curtain in the keystone State, peace will begin to dawn upon this unhappy land.

PARIS, November 11.

The chief event of the week, in a political point of view, is one deeply interesting to all Americans, and to all who are indirectly and directly mixed up with the present struggle, who suffer from its consequences, and to whom its cessation would bring instantaneous relief. France, having secured beforehand the co-operation of Russia, has proposed to Her Majesty's Government to join her in an offer of mediation between the United and the Confederate States. In making this proposal, the French Government is understood to have drawn attention to the conclusion it had arrived at some time back, that the South had fully established their claim to be recognized as an independent nation, and to the opinion it then expressed, that the recognition of the Confederate States should precede negotiation for a suspension of hostilities, which there was every reason to hope would end in a pacification. The French despatch then goes on to state that the Imperial Government, bearing in mind the friendly feelings which existed between the Cabinets of Washington and St. Petersburg, had invited the co-operation of Russia, being not unnaturally disposed to think that the recommendation of an armistice, with a view to further negotiations would be received with deference at Washington. Russia had assented to this proposal. At this point versions differ. According to one report the Court of St. Petersburg has not accepted unconditionally, but insisted in the co-operation of England as a sine qua non of her adhesion. On the other hand, it is stated that the acceptance of Russia is unfettered by any condition whatever.

Parisian dabbles in politics never condescend to take time, space, or any disturbing cause whatever into consideration, and profound and ingenious has been the speculation which this first decisive move on the part of France has given rise to. In some quarters it is stated (and written and printed) that in the event of England again replying non possumus the two great naval powers of the Continent will, as the poet says, leave—and propose their mediation, all negotiations to be preceded by an armistice. In the event of these terms being refused by the North, what will happen? The Debats observes (with its usual sarcastic ill-nature) that the bargain would be all in favour of the South, and that the Northerners would be great fools to accept terms which, in the event of the negotiations being broken off, would enable the South to recruit itself with arms, ammunition, stores, and so forth. This shows lamentable ignorance of the respective position of the belligerents. It is perfectly evident, from all the accounts which have reached Europe, that a party which is daily gaining in strength and popularity, is forming in the North, which is thoroughly sickened with the war. The North may be superior to the South in the point of mere numbers, but every impartial mind has long since come to the conclusion that this is not a war to be decided as a mathematical problem. Every Southerner that shoulders a musket is fighting pro aris et focis, and is worth, at least, ten of the German or Irish mercenaries which the Unionists employ to fight their battles. In point of mere numbers, the French, from 1792 to 1793, were contemptible when compared to their enemies, but there are peculiar times in the life of a nation where, every man becomes a soldier, and feels that he has a personal stake in the issue of the contest he is engaged in—no ordinary army that ever was collected would have gone through the hardships which Southern patriotism has cheerfully endured, much less conquered under the circumstances which have attended most of the great Southern victories. In the South, every man is a soldier. In the North, people cut off their forefingers to avoid being drafted. It is a knowledge of these circumstances, it is what the French call a "sound appreciation of the situation," that has prompted the Emperor of the French to bring forward his proposal at the present time, being well aware that what between the Southern armies in the field, and a Democratic majority in the Congress, President Lincoln's Government is threatened with a fearful collapse, and that, therefore, foreign intervention at the present juncture cannot be unacceptable to the Government of Washington, whom it may save from the disgrace of a defeat, whilst it may spare the South further effusion of blood. The moment for intervention is admirably chosen. It remains to be seen whether the British Government will allow itself to be convinced by the arguments laid before it, and whether, in the event of its stubbornness remaining unshaken, the French Government, which has taken the initiative of so important a step, will allow its intentions to be frustrated by the obstinate obstructiveness which, in the latitude of Downing-street, is decorated with the name of a "spirited foreign policy."

The other events of the week are singularly unimportant and uninteresting. The Court continues at Compiegne, where visitors of every shade of public opinion succeed each other. The hopes of the friends of Italy have been raised by the fact of an invitation having been sent to Cavaliere Nigra, the Italian Envoy. It appears, however, his Excellency was invited only for one day. The absence of Prince Napoleon from the Court festivities is much commented on; but, is nevertheless very easily explained. A great number of Ultramontanes are at present at Compiegne, and His Imperial Highness, who does nothing by halves, could not expect to relish society where the virtues of the Pope, and the greediness and covetousness of his father-in-law, are the favourite topics of conversation. Lord Cowley has a general invitation, and spends much of his time between Paris and Chantilly, seldom, however, passing the night at his mansion in the Faubourg St. Honoré.

It is generally believed that M. Drouyn de Lhuys will lay down his portfolio at the new year, and proceed to London to relieve M. de Flahault of the burthen of the Embassy, which proves too heavy for his declining years. On dit—that his successor will be M. Thouvenel, but the odds are in favour of Walewski.

The Emperor comes to town on Saturday, to be present at the opening of the Boulevard du Prince Eugène, a splendid new thoroughfare, cutting through the revolutionary Faubourg du Temple, and connecting the Place du Trône at the top of the Faubourg St. Antoine with the Boulevard du Temple.

The Greeks continue remarkably quiet; some uneasiness is felt at a proclamation of Grivas, who appears to be the only fighting man in the country, and who seems bent on a war with Turkey. The Ottoman Government has informed the provisional Government that if any suspicious gathering takes place on its frontier, it will occupy the town of Vonitza by way of a material guarantee for the good behaviour of its turbulent neighbours.

In Italy matters continue at sixes and sevens. The banditti continue to have it all their own way in the kingdom of Naples. The ex-King continues at Rome, where his last public performance has been to superintend the distribution of prizes at a donkey-race. The ex-Queen continues at Augsburg in an ursuline convent, but has dit on promised to return to her husband before the 1st of April next, the period she had originally fixed upon for the redintegratio.

GENERAL STUART.

The Northern papers have published the following account of this distinguished cavalry officer:—

General J. E. B. Stuart is the son of the late Archibald Stuart, for several years a member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the district which then embraced the county of Patrick, in Virginia, where, we believe, he was born. At a very early age he gave token of a quick and active mind. His father died ten or twelve years ago. His mother yet lives.

James E. B. Stuart entered the Military Academy of West Point in the year 1850. Among his contemporaries at that institution were Ambrose P. Hill, Henry Heth, George H. Stuart, T. H. Holmes, Beverley H. Robertson, and N. George Evans, Seth M. Barton, Alfred Cumming and Thomas S. Rhett, of the rebel army; and Burnside, Viele, Wilcox, Cogswell and others of greater or less repute in the Union army. Among his immediate classmates were Colonels John Pegram, George W. Custis Lee and John B. Villepigne, now well known in the rebel service; and Major Greble, of the Union artillery, who was killed in the first battle of the war at Great Bethel. In the Union army, the highest rank attained by Stuart was that of first lieutenant; but this was in the 1st Cavalry, a regiment noted for its officers, of which General Sumner was colonel, and Major-General Joseph E. Johnston, of the rebel army, lieutenant-colonel.

There are doubtless on file in the pigeon-holes of the War Department, at Washington, official reports of many encounters with the savage, recording in a curt, dry, cold manner, enterprises which, in the glowing narrative of a Walter Scott or an Alexander Dumas, would vie in interest with the stories of chivalry. One of these only, in which Lieutenant Stuart bore a part, has been recorded in our newspapers; but the account is as short and unsatisfactory as possible. On July 29, 1857, at a time when we were absorbed with the Atlantic telegraph and other exciting matters in the "piping times of peace," Colonel Sumner encountered a force of 300 braves of the Cheyenne tribe, strongly posted upon Solomon's Fork of the Kansas River, and, after a sharp struggle, put them to flight in great disorder. In this combat Lieutenant Stuart was severely wounded.

At the outbreak of the present war, Lieutenant Stuart resigned his commission, and offered his sword to the cause of the South. It is unnecessary to refer to his exploits since that time. They have been laid before the public. With his rapid rise from a colonelcy to the command of a brigade, and soon after to the rank of a major-general of cavalry, our readers are familiar. Perhaps the most striking and successful of all his expeditions were the Pamunkey raid through McClellan's lines, in which the rebel Captain Latane was lost, and the recent descent upon Catlett's Station, where he gathered up the official correspondence and full dress uniform coat of General Pope. As a cavalry officer, General Stuart combines with his West Point training much of the elan of John Morgan and Turner Ashby. Ready for any enterprise, his military motto seems to be that of the French leader—"De l'audace, encore de l'audace, toujours de l'audace"—and his raid yesterday into Pennsylvania seems to have surpassed his previous acts of audacity.

In the old army Stuart was universally known under the nickname of "Beauty Stuart," as reflecting upon his personal appearance. The lower part of his face is overflowed by a torrent of reddish-brown beard; but, according to rebel authority, his eye is bright and mobile, his movements are full of grace, his address is pleasing, his port lofty, and his horsemanship perfect.

COUNTERFEITING CONFEDERATE NOTES.

In the Confederate Senate, Mr. Clay called up a Senate Bill to punish and repress the importation of notes purporting to be notes of the Confederate States.

Mr. Clay said an immense number of these counterfeit notes had found their way into the bank, and the amount in private circulation could not be computed. Wherever the Federal armies have invaded our country, continued Mr. Clay, these notes have been scattered, and I am told that among those found dead on the battle-field of Manassas, in the late battles, scarcely one was searched in whose pockets were not found these notes. They have already impaired the faith of our people in Tennessee and in North Alabama, in the money obligations of the Government, to such a degree, I am told, that many loyal people refuse to take anything purporting to be a Treasury note. I regard this as one of the most dangerous, it may be one of the most destructive, blows made against our Government. Its aim and tendency is to destroy all faith in the currency of the country, to destroy the credit of the Government itself, and to disable it from raising and supporting armies. I trust gentlemen will give the bill some attention, and if any amendment can be suggested which will provide a surer and speedier punishment for this offence, that it will be proposed.

Mr. Brown opposed the mode of trial as liable to work injustice in many cases. He wanted to know if men were to be executed without any record being made and kept of their trial, and for which the bill made no provision.

Mr. Clark thought no method could be too speedy and summary for the trial and punishment of the unscrupulous Yankee scoundrels.

Mr. Clay said he was willing to have the bill so amended, as to allow the testimony to be recorded, but he did not consider it as a right to the offenders. They had no right to the privileges or immunities of the Constitution of the Confederate States. This Constitution was framed for the protection of the rights of citizens, and wherever accorded to foreigners it was by treaty stipulations, or by the comity of nations. There was no comity between the people of the United States and ourselves, and, furthermore, the offences which they now commit against us are done with the complicity of their Government. There is no parallel and no example to the nefarious, infamous, and atrocious work which is now being carried on to undermine and destroy the credit of the Government. It was charged that, during the last century, the English forged the French assignats, and whenever an English or allied soldier was found with the evidence of guilt upon his person, he was shot without trial; and the English Government did not protest against it, but only against the accusation that the counterfeits were manufactured within the limits of and with the knowledge and connivance of that Power. But here are enemies proclaiming through their press, in their two most populous cities, that they are engaged in counterfeiting the moneyed obligations of our Government, in the open day, and in the hearing of their Government, and with, I understand, its consent. They are endeavouring to assail us in a manner in which they can do us the most injury; for I think we have far more to fear from their frauds than their forces. They are as superior to us in low cunning as they are inferior in courage. Wherever their armies have entered our territory, they have scattered these counterfeits. The correspondents of their newspapers speak in exultant, jubilant strains of the successes of their cunning on the simple credulity of our people. One of their correspondents, I recollect, writing from the army of General Pope, in the county of Culpeper, represents that almost the entire stock-in-trade of the country merchant had been purchased by Yankee soldiers with counterfeit Confederate notes printed in the United States. The newspapers of Lynchburg represent that the Yankee prisoners confined there were all provided with such notes. In the city of Memphis, soldiers arrested for passing these notes had been discharged by the Yankee Provost Marshal, on the ground that there was no Confederate Government, and hence there could be no counterfeiting its money obligations. We are constrained to take some measures for protection against these outrages. There is a limit. I have found in the history of nations no other example of this mode of carrying on war. We must suppress it by severe and summary punishment. I fear, like the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. Brown), that but few criminals will be brought to judgment, for I apprehend they will leave these notes behind them when they go into battle, knowing their fate if caught with them. They come among us as felons in the garb of soldiers. They come not only with arms in their hands, but counterfeits in their pockets. I choose to try them as felons, since they have elected to assume that character.

Mr. Maxwell said counterfeiting was not an offence of a military character, and could not be tried by a military court. It was an offence against society and the civil government, and as such must be tried by a civil court.

Mr. Semmes held that the Constitution applied only to our citizens, or the citizens of nations with whom we are at peace, and none other were entitled to its protection.

The bill, after being amended, passed.

COMMODORE WILKES.—The Belfast News-Letter furnishes a rather singular explanation of this valiant Federalist's antipathy to England. It says that Wilkes was the commander of the United States' expedition fitted out some years ago, in common with similar expeditions by England and Russia, to discover the North West Passage. The American expedition sailed first, and Sir John Ross, who did not sail for a few months afterwards, met it on its return. Captain Wilkes then gave all the information he had acquired (or all he chose to give) to Sir John Ross, along with a chart of his progress. This chart was carefully preserved by the English navigator; but subsequent experience proved that it was altogether fallacious, as Sir John Ross's ships actually sailed over places which were described as mountains in the chart by Captain Wilkes. Sir John Ross, in his official report to the English Government, naturally enough exposed Wilkes' ignorance. He showed that his conclusions could not be depended upon—that they were, in fact, often nothing else than fictions. Hence, it is added, the bitter antagonism of Wilkes, and his desire to insult the British flag.

THERE has been a series of strikes among the working men of New York for increased wages, in consequence of the depreciation of the paper currency, and the alarming and rapid rise in the price of the necessities of life. The demands of the working men have been acceded to.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1862.

The Armistice Proposed by France.

For a week past it has been generally understood that important propositions were submitted to the acceptance of her Majesty's Government by the Emperor of the French, in reference to American affairs. Reports conflicted as to the exact nature of these propositions, and the attitude which Russia was alleged to have assumed in regard to them. According to our usually well informed Paris correspondent, and the most reliable intelligence we have been able to collect, it may be regarded as definitely ascertained that France has invited England and Russia to join her in proposing to the American belligerents an armistice of six months, during which all active hostilities by land and by sea, and therefore the blockade of the Southern ports, should be suspended. The response of the two Governments is as yet a matter of conjecture. We are inclined to credit the report that Russia has made her concurrence contingent upon that of England. An unconditional acceptance on her part, as the supposed friend of the Northern Government, would, indeed, have a significance which could not attach to the action of either France or England. She is, moreover, the only European Power which can be assumed to have a direct interest in the success of the North, and the restoration of the American Union to its former colossal dimensions. The chief responsibility of the ultimate rejection or adoption of the French proposal, will no doubt rest, as a similar responsibility has long rested, upon this country. The fact that while the Conservative journals of this city a week ago published the intelligence, and made it the theme of severe comments upon the party in power, the Ministerial organs maintained a strict silence—broken only after a Cabinet Council had had the subject under consideration—although in the meanwhile the French press had discussed it under every aspect, and in a more or less authoritative manner, leads to the suspicion that the proposal of France is not palatable to that portion of the Cabinet which has hitherto had the exclusive direction of our American policy. It is believed that the Council of Tuesday did not arrive at any decision; and it would, therefore, be gratuitous to advance either censure or approval on the probable Ministerial action.

Yet, on the adoption or rejection of the invitation of France depends at this moment the question of peace or continued war. The armistice has much to commend itself even in a military point of view to both parties. The South it would relieve of the pressure of the blockade, and of the annoyances which threaten it, with the autumnal rise of the rivers, from the enemy's favourite and most effective engines of warfare. To the North it would afford that breathing time for the drill and reorganization of its raw levies which it so sadly needs, and is not likely to obtain in any other manner, judging by the attitude of the Confederate armies. But the real importance of the armistice to both parties is the certainty that it would lead to peace. There is a vis inertia in the moral as in the material world, and in both it is equally difficult to give an impetus and to stay it when once given. No man believes that had the North foreseen the consequences of its rash undertaking, it would have ventured upon the preposterous attempt of subjugating a determined and united people of eight millions of Anglo-Saxons, occupying nearly half a continent. Having entered upon the undertaking, it finds it as difficult to stop of its own accord, as for a man falling headlong down a precipice. Once stopped by foreign interposition, it is inconceivable that it would renew the attempt in defiance of its dearly-bought experience of the last year and a half. It is how and where to stop that forms the Gordian-knot which the revived peace party of the North has neither the ability to untie nor the power to cut. The war fever, like a flame without fuel, must cool in the six months cessation of hostilities, and the Democrats, immensely strengthened in numbers, would have had time to reap the substantial advantages of their recent victories. New men, not personally committed to the fatal policy of their predecessors, would sit in the seats of power when again it should be proposed to renew the war. The South we leave altogether out of consideration. Engaged purely in a war of self-defence, no obstacle of her creation need be feared in the way of an honourable peace.

Is the armistice likely to be accepted? The South, we believe, unless there were overwhelming military reasons to the contrary, would accept it, if only to testify to the sincerity with which she desires peace. The North, it must be remembered, is not now the North of a year or even six months since. Then the whole people seemed smitten with a common blindness, and every sound of reason was drowned amid the clamour of tumultuous passions. Now we see a return to moderate counsels. States which were among the foremost in their support of the war, condemn the policy of its promoters. The party of war and the party of peace have fairly measured strength, and the only advantage of the former is the actual possession of the Government machinery. In the face of such a reaction as has been manifested in Pennsylvania and in the West, it seems doubtful whether the rebuked President will dare to follow the advice of his more reckless councillors. It is not improbable, even, that he might gladly avail himself of the opportunity as a refuge from difficulties with which he can no longer cope. At worst, he would be forced into compliance by the Democratic opposition, rendered irresistible through this timely assistance from abroad.

Whatever doubts may be entertained as to the good effects of this proposal, supposing it to be made by the three Great Powers named, this much seems beyond all doubt—that it can do no harm. To speak of danger to either of the parties proposing it, from the infuriation of the North, is a greater insult to the dignity of those countries than to the intelligence of the Americans. No sane man in the United States ever thought of adding a war with Europe to that already on their hands, and the recent elections prove that a fair moiety of the people of those States have not gone utterly mad. It is not true that this interference of Europe would reunite the now divided parties in the Northern States, and rekindle the ardour of all for the war. If this were so, the enemies of Southern independence should be the most eager for European action, and its friends should deprecate a step so fraught with fatal consequences to their cause. Everybody knows that the reverse is the truth. In what other manner the proposal of an armistice can have injurious consequences, either to those who propose it or to the belligerents, we cannot imagine. The least that can be said of it is, that it may and probably will do good, and cannot possibly do harm. The time for making the effort is singularly well chosen, and a fearful responsibility towards civilized mankind will rest upon those who shall wantonly reject this most promising opportunity for the pacification of America.

The Resurrection of the Democratic Party in the United States.

Without awaiting the result of the New York election held on the 4th inst., we may justly congratulate our readers upon the change which has evidently come over the spirit of the dreams of the Northern people. Nineteen months ago, a nation of twenty-one millions—seized, as it seemed, by an epidemic madness—rallied around President Lincoln when he proclaimed a crusade against the South. Distinctions of party were forgotten in the common fury, and those who had been the last to become converted to the war policy were, as new converts always are, the loudest and noisiest in their zeal. To-day, a majority of the voters of four large States, the States which might not inaptly be termed the "Border States" of the North, have condemned at the ballot-box the policy of the President of their choice. A party which only a few months ago appeared too insignificant in numbers and too cowardly in spirit to be aught but a cringing vassal to its conquerors, has suddenly sprung into new life, and in the same instant achieved this great triumph over the terrorism and power of patronage of a heretofore-unchecked absolutism. Of all the recent events in America, this resurrection of the Democratic party is the least expected, and by far the most important in its bearings upon the issue of the war. Whether New York has elected a Democratic Governor or no, this much is certain, that the Washington Government no longer commands an undivided allegiance within its own proper jurisdiction; that its policy is henceforth the policy of a party, not of a nation; and that in every step of its administration it has henceforth to contend against an enemy at home, too formidable to be overawed by threats or crushed by acts of violence.

Even the superficial observer of American politics must be impressed by the significance of an open and direct attack upon the men who have swayed the destinies of the country since the inauguration of the war, and who until now were supposed to wield undisputed and undisputable power. Still more significant is it that the attack should be based upon the very measures by which they hoped to perpetuate and consolidate this power, and that it should succeed in the States which have heretofore lent them the most efficient support. It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of the fact that Pennsylvania, which is chiefly responsible for President Lincoln's election, and the Western States, which have furnished the most and the best soldiers for the Southern crusade, repudiate at the ballot-box the Emancipation Decree, which invokes servile war in aid of the Union, and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, by which the last safeguards of their own liberties were to be the price of conquest over the liberties of others. A superficial observer may argue that the repudiation of these excessive measures does not necessarily imply a repudiation of the war itself, since the repudiators profess equal zeal in its continuance with their defeated opponents. He knows little of American parties who accepts their open professions as evidence of their real intentions. A party fighting under great disadvantages seldom exposes the whole of its designs, or jeopardizes success by undertaking too much at once. The attempted restoration of the Union is the strong point of Mr. Lincoln's Administration; its success and the measures adopted in desperation are its weak points. An adversary naturally selects weak points for his attack. But it is impossible to attack Mr. Lincoln and his advisers without indirectly attacking the war policy itself, so completely are they and that policy identified. To contend that the war must be conducted in accordance with constitutional forms is to contend that the war must end, for the most ingenious sophist could not discover in the Federal compact any warrant for its prosecution. It is because the Constitution did not provide for such an emergency as the secession of nearly half the States, and because, by the admission of his predecessor, the provisions of that instrument rendered coercion of the seceders impossible, that Mr. Lincoln feels himself justified, nay, compelled to disregard it. If the forcible restoration of the seceded States was a duty above and beyond the Constitution, then his violations of the law are defensible ex necessitate rei; if the preservation intact of the Constitution was his first and greatest duty, then the war is condemned as unrighteous by the terms of the law itself. Mr. Lincoln, or the most reckless of his defenders, never claimed that the President had a constitutional right to emancipate slaves held under the laws of any State; but he issues his proclamation as the military measure of a Commander-in-chief deemed necessary by the exigencies of the war. Inter arma silent leges, is the only defence of the Washington despotism, and in justice to it be it said, that it has never seriously attempted any other. When, therefore, the Democrats or Constitutionals select as the object of their attack the most glaring of these violations of the law, they know full well the inexorable logic of their argument, but they spare the national amour propre the grating sound of a disagreeable truth by resorting to a less offensive circumlocution.

To understand more precisely the position of the Democratic party, it is necessary to consider their antecedents and the import of their party tenets. As in other countries, so in America, the name of a party is always more or less arbitrarily chosen, and seldom affords a cue to the principles of those who assume it. Thus, though the name of "Democracy" was often used very effectively with foreign immigrants full of the ideas of 1848, it never had in practice the signification attached to it in Europe. Though knowing on occasion how to flatter the masses, the Democratic party of the United States was democratic only in name. Its fundamental principle was "State Rights;" that is, the jealous defence of the reserved privileges of the several States against the centralizing tendency of the Federal Government. A rigid construction of the Constitution precluding the exercise by the central Government of any powers not specially and distinctly conferred in that instrument, was the characteristic policy of the party, and that which distinguished it from all others, under whatever name. As the North, numerically the stronger, had the most to gain by centralization, while the South saw its only safety in the prerogatives of State sovereignty, the Democrats may not unfairly be designated as par excellence the party of the South. It is unnecessary here to enter into the causes of the rupture between the Northern and Southern wings of the Democratic party during the last Presidential canvass in the United States, by which the bulk of the voters of each wing voted for different candidates, thus facilitating the election of Mr. Lincoln. Suffice it that in this rupture the Northern Democrats did not abandon their distinctive party tenets of State Rights and strict construction of the Federal compact; but, on the contrary, claimed a more faithful adherence to these tenets than their Southern namesakes. Their contest with the Black Republicans—of which they bore the brunt unsupported by the South—was marked by extraordinary efforts and by an animosity which could not be said to exist to the same extent between the extreme sectional antagonists. The most astounding phenomenon of the Revolution has been the ease with which these animosities seemed to be forgotten amid the wild enthusiasm which proclaimed war upon Secession, and it was this unexpected and unaccountable defection of its Northern allies which prostrated the best-founded hopes of the South for a peaceful separation. The reappearance of the Democratic banner, with its old mottoes, is the infallible token that this enthusiasm is past, which for a time caused party differences to be forgotten, and that the people of the North are again divided among themselves and arrayed against each other as they were previous to April 10, 1862. Without the consent of the Democrats war was impossible then; without their consent war is equally impossible now. It will enable the reader to form some idea of the numerical strength of this party in the North, when he is reminded that in the last Presidential election the popular votes in the North stood, in round numbers, 1,500,000, against 1,800,000 for Lincoln. Despite this near approach to equality, the Democrats did not carry a single Northern State. What immense gains they must have made since may be estimated from the fact that, as far as the result of the Fall Elections is ascertained, they have already carried four of the largest and most influential members of the Union.

We do not assert that the success of the Democratic party is equivalent to immediate peace. The North has gone too far to secede or even stop at once of its own accord and unaided from abroad. But this success is the first and most hopeful symptom of a change. It was natural to expect that continued unsuccess in the subjugation of the South would give rise at last to weariness and despair. Somebody must be the first to see that, however desirable the object of the war, it had become unattainable, and to advise resignation where perseverance was henceforth fruitless obstinacy. The few to see this and to so advise would grow into a party; the party, in course of time, would rise into power. This was to be expected in the ordinary course of events, unless we supposed the Americans to be made of different stuff from other human creatures. It has come sooner than we anticipated, and the party of good sense and of soberness has displayed a far greater strength than we should have ventured to predict. The key to the solution of the American problem is now found, but the key must be used ere the problem itself is solved, and the solution must come from abroad. The Democratic party of the United States, however anxious for a termination of the war, will not for many weary months to come be able to achieve its object, or, indeed, to devise for its own guidance a practical plan of peace. But its revival under such promising auspices invites the friendly assistance of foreign Powers, and is a safe guarantee to those Powers that there is such a general return to good sense as to ensure temperate consideration for their advice. The men who have just condemned Mr. Lincoln's policy at the ballot-box may not be strong or wise enough to repair at once the old follies in which they were once accomplices, but they have shown the wisdom and the strength to prevent the commission of new ones.

General Bragg's Kentucky Expedition.

Of the many misconceptions respecting the character and results of belligerent movements in America, not the least curious are those in reference to the late expedition of General Bragg in Kentucky. It has been assumed the adventure was a failure in a military point of view; whereas it was crowned with success; and further, in some quarters it has been thought that the supposed failure proved the absence of Southern feeling in Kentucky; whilst, in fact, the affair, in a remarkable manner, testifies to the loyalty and devotion of the brave Kentuckians, though any proof of their intense Southern sympathy was unnecessary. Lately, the misrepresentations of the Washington Government respecting the war have been more than ever unscrupulous. Military gains would undoubtedly have secured many votes for the Lincolnite party in the elections, but they were not forthcoming. If however, Mr. Lincoln, his Cabinet, and generals cannot command, they can invent, success. On paper they can win any number of victories, and slaughter, rout, and capture as many millions of Confederates as they think proper. No one, even in the United States, believes the reports of the Federal Government, for the fictions are so monstrous, that they cannot be altogether credited and accepted even by the most credulous. Yet, with a tremendous discount, they get a limited circulation on both sides of the Atlantic. It takes some time to impress upon the public mind that the Government stoops not only to gross exaggeration, but to the concoction and official circulation of falsehoods that are unadulterated with a particle of truth. Moreover, in Europe, the clumsy forgeries of the North respecting Kentucky have obtained some little currency on account of the attitude of the Border States—an attitude that is, however, natural, politic, and loyal to the Southern cause. It may, we think, be useful if, with the utmost brevity, we recall the main incidents of the late movements in Kentucky, especially as the most cursory survey will enable us to prove incontestably the success of the exploit, and the absurdity of deducing therefrom a want of Southern sentiment among the Kentuckians.

The object of General Bragg was not to conquer Kentucky, nor did he enter that State for the purpose of fighting the Federal army under General Buell. This is apparent from the great disparity of forces at Perryville—a disparity that was not the result of Federal reinforcements. The Cause for Mr. commander brought on the battle of Perryville in order to check the progress of the enemy, which, if unchecked, might have frustrated the purpose of the expedition. We shall not discuss the details of that battle, or be at the trouble of showing the impertinence and mendacity of the Federals in claiming it as a victory. Subsequent events confirm the official report of General Bragg, which will be found in our Notes on American news.

A part of the army of Virginia entered Maryland for supplies, and the army of General Bragg entered Kentucky for the same purpose. No attempt was made to co-operate with the Southern forces in that State, but all the energy of the troops was directed to getting together supplies; and certainly the business done, considering the time engaged in it, was surprisingly large. Before the battle of Perryville the Confederates had collected 4700 wagons loaded with provisions and clothing, 8000 head of cattle, and 1000 mules and horses. Even success can scarcely justify such a venture. If at Perryville the Confederates had not checked, or rather repulsed the enemy, they would have had to abandon their invaluable stores; for unless unmolested, they could not carry off such an amount of luggage; and if they had elected to remain in Kentucky the defence of such a mass of stores would seriously, if not fatally, have crippled their strength. No doubt there is much truth in the Northern assertion that "The Perryville battle was brought on prematurely, and against the orders of General Buell, whose plans for enveloping the whole of Bragg's army were thwarted and his pursuit of the rebels delayed by that circumstance." No doubt, if the Confederates had consulted the convenience of the Federal commander, they would have waited until General Rosecranz had co-operated with him, and so have placed the Confederates, encumbered with baggage, in a difficult and critical position. The army under General Bragg, as soon as the stores were brought together, was an army for convoy, and its business was to avoid fighting, except in case of need. The Confederate commander perceived the state of his enemy, and by a brilliant dash at Perryville, so effectually covered his march that he left the State with his invaluable acquisition of much needed supplies—as much needed, be it observed, in some parts of the North as in the South. We submit that more brilliant success never crowned a military movement. The Southern army went to Kentucky to obtain stores, and they obtained them in prodigious quantities; and they did so in spite of an opposing force vastly superior in numbers being at hand. Although the charge brought against General Buell of treason to the Union is utterly false, we are not surprised at its being preferred. It does seem extraordinary that, with a much larger army, the Federal general should not have been able to prevent the Confederates carrying off their prize. It is amusing to note in what an awkward fix this affair placed the Lincoln Government. Pending the elections in the West, it would not do to confess to any failure, however palpable, and so the Federal defeat at Perryville was called a victory, and the triumphant expedition of General Bragg was called a Confederate disaster. But this would not satisfy the people of Washington and New York, and therefore General Buell, who had gained such a splendid victory and annihilated the Confederate army, was to be relieved from his command.

The suggestion of Kentucky being cold to the Southern cause is answered by the success of the enterprise. If the Kentuckians had been neutral, or cold, or rather; if they had not been heartily interested in the welfare of the South, General Bragg could not have obtained a title of the stores he conveyed into Tennessee. The Kentuckians have been zealously engaged for a long time past in preparing these stores, and when they were ready General Bragg embraced the first opportunity of removing them. Kentucky has done well for the Confederate States.

With regard to the assertion that General Bragg did not succeed in raising Kentucky, it will be sufficient to remark that Kentucky was acquired most effectively long before General Bragg entered the State. The object of the expedition was stores, not recruits, and if, as the Northern journals state, 5000 Kentuckians joined Bragg's army, it is a very gratifying manifestation of zeal. It must be remembered that the Border States are in a peculiar position. It is impossible for the Confederates to defend the whole of their frontier from invasion, as it is for the North to defend theirs from such exploits as the Pennsylvanian incursion of General Stuart; and which would not have reflected any discredit on Northern generalship and resources, if it had not been performed in the presence of a large Federal army. It is therefore reasonable that the people of the Border States should reserve some of their strength for the defence of their own territory, and in so doing they render an essential military service to the South. No Southerner doubts the Secession sentiment and devoted loyalty of the Kentuckians to the Confederate States; and if there was any doubt of it in the minds of foreigners, it must be removed by considering the circumstances and success of General Bragg's recent expedition.

The Confederate Army.

In our 27th number we published a report of Mr. G. W. Randolph, the Confederate Secretary of War, dated August 12. It is a dignified and instructive State Paper. It is distinguished by the utmost frankness and candour. The good points of the enemy are commented on without reserve, and the faults of the Confederate army, so far from being concealed, or at least excused, are paraded, with a demand for their correction. The Southern Government has nothing to conceal from Europe, or even from the North, except the plans of campaign. It confidently relies on the favour of Heaven and the patriotism of the people. The Confederate States have had a hard fight for national existence; not that they were ever near to being subjugated by the hated foe; but to sever themselves from the dominion of the North needed efforts and sacrifices which have taught the world that in the Confederacy heroism is co-extensive with manhood, and we should be flagrantly unjust not to add, with womanhood. When Mr. Gladstone asserted that President Davis, assisted, of course, by the leading men, had made the South a nation, he gave utterance to a truth of which the full meaning is hardly understood and appreciated. The will of the people must be directed, or it will never achieve or secure national independence. The permanent organization of the Southern army is the most indisputable evidence of the separate nationality of the South. This task, that demanded the statesmanship which combines the genius to devise and the unbending will to execute, was not accomplished without considerable difficulty and opposition.

Mr. Randolph strongly contrasts the condition of the respective armies at the time the Federals entered Virginia. In the South there was no want of zeal and determination. The enthusiasm which had induced the people to separate from a Union that involved their political and social degradation, and the loss of their wealth, had been intensified by the invasion of their country, yet the latitude allowed from the want of laws calculated to give the Chief Magistrate those controlling powers which are indispensable in the time of war, retarded the discipline of the army, "impaired its efficiency, and rendered it incapable of accomplishing what otherwise might have been achieved." Whilst at a critical juncture the armies of the Confederacy were thus "passing through successive stages of disorganization to dissolution," what were the Federals doing? Mr. Randolph tells us the armies "of the enemy, recruited and reorganized, had reached a high state of efficiency, and were ready at the opening of the campaign to enter upon it, with every guarantee of success that numbers, discipline, complete organization, and perfect equipments could afford." Under such circumstances, the Confederate Secretary of War, so far from being surprised that the Federals gained some successes, is amazed that they were not much more successful. The Army of the Potomac was double in numbers, and in all other respects, "except courage and good cause," superior to the Confederate army. If the Federals had not been amused for months by preparations for taking fortifications which the Southerners never intended to defend, their campaign in Virginia would have been very different to what it was; and if the Confederate States were not a unit, if there had been any "Union sentiment," any traitors in her to betray the weakness of the Southern army, the South would have had to suffer from greater hardships and dangers than those from which she has been delivered.

Such a condition of affairs was intolerable, and the Richmond Government took immediate measures to remedy it. A Conscript Act was recommended to and passed by Congress. The beneficial effects of this enactment were soon manifest. The levies were distributed over the Confederacy in proportion to the inhabitants of each State and county; the organization of the army was more centralized; and there was a regular system of recruiting, which guaranteed that the efficiency of the army would not be impaired by the lapse of time and the loss of life and health incident to warfare. It will be found that President Davis, notwithstanding the urgency of the case, did not in any way exceed his constitutional functions. Notwithstanding the urgency of the case, he would not move without the authority of Congress. The Conscript Act, however, did not escape unfavourable criticism, both in Congress and out of doors. It was passed by a large majority in the Legislature, and a very small minority of the people found any fault with a measure that was at once necessary, moderate, and constitutional. So far from the Confederate Government endeavouring to silence they seemed to court discussion. Governor Brown, of Georgia, addressed a long letter of remonstrance to President Davis, and to which the President replied by an elaborate, temperate, and lucid exposition of the motives that prompted him to propose the act, of the constitutional character of the new law, and of its concord with the most extreme views of State rights; and both letters were given to the press for publication. The staple of Governor Brown's argument was, that the Conscript Act was unnecessary; but a few months proved the fallaciousness of his opinion. "Four months," says Mr. Randolph, "have not elapsed since its passage, and the present condition of the army and of the country sufficiently prove its wisdom. Four months ago our armies were retiring weak and disorganized before the overwhelming force of the enemy, yielding to them the sea-coast, the mines, the manufacturing power, the grain fields, and even entire States of the Confederacy. Now we are advancing with increased numbers, improving organization, renewed courage, and the prestige of victory, upon an enemy defeated, disheartened, and sheltering himself behind defensive works and under cover of his gunboats. A military system which has done so much in so short a time should be cherished and perfected, and its defects speedily corrected." Too much praise cannot be accorded to the firmness of the Government, the wisdom of the Legislature, and the patriotic willingness of the people to submit to a law that imposed new but not galling restrictions on individual action.

Another striking passage in Mr. Randolph's report is the announcement that the War Department had prohibited "the reception of unnaturalized foreigners as substitutes." In the great battle of independence, in the contest for home and country, only citizens are to take part. Foreign mercenaries are not to be employed in repelling the invading hordes of foreign mercenaries. What a marked difference from the conduct of the North. The Federal armies are largely composed of Irish and Germans, and Federal regiments are commanded by officers who know nothing of the English language except the word of command. Whilst the Confederates, numerically inferior, refuse all foreign aid, the Federals are seeking, by false pretences and bribes, to obtain from Europe more supplies of "food for powder and pestilence;" and the Orleans Princes having deserted them in the hour of trial and defeat, they are willing and eager to engage the services of Garibaldi. The difference in the constitution of the armies will go far to explain the neutralization of the numerical superiority of the North.

Mr. Randolph objects to substitution unless the conscript is as serviceable to the public at home as he would be in the field, and he declares that in his opinion, "it is unwise to injure the public service for the benefit of individuals, and therefore no substitution founded merely on considerations of private interests should be tolerated." A rule so rigid as this is unknown in Europe, and is only justified by the exigencies of invasion, and the attempt by a powerful enemy to subjugate the country. The South expects every man to do his duty, not by substitution but in propria persona. At such a crisis strength and health, limb and life, as well as property, must be freely ventured in the cause of liberty and independence.

The passages in the report which refer to the supplies of the army cannot fail to gratify the friends of the South. At the commencement of the war the Northern troops were splendidly equipped, whilst the Southern forces constituted the worst equipped armies that ever went forth to battle for national existence. The want of the material of war excited the commiseration, not to say the contempt, of European military critics, who did not understand, and therefore could not appreciate, the indomitable energy of the Southerners that was sure, sooner or later, to overcome every obstacle. We confess that, making every allowance for the united determination, the superior intelligence, and the patriotic devotion of the Southerners, as well as for the indigenous resources of their country, we are amazed at the rapidity with which want has been changed to plenty. In spite of the blockade, arms and ammunition have reached the South from abroad; but the quantities thus obtained are contemptible compared to the vast amount of warlike stores which the Federals have procured from Europe. A much more prolific source of supply has been the frequent captures of Federal arms and ammunition. So great has been the booty, that whilst it has enriched the South, it has impoverished the North, notwithstanding her former abundance, and temporarily crippled her military movements, although the European markets are open to her. Above all, the Confederates, not relying on supplies from abroad or from captures, have established factories for arms and ammunition; and having all the materials, they are engaged in the construction of a navy, which, judging from the past, will, though consisting of fewer ships, form a formidable antagonist to the Federal navy. Amongst the many successful efforts to become independent in all things, is the establishment of the Nitre Bureau. The Confederate Secretary of War says, "A Nitre Bureau has also been organized, and under its able and indefatigable head, Major J. M. St. John, is doing good service. The production of Nitre is already 1000 pounds a day, and there is good reason to think it will reach 3000 pounds a day, and supply our consumption. The Bureau has been directed to turn its attention to the mining of such material as are required for the army, and will do much to develop their production." Verily, and in a most liberal sense, the Confederates are proving themselves as independent as any nation on earth, and far more independent than the majority of the nations whose independence is justly recognized by the great Powers of Europe.

Mr. Randolph, towards the conclusion of his report, devotes a short paragraph to acknowledging the services of the troops. To some persons it may seem scant praise, but patriotism feels that any commendation for duty done is superfluous. The Confederate Secretary would not represent his gallant countrymen if he gave more than a brief and Spartan-like expression to the feelings inspired by the heroism of the Southern army. The services rendered by the Southern army "are infinitely above all compensation," and the most eloquent eulogy, the most telling expression of gratitude, is all but silent appreciation. Mr. Randolph proposes that officers and men who distinguish themselves in battle shall receive medals, and no one will quarrel with the proposition to confer such meet rewards for valour. No monument will be necessary to record the prowess of the soldiers of the South. The country, redeemed from political thralldom, and saved from the domination of the North, will bear testimony to posterity of the patriotism of the present generation of Southerners, and of the Divine blessing that crowned with success their noble efforts to save their native land from ruin and degradation.

Anonymous Journalism.

We believe that Englishmen in general are well satisfied with the character and condition of the English press; and are little disposed to consider that, in those respects in which it differs from the press of Continental countries, it stands in need of any defence, explanation, or apology. And yet it can hardly be denied that the presumption is against anonymous writing. It would seem, at first sight, that a man's written, like his spoken words, should be his own, and that he should be directly and unmistakably responsible for them. And it lies with an anonymous press to establish the rightfulness and prudence of the contrary rule; first and chiefly, by its conduct, and secondly, on fitting occasion, by argument. Few persons are disposed to deny that the conduct of respectable English journals is such as to justify their claim to conceal the names of their writers; they are not merely less fettered, but as temperate and careful in their criticisms on men, books, and measures, as are the best newspapers in those countries which refuse this privilege to the press. It may be worth while to say a few words in explanation of this fact; to point out briefly why it would be impossible to establish in this country the rule that articles should be signed by their writers; what are the advantages which are derived from the actual practice; and what are the inconveniences which attach to it, and which do not exist where writers append their names to everything they publish.

Firstly, it must be remembered that in England a prejudice is entertained against professional men—lawyers and physicians—who engage in any extra professional pursuits. Now, independently of the fact that many young barristers and doctors maintain themselves by their pens during the dreary years which elapse before they acquire a practice sufficient to occupy their time and defray their expenses, and that to deprive them of such a livelihood would be a cruelty to them and an injury to society—it is the fact that many of the best papers that appear in the magazines and weekly journals are written by these men, who do not write enough to wear out the first freshness of their minds, and whose essays, though perhaps less artistic, are often more valuable than those of the laborious tribe

"Who daily scribble for their daily bread."

These writers, to whom writing is not the business of life, but an assistance in preparing for that business, can only write sub rosa. Were their names to be attached to their articles, their professional prospects would be injured by a prejudice no doubt absurd, but too strong to be easily overcome; and therefore the abolition of anonymous writing would deprive them of their bread, and the press of their services. This would be a serious misfortune; a still more serious one would be the immediate silencing of all writers holding official situations, which would deprive the public of several of its most useful instructors. Some journals would be all but extinguished by the sudden enactment of a law similar to that of France and those, too, are perhaps the ablest and most influential of our contemporaries. Official men can only write from behind the veil. It is exacted of them that they shall in no sense be party men; this being the condition of that permanence of the Civil Service which secures for each successive Ministry the support and assistance of a thoroughly trained staff, informed of everything that has passed under the cognizance of their departments up to the last moment (of which the incoming Minister is of course ignorant), completely masters of their business, and headed by some of the most efficient administrative statesmen of the country. If these men appended their signatures to articles reflecting on the policy of the Ministry of the day, it could hardly be expected that their chiefs should tolerate it; if they wrote in defence of the existing Cabinet, they could hardly hope to retain office under the Opposition, when its leaders in their turn succeeded to power. They would be identified with a party, and obliged to go out of office with it. At present their writing for journals not violently opposed to the Government, under certain well-understood limitations, is tolerated; and their contributions are, of course, of the very highest value. It would be difficult to find in the rule of signature any gain which would compensate for the enforced silence of those whose practical knowledge and experience in political business gives to their thoughts a statesmanlike sobriety, and ensures in their suggestions an attention to what is possible and would work well, that are not to be looked for from men whose theories have never been brought to the test of practice—who, in one word, have never been "in harness."

But besides gaining writers who would otherwise be lost to it, the press gains in its general tone and character by the suppression of individual peculiarity, prejudices, and passions, which result from the absence of signatures. The tone and temper of an article is not that of the writer, but that of the paper; and newspapers are never so individual, never so irritable, perverse, and crotchety as the best of writers are apt at times to be. The editor may have crotchets of his own, and occasionally these creep out; but they are kept under control by the traditional opinions and tendencies of his journal, and by a due regard to the interests of the proprietor. To the crotchets of writers he is not likely to be very indulgent; no one who has ever written for newspapers but has complained of the pitiless mutilation of his favourite passages by the editorial pen, and tried in vain to smuggle some darling dogma, some pet paradox, into the columns of some journal, which, having its own set of dogmas and paradoxes made ready to hand, and as firmly established by tradition as the Thirty-nine Articles or the Augsburg Confession by ecclesiastical law, rigorously excludes the heresy, while it mercifully tolerates, employs, and pays the heretic. Again, anonymous articles are of necessity moderate and sober; first, because no two men's passions are exactly alike, and because the editor is pretty sure to moderate the expression of the writer's feelings, while the writer is not very vehement in expressing those of the editor; and secondly, because a gentleman feels that he is bound to write temperately, and be on his guard against personality, when he writes anonymously, and because the tone of the press is given by writers who are gentlemen. Some persons, smarting under well-deserved censures, cry out against anonymous criticisms, as reckless and unfair, and assume, as a matter of course, that men would be more careful what they say if they said it in their own names. We do not doubt that this would be the case with the complainants. But they are so abusive when they sign their abuse, that if they wrote anonymously it is not likely that any respectable organ would insert their lucubrations. And we protest against their right to judge others by themselves. We affirm, without fear of contradiction, that with few exceptions anonymous reviewers are more temperate and more just than the authors who complain of them; that the anonymous writers of political criticism are more moderate than the demagogues who revile them from the platform; and that the least temperate, honest, and gentlemanly language that finds its way into journals of reputation is contained in letters bearing the signature of the writer—for the simple reason that the editor will admit such letters when he would be scandalized at the idea of allowing the same thing to be said in a leading article for which he would himself be answerable, and by which the credit of the newspaper might be affected.

It should never be forgotten that though anonymous writers may be irresponsible, anonymous writing is not. Legally the publisher, morally the editor, is answerable for everything that appears in any periodical. And the character of a respectable journal is generally a better guarantee for the quality of its contents and the truth of its assertions than would be the character of its individual writers. Of the latter, one or two may be deficient in truth, temper, or sense, and might, if they wrote on their own responsibility, be careless as to the veracity of their assertions or the propriety of their language; might, in fact, be reckless of their own reputation. A newspaper never is so. Its reputation is its value; its credit for truthfulness, decency, and moderation of language, is worth to the proprietor so many hundreds or thousands per annum, and to those connected with it, from the highest to the lowest, is a source of honour and influence among their own acquaintance. We believe, therefore, though at first the assertion may seem somewhat paradoxical, that anonymous writing really tends to secure the public against recklessness or untruth, to improve the character of the press, and to enhance its usefulness.

Let us turn for one moment to the little knot of men from whom proceeded the last serious assault that has been made in this country on anonymous journalism—the clique that gives its tone to Macmillan's Magazine. No one denies that Messrs. Kingsley, Hughes, and Ludlow are very able men; no one can suspect them of any of the lower and meaner forms of literary dishonesty. But they are among the most reckless, perverse, and untruthful of English writers—too impatient to understand the opponents they insult, and the doctrines they controvert; too prejudiced to be bound by the rules of common sense; and too egotistical to be in any degree controlled by the taste of educated and the convictions of thoughtful men in general; and too violent and hasty in their espousal of any cause which enlists their sympathies; and too eagerly credulous of any statement which suits their views, to be sufficiently careful as to the truth of the assertions they make. In the able and angry article which Mr. Hughes, some months ago, wrote against the use of the anonym, there occurred a signal proof of the insufficiency of signatures as a guarantee for care or veracity. Mr. Hughes gave the lie direct to an anonymous writer in the Saturday Review on the subject of Trades-Union crimes. The fact happened to be that the reviewer spoke the truth; that what Mr. Hughes said was not true; and we must leave it for Mr. Hughes to explain how it was possible that he should not have known that it was not true. We have not the least idea who wrote the article impugned. But, unless the insulted writer were a clergyman or a man of exceedingly calm temper, it was plainly fortunate for Mr. Hughes that articles in the Saturday Review are anonymous. It would be difficult for a writer so assailed by name to refrain from putting to the proof the "muscular Christianity" of the very estimable gentleman whose temper so far outran his discretion and sense of literary decorum. We are quite sure that had Mr. Hughes' article been anonymous no journal with a character to lose would have dared to insert it.

There is no doubt that professional journalists are in some ways losers by the anonymousness of the press. They cannot make a reputation; they have not, as French journalists have, the opportunity of achieving literary distinction, and carving their way to political power. But they enjoy many compensating advantages. They are enabled to be impartial; to keep aloof from close party ties, and to say what they think on many subjects, instead of being confined to that set of subjects only on which they thoroughly agree with some one influential party or newspaper. For instance, there may be men who on questions of domestic policy are moderate Conservatives; who on European politics are moderate Liberals; who share Mr. Beresford Hope's views on America; and who in religious matters could find no expression for their opinions but in the Westminster Review. Now, it would be impossible for such men to say their say on all these subjects in their own names. If our readers do not see the impossibility, it would be difficult to explain it to them; but no man practically acquainted with journalistic work will doubt that in such a case a law obliging signatures would confine a writer to one set of subjects, and silence him on all the rest. Writers would then, like politicians, become mere partisans; they would be absolutely Tories, or Whigs, or Radicals; and such a thing as an independent newspaper would become an impossibility. Therefore, while we wish that there existed journals in which the practice of signature was general, and while we admit that it affords opportunities of distinction and of self-elevation to journalists which are now denied them, and might do something to raise the dignity of the profession, we cannot think that its general adoption in this country is any more desirable than it is likely.

The Lord Mayor's Show.

Few of us deserve success, but we all expect to be successful. Nobody applies the moral of the countless sermons he hears upon the "vanity of human wishes" to himself. All men think all men born to be unlucky but themselves; at least, it is so until youth and early manhood have passed away, and then the most fortunate are the most ready to declare that so far from greatness and fortune being indispensable to happiness, those unknown to fame and those who have "neither riches nor poverty," are the most to be envied. When a barrister receives a call—unless he has been eating his terms merely to qualify himself for one of the numerous appointments that are limited to barristers of ten years' standing quite irrespective of their fitness for office—he has a vision of the Woolsack in the distant future, or at least he feels certain of a puerile judgeship, and pities the unfortunate barrister who gratefully accepts the position of a County-Court judge. When the medical student is walking the hospitals, he looks forward to the time when he shall be one of the famous few to whom the sick and the nervous crowd to tell their sufferings and present their guineas. Or, to come to a case which more immediately concerns this article, we should like to know if a youth was ever apprenticed to a trader carrying on business within the sound of Bow-bells, who did not hope to follow the example of the immortal Whittington, and become Lord Mayor of London? And let us add, by no means an unworthy ambition. We know that my Lord Dundreary, and the unennobled Dundrearies who represent suburban gentility, sneer at civic honours; but the sneer that is prompted by empty-headedness is, to speak algebraically, worth less than nothing. We are ready to maintain against all comers that to be the Chief Magistrate of the first city in the world is an honourable and proud position. The Lord Mayor has changed with the changing times. He no longer has the remotest influence in making or unmaking kings. He is no longer the champion of popular liberty, though he is the representative of that municipal freedom that is the foundation of our liberty. But he still has honours, which are not more barren than such things generally are. He is an ex officio member of the Privy Council. If anything happens to royalty, or peace or war is declared, the Home Secretary forthwith communicates the event to the functionary who is popularly supposed to be the King of the City, because when the Sovereign visits the city he can formally shut the Gates of Temple Bar, though, by the way, he is obliged to open them when the Sovereign demands admission, under the penalty of formally rendering himself liable to be hung, drawn, and quartered. The Lord Mayor has the privilege of feasting her Majesty's Ministers, and all sorts of distinguished people. So great is his influence that if an election for a Member of the City of London occurs, he has an excellent chance of getting into the House should he aspire to Senatorial honours. The Lord Mayor represents English hospitality, and does it in a style that ought to silence foreign critics, who are so ignorant and so daring as to assert that there are better things on earth than turtle soup—we mean the City of London turtle, that is so temptingly fat and green. But we need not trouble ourselves to reply to the Dundreary contempt for the Corporation of the City of London. It is different with respect to the Lord Mayor's Show, or, as genteel journalists designate it, "the procession."

We admit that the show is not practically useful, nor is it exceedingly imposing; but it is an old custom, and we can see no reason why it should be abolished. Is one holiday per annum too much for the good people of London? Is the loss of a few hours' custom to a few shopkeepers not compensated for by the profit they make, or the obligations they confer by the loan of their windows to children and adults, the latter of whom protest against the show, as being childish, and yet view it with more than childish eagerness?

Take it all in all, it is a motley, yet unique show. A few years since an ambitious Lord Mayor engaged the whole of the corps attached to Astley's Amphitheatre to take part in a kind of mask or pageant, in which the extent and character of English commerce was supposed to be portrayed. The affair was a failure, and succeeding Lord Mayors have returned to the old programme such as that of Monday last.

If we had to give Americans an idea of it, and who, so far from having seen the annual show hundreds of times, like the celebrated old dame, renowned in city circles, have not seen it once, we should perhaps partially succeed, if we were to say it resembled, in its incongruity, an election procession in the States. There are countless banners on which appear the arms of the members of corporations past and present. No doubt the ancestors of these gentlemen, like the ancestors of Sydney Smith, if ever they had occasion to use wax, made the impression with their thumbs, from the lack of arms; but, fortunately, in this country money can procure anything under the sun, but happiness. Let a Mr. Smith rise from the position of a shoe black to be a man of wealth, and the College of Heralds will, for a moderate fee, procure him arms and a crest, and for an additional fee, invent a pedigree proving that the founder of his family came over with William the Conqueror. Besides the banners of individuals, are the flags of Companies—of the Civic Guilds, which are no longer necessary to protect trade, but which, in this Conservative country, still flourish. These Companies have their halls, in many instances very handsome buildings, and enjoy revenues which might reasonably excite the envy of the petty potentates of Germany. It is considered rather fashionable to be a fish-monger; the Duke of Cambridge and many distinguished statesmen belong to that guild.

It does not seem out of place that the volunteer force of the city, the worthy successor of the train bands so unkindly laughed at by the author of "John Gilpin," should be present at the show, or that a guard of honour of Royal troops should take part in the inauguration ceremony, but it is exceedingly curious that there should be half-a-dozen "ancient knights mounted on chargers, in full steel armour, with lance, each attended by two esquires mounted, and bearing the battle-axe and mace of the knights." Our only objection to this part of the show is, we are informed the armour is heavy and distresses the ancient knights, who are either amphitheatre actors or privates in the Horse Guards. Mingled with this pomp are the sombre-looking carriages of the Common Councilmen the Aldermen in their carriages, attended by the beadies of their respective wards. The Aldermen are calculated to disappoint the spectators. In the City of London they are not chosen by weight, and instead of realizing the popular conception of "gross fat men," incline to that habit of body which Julius Cæsar thought dangerous. The Sheriffs appear in great state, and are rather in favour with the roughs of the crowd, from their connection with public executions. The Sheriffs witness executions, and if Jack Ketch should refuse to perform the ceremony, they are legally bound to do the disagreeable work themselves. Closely following the Sheriffs comes the late Lord Mayor, in a coach that is too profusely gilt to make the beholder pity his fallen greatness. Last of all appears the hero of the day. In an unwieldy, painted, grotesque vehicle, drawn by six horses, sits the Lord Mayor; opposite to him his Chaplain; and looking out of either window is the Sword Bearer and the Common Crier. There is, it must be confessed, something exceedingly droll about the make-up of the State Carriage and its occupants. His Civic Majesty may sigh for the comfort of the omnibus "knifeboard." The unsouped receive him with shouts of applause, which he acknowledges by exercising the muscles of his neck in a series of bows intended for the shouting crowd, but which appear to be directed to the aforesaid Sword Bearer and Common Crier. All this may be called by gentlemen who wish to be thought grave, an absurd spectacle; yet if the Right Hon. Baronet, who has so well described the procession and ovation of "Rienzi" would in the same style, and without undue poetical licence, describe the Lord Mayor's Show, it would seem quite as romantic and as historically symbolic. And the author of "Rienzi" might write a telling passage about the spectators. An English holiday crowd is certainly rough, somewhat ragged, but quickwitted and imperturbably good humoured. Besides the street spectators, there are the countless eager, happy faces of children, which fill the windows from Guildhall to Westminster. That sight alone makes the show pleasant, and if the Lord Mayor is not a very ill-natured man, he must feel nearly as much gratification at the pleasure he gives to a multitude of children as he does from entertaining her Majesty's Ministers at the great Civic banquet.

Reviews.

A BOOK ON BUDGETS.*

A real history of the finance of the last twenty years—a work which should enter fully into the plans of successive Ministers, the motives which actuated them, and the opposition they met with; which should discuss their principles, their objects, their results, and the causes of their success or failure—would be the task of half a lifetime, and would occupy many bulky volumes. Its value could hardly be overrated. But probably it is yet too soon for such a history to be written; and in the meantime we have cause to be grateful for the clear and succinct record of facts which Sir Stafford Northcote has given us. Such a record was much wanted, and Sir Stafford Northcote was the man to undertake it. He is the ablest among the rising men of the Conservative party, and has been Secretary of the Treasury. He is free from that bitterness of personal animosity which is too often the characteristic of Mr. Gladstone's leading opponents; and it would be difficult to judge from his book to which party he actually belonged. He is sparing of comment, and still more sparing of censure; being always ready to make full allowance for the difficulties of the situation.

The history of modern English finance begins with the accession to power of Sir Robert Peel in 1842, on the resignation of Lord Melbourne. The warmest friends of that nobleman and his Whig colleagues have been compelled to admit the singular administrative incapacity which distinguishes that party. "All the Talents," in one year of office, very nearly ruined the power and prestige which England had acquired under Mr. Pitt; and in the ten years of almost unbroken Whig rule which were inaugurated by the Reform Bill, the inability of a Cabinet containing some of the most brilliant talent, the widest and most statesmanlike minds, and the most honoured gentlemen of England, to administer affairs in a businesslike, effective, and satisfactory manner was still more remarkable. And in finance their weakness was unparalleled. In a time of profound peace, while they had kept our armaments at a dangerously low level, so that the peril of the country when a quarrel with France was impending in 1840 alarmed all rational and thoughtful men, they had contrived, by reckless improvidence and helpless mismanagement, so to embarrass the finances, that every one of the five last years had produced a heavy deficit; and they had no notion of any vigorous effort to extricate themselves. The following figures show the extent of their incapacity:—

" 1838-39	430,000
" 1839-40	1,457,000
" 1840-41	1,851,000
" 1841-42	2,350,000
Total in five years	£7,516,000

Being an average of a million and a half per annum. In 1840, Mr. Baring (now Sir F. Baring) had done his best to repair the revenue by adding 5 per cent. to all the Customs' Duties, except those on corn, and to all the Excise Duties; but the experiment proved a lamentable failure. In 1841 he proposed to try the very opposite course, and attempt by a large reduction of duties to obtain from increased consumption an increase of revenue. On this budget the Whigs were ejected from office, and Sir Robert Peel succeeded them. In the spring of 1842 he brought forward that budget which has ever since given the tone to our financial policy. He had two things to do; first, to restore the balance between income and expenditure; secondly, to repair the condition of the revenue, which was then most unsatisfactory. The people were heavily burdened, and the Exchequer was inadequately provided. The Whigs had never had the courage to undertake a statesmanlike revision of our financial system as a whole. They had taken off taxes here as the popular clamour dictated, and put them on there as the necessities of the State compelled them. They had contrived to give us not merely a chronic deficit but an inelastic revenue. Sir Robert Peel had to cure the deficit, and restore elasticity to the revenue. And for both purposes he had recourse to that which was and is the most unpopular of all taxes—a direct tax on income. That tax he fixed at 7d. in the pound, or £2 18s. 4d. per cent. With difficulty he extorted the consent of the House, in which he had a large majority, to his scheme; but with the aid of the Income Tax, an increased export duty on coal, and an addition to the excise on Irish spirits, he expected to have a large surplus. He made use of this to reduce a multitude of Customs' Duties, especially those on timber and on coffee, to repeal the export duties on British manufactures; and to reduce the duties on stage coaches. He might have gone further, but that his predecessors had left him the expensive legacy of a war in India and another in China. Since that time, few years have passed in which some such cause of expenditure has not contributed to increase our burdens, and perplex successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, Sir Robert Peel only proposed that the Income Tax should endure for three years. By that time he conceived that our finances would have righted themselves, and he should be able to dispense with an instrument which most statesmen strongly condemned, except as a last resort in time of war, and which he himself did not think fit to form a permanent part of our financial machinery. He expected from it £3,770,000 a year: it produced above £5,000,000. But inasmuch as he only received one-half of it in the year—while, by a strange oversight he had expected to receive the whole—and as the Customs and Excise fell short of his estimate, he found himself landed in a formidable deficit.

The next year produced a more favourable result. It paid off the deficit of 1842-3, and left a surplus of £1,400,000 more, which went to strengthen the balances in the Exchequer. The result of the two years, therefore, proved Sir Robert Peel's plan a complete success. In March 1844 a surplus of £2,376,000 was anticipated, and Mr. Goulburn, Sir R. Peel's Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Robert being really the Financial Minister), brought forward his plan for the conversion of the 3½ per cents. to 3¼ per cents. for ten years, and afterwards to 3 per cents.—a measure rendered possible by the fact that Consols had risen from 89 to 99. The operation was entirely successful. By paying off dissentients, the capital of the debt was reduced by £250,000—not a sixpence was added to it—and the annual saving was £625,000 up to 1854, and £1,250,000 afterwards. In this year only £400,000 of taxation was remitted.

In 1845 the Income Tax had expired. Still, as half-a-year's tax was still to be collected, there was a considerable prospective surplus; the surplus of the preceding year having reached £5,000,000. But, as next year the half-year's Income Tax would not fall due, there might probably then be a deficit, especially as it had been found necessary to increase the Navy Estimates by a million. Sir Robert Peel therefore advised the renewal of the Income Tax for three years more, and the repeal or reduction of Customs' Duties to the amount of nearly three millions and a half. The principal items of relief were as follows:—

Modification of Sugar Duties	£1,300,000
Repeal of all Export Duties	118,000
" 430 Customs' Duties	320,000
" duty on Cotton Wool	680,000
" Glass Duty	640,000
" Auction Duty	250,000
	£3,308,000

Some efforts were made, but in vain, to obtain a readjustment of the Income Tax, and the Ministerial budget was passed. The result converted an anticipated surplus of £672,000 into a real surplus of £2,380,000.

Next year the Corn Laws were repealed, the duty on corn reduced to 1s. per quarter, protective duties on manufactures reduced or abandoned, and the imposts on tallow and timber largely reduced. The duty on meat and live animals was abolished, and that on all other agricultural produce greatly reduced. Altogether about a million of revenue was sacrificed. Nevertheless, the budget promised a surplus, and its promise was more than fulfilled, the estimate being £777,000, the result £2,465,000, besides an additional revenue of £300,000 obtained by the equalization of the duties on slave and free sugar.

* Twenty Years of Financial Policy; a Summary of the Chief Financial Measures passed between 1842 and 1861, with a Table of Budgets. By Sir STAFFORD H. NORTHCOTE, Bart., M.P. for Stamford. (London: Saunders, Otley and Co. 1862.)

Before going out of office, as he was speedily forced to do by the Protectionists, Mr. Goulburn summed up the results of four years of administration. His resume exhibited the following results:—

Balances in the Exchequer increased by ..	£5,000,000
Average amount of deficiency bills decreased by ..	4,000,000
Capital of the debt decreased by	7,000,000
Annual charge of the debt decreased by ..	1,500,000
New taxes imposed, amounting to	5,624,000
Taxes repealed or reduced, amounting to ..	8,206,000

Thus a relief of above two millions and a half had been given to the taxpayer; the expenditure increased, the debt and its burdens reduced; the efficiency of the public services improved, and the Exchequer strengthened, during a period not more prosperous or peaceful than that in which was accumulated a deficit of seven millions and a half.

The Whigs came in again. They enjoyed a year of financial prosperity, thanks to Sir Robert Peel, and to the vast expenditure created by railway speculation. Then came a commercial crash and the Irish famine. A bad harvest came in with the Whigs, in 1846, and another in 1847; and in the spring of 1848, instead of a surplus, there was a deficiency of nearly a million, besides the eight millions borrowed for the relief of Ireland, and besides the expense of a Kaffir war. For 1848-9 their estimates showed, exclusive of Income Tax, which had expired, a revenue of about forty-six millions, and an expenditure (including that of the Kaffir war) of fifty-four millions and a half, leaving a deficiency of eight and a half millions. Lord John Russell proposed to renew the Income Tax for two years at 1s., and for three more at 7d.; but this was refused by the House, and the Income Tax was renewed, as in 1845, for three years at 7d. An enormous deficit was of course anticipated; but that which actually resulted was only £269,000. The next year, 1849-50, produced a surplus of two millions and a half. In 1850 the Exchequer on bricks was abandoned, and the Stamp Duties were modified; the result being a similar surplus. Three millions were lent out of the Exchequer on mortgage; the repayment to be applied to the extinction of debt. In 1851 the agriculturists were demanding redress, and had been defeated by a narrow majority; and the Income Tax had again expired. The Government proposed the renewal of the Income Tax, the substitution of a house-tax for the oppressive and anti-sanitary Window Tax, the reduction of the duties on coffee, on foreign timber, and on agricultural seeds. They anticipated a surplus of £250,000. Defeated on a non-financial question, Lord John resigned; the Conservatives could not form a Ministry, and he returned to office. The House Tax was reduced, modified, and limited to houses of more than £20 rental. Great efforts were made to improve the structure and alter in some degree the incidence of the Income Tax, but in vain. Its evils and injustice were found to be inherent, and it was renewed without alteration for one year. The result of the year was a surplus of £2,177,000.

The Conservatives came into power early in 1852; and merely proposed a renewal of the Income Tax for another year; which was perforce agreed to. In December of that year Mr. Disraeli introduced his budget for 1853-4, which was rejected by a majority of nineteen. He proposed to reduce the Tea Duty; to divide by half the Hop and Malt Duties; to extend the House Tax to houses of £10 rental, and increase its rate; to renew the Income Tax, extending it to funded property and salaries in Ireland, and to incomes of £100 from industry and of £50 from property, and reducing the rate of taxation on incomes derived from farming, trades, professions, and Government pensions and salaries. The weak points of the budget were the halving of the Malt Duty; which it was affirmed would have done no good to any but the brewers, and the unsatisfactory and illogical treatment of the Income Tax.

Our most recent development of financial policy may be said to date from 1853, when Mr. Gladstone first became Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Coalition had a powerful majority; nevertheless, his scheme was mutilated by the compulsory abandonment of the Advertisement Duty, and a proposed system of trade licences. He renewed the Income Tax, extending to all incomes in Ireland, and to all incomes of £100 a year and upwards. It was to be fixed at 7d for two years, 6d for two years more, and then for three years at 5d; and was to expire in April 1860. Incomes under £150 were to pay 5d. for the whole period. The duties on Irish and Scotch spirits were raised; a succession duty was imposed on real property, which proved very much less productive than Mr. Gladstone hoped; the Soap Duty was repealed; the Assurance Duty reduced; and the debt due from Ireland remitted. Several minor reductions were made in the Inland Revenue Department. Mr. Disraeli's plan for the reduction of the Tea Duties was adopted; the Customs' Duties on 123 articles were swept away, and those on 133 more were reduced. The remissions were above three millions and a half, of which two and a half were to fall on the current year. An attempt to convert a portion of the five hundred millions of Consols and the eight millions South Sea debt into 2½ per cent stock, was frustrated by the course of events.

The next three years were years of war. Their result was an extra expenditure of seventy-six millions, an extra taxation of forty millions, and an increase of debt of forty-one millions, leaving the Exchequer richer by five millions than at the commencement of the war. Sir G. C. Lewis made great efforts to provide a sinking fund for the redemption of the debt incurred during the war, and to pay off the Exchequer-bonds issued by Mr. Gladstone in 1854. But, by the joint assaults of his two predecessors in office he was foiled; the sinking fund was abandoned, the exchequer-bonds were renewed, the Income Tax was reduced to its former amount, and there was a deficiency in April 1858 of a quarter of a million. Soon afterwards the Government were defeated on the Conspiracy Bill, and Lord Derby succeeded them.

Mr. Disraeli found a deficit of nearly four millions; of which three and a half were incurred by obligations to repay the debt of the Russian war. Those obligations were swept away; the debt was allowed to remain unreduced; and to provide for the remaining deficiency, the duties on spirits were equalized in the three kingdoms at the English rate, and a penny stamp imposed on bankers' cheques. The result was a surplus of £800,000; the Income Tax being allowed, according to law, to fall to 5d.

In 1859 it was judged necessary to augment the expenditure by five millions, in presence of a war in Italy, and of a rapid increase of the French navy. An abridgment of the malt credits produced £780,000; the Spanish Government paid in unexpectedly a quarter of a million it had long owed us; the Income Tax was raised to 9d., and the extra 4d. levied in the first half-year; and the financial year 1859-60 closed with a surplus of a million and a half—the last surplus we have seen. It should be remembered that Mr. Gladstone returned to office in 1859, though not until too late to do more than adopt the estimates of his predecessor.

In 1860 he had to announce a policy of his own. He had made a treaty with France which bound him to sacrifice Customs' duties to the amount of £1,737,000 during the year, in return for reductions of duty on English imports into France. Besides the loss to the revenue entailed by the treaty, Mr. Gladstone proposed to sacrifice the Paper Duty, worth £1,300,000 a year, and Customs' Duties worth another million. There were to fall in Long Annuities of above two millions a year; the Income Tax was reimposed at 10d., on such conditions that five quarters' tax—two at 5d. and three at 10d.—were to be levied within the year; while the credits allowed on Malt and Hop Duties were again shortened.

Next year the Paper Duty was repealed, sacrificing within the year £665,000. The Income Tax was fixed for a year at 9d. The war duties on tea and sugar were again renewed. And the result, as announced in 1862, was a deficit of 1,442,000, besides an expenditure of £970,000 on fortifications, provided for by loan.

Thus far we have followed the author, and in endeavouring to present a summary of the contents of this useful work, we have not deemed it necessary to consider the views and opinions of Sir Stafford Northcote. The following table exhibits concisely the history of the Exchequer from 1842 to 1861; but we must warn our readers not to arrive at hasty conclusions from the appended figures. Causes it is impossible to foresee, and contingencies so remote that it would be absurd to provide for them, frequently falsify the estimates of the Budget. The business of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to provide for the expenditure sanctioned by the House of Commons, whether the amount be extravagantly large or economically small, and if he does so without straining the resources or diminishing the trade of the country—if his measures do not impede commercial and industrial progress—he is a safe and efficient Finance Minister:—

SHORT NOTICES.

English Women of Letters. By JULIA KAVANAGH (Hurst and Blackett).

It is a very trite observation, that Queen Elizabeth was a loveable sovereign and an unamiable woman; and, perhaps, the habit of ruling destroyed the private graces of womanhood. We confess to the old-fashioned opinion that the proper sphere for woman's work, unless under exceptional circumstances, is home. There she excels and is without a rival. Her influence, too, upon the world is greater when exercised in the name of wife or mother than it is under other circumstances. We do not regret there have been English Women of Letters, and we are duly sensible of the value of the contributions ladies now living have made to our stores of literature, but we really wish the private histories of literary ladies were kept from the public. Such biographies seem to give rise to prejudices it is difficult to overcome. It appears to us that a woman who embraces a public career, either consciously or unconsciously, makes a sacrifice nearly equal to that of taking the veil. No one can get up from the perusal of "English Women of Letters" without to some extent endorsing our sentiments.

The Science of Memory Simplified and Explained. By J. H. BACON. (Bateman.)

Practice is the simplest and only method of improving the memory. Most boys get their chief exercise in learning Latin and Greek. Cobbett improved his memory by teaching himself French. Some persons attain the same object by mathematical studies, and others by the constant exercise of the faculty of observation. The inventors of systems of artificial memory suggest a somewhat different mode. They bid their disciples recollect dates and facts by associating them with the furniture of a room or letters. Instead of one, two things have to be remembered—the arbitrary sign, and what the sign stands for. With “artificial systems” the pupil will get the minimum of benefit for the maximum of labour; from the ordinary and natural plans he may obtain substantial advantages. If we make a boy procession in grammar, we strengthen his memory, impress upon him the first principles of philology, and instruct him in the elements of logic. The lad who rides Mr. Bacon's hobby-horse gets exercise, but he makes no progress.

Our Feathered Families: a Popular and Poetical Description of the Birds of Song, and their Congeners, which are found in Great Britain. With Practical Hints for the Breeding, Rearing, and General Management of Song-Birds in Confinement. By R. G. ADAMS (Hogg and Sons.)

We are much obliged to Mr. Adams for a book about the history, peculiarities, and treatment of the feathered tribes; and especially of the families comprised under the title of “Birds of Song.” Mr. Adams gives a very complete account of our “home pets,” as also of those with which the general public is unfamiliar. As a pleasing gift-book for the young, and a useful guide for the amateur naturalist, we can confidently commend this work to our readers.

THE SOUTHERN TROOPS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The subjoined Northern account of the affair is taken from the Baltimore Daily Gazette, of October 10:—

The following letter was written by the Honorable A. K. McClure, of Chambersburg, Franklin county, to a friend in Philadelphia, who has furnished it for publication:—

CHAMBERSBURG, October, 1862.

My Dear Friend,—I have had a taste of Rebel rule; and, although not so bad as it might have been, my rather moderate love of adventure would not invite a repetition of it. I reached here on Friday evening to fill several political appointments in the county; and when I got off the cars the telegraphic operator called me aside, and informed me that he had a report from Greencastle, of the rebels entering Mercersburg.

We agreed that it was preposterous, and thought it best not to make the report public and alarm our people needlessly. I supposed that a few cavalry had crossed the Potomac to forage somewhere on the route leading to Mercersburg, but never, for a moment, credited their advent into that place. I came home, and after tea returned to the telegraph office to ascertain whether the rebels had been over the Potomac at any point, and I was there met by two reliable men who had narrowly escaped from the rebel cavalry seven miles west of that place. The telegraph wire had also been cut west, and it was then manifest that we had but an hour to prepare for our new and novel visitors.

Our people were confounded with astonishment at the brilliant audacity of the rebels penetrating twenty miles in General McClellan's rear; but however reckless or well-devised on their part, the fact and the rebels were both staring our people in the face. The rain was pouring down in torrents, and in a little time citizens were seen running to and fro, with their muskets; but there was no organization, and no time to effect one. Colonel Kennedy attempted to improvise mounted pickets for the several roads on which they might enter, but he had scarcely got his forces mounted until the clattering of hoofs was heard on the western pike, and in a few minutes the rebels advance was in the centre of the town. They stated that they bore a flag of truce, and wished to be taken to the commandant of the post.

I had just got word of the movement to Governor Curtin and General Brooks at Hagerstown, when I was sent for to meet the distinguished strangers. A hasty message to Hagerstown and Harrisburg, stating that the town was about to be surrendered, closed telegraphic communication, and Mr. Gilmore, the operator, prepared at once for the advent of his successors, and struck out along the line toward Harrisburg with his instrument. I went up town to meet the flag of truce, and found a clever-looking “butternut,” dripping wet, without any mark of rank, bearing a dirty white cloth on a little stick. He politely stated that he sought the commander or authorities of the town, and in the name of the general commanding the Confederate forces, he demanded the surrender of the village. He refused to give his name, or the name of the general commanding, and he could not state under what terms they would accept a surrender. As I had no command, other than the scattered and bewildered home guards—all brave enough, but entirely without drill or organization—and about 300 wounded men in the hospitals, I acted with the citizens as one of them; and it did not require a protracted council to determine that we could not successfully resist cavalry and artillery. So we concluded that the venerable village had to be consigned over to rebel keeping. We had been kindly allowed thirty minutes to decide, at the end of which time, we were informed, rebel artillery would demand submission in rather unpleasant tones. Colonel T. B. Kennedy (colonel by political brevet, like myself) Judge Kimmell, provost-marshal, and your humble servant, mounted three stray horses, and fled in with the rebel escort, amidst a thunder of cheers for the Union, and groans for the rebels, to meet we did not know whom, and to go we did not know where. Without umbrellas or overcoats, we had the full benefit of a drenching rain, and I must admit that we were treated with the utmost courtesy by our new associates. They conversed freely, and without manifesting any degree of bravado.

After travelling a mile westward we were brought to a halt by a squad of mounted men, and informed that General Hampton was one of the party, to whom we should address ourselves. It was so dark that I could not distinguish him from any of his men. Upon being informed that we were a committee of citizens, and that there was no organized force in the town, and no military commander at the post, he stated, in a respectful and soldier-like manner, that he commanded the advance of the Confederate troops—that he knew resistance would be vain, and he wished the citizens to be fully advised of his purpose, so as to avoid needless loss of life and wanton destruction of property. He said he had been fired upon at Mercersburg and Campbelltown, and had great difficulty in restraining his troops. He assured us that he would scrupulously protect citizens—would allow no soldiers to enter public or private houses, unless under command of an officer upon legitimate business—that he would take such private property as he needed for his Government, or troops, but that he would do so by men under officers who would allow no wanton destruction, and who would give receipts for the same, if desired, so that claims might be made therefor, against the United States' Government. All property belonging to, or used by the United States, he stated, he would use or destroy at his pleasure, and the wounded in the hospitals would be paroled.

Being a United States' officer myself, I naturally felt some anxiety to know what my fate would be if he discovered me, and I modestly suggested that there might be some United States' officers in the town, in charge of wounded, stores, or of recruiting offices, and asked what disposition would be made of them? He answered that he would parole them, unless he should have special reasons for not doing so, and he instructed us that none such should be notified by us to leave town. Here I was in an interesting situation. If I remained, there might, in General Hampton's opinion, be “special reasons” for not paroling me, and the fact that he had several citizens of Mercersburg with him as prisoners, did not diminish my apprehensions. If I should leave, as I had ample opportunity afterwards to do, I might be held as violating my own agreement, and to what extent my family and property might suffer in consequence, conjecture had a very wide range. With sixty acres of corn in shock, and three barns full of grain, excellent farm and saddle horses, and a number of best-blooded cattle, the question of property was worthy of a thought. I resolved to stay, as I felt so bound by the terms of surrender, and take my chance of discovery and parole.

The committee went through the form of a grave but brief consultation, somewhat expedited, perhaps, by the rain; and we then solemnly and formally surrendered the town upon the terms proposed. True, the stipulations were but verbal, and but one side able to enforce them; but the time, the weather, the place, and our surroundings generally, were not favourable to a treaty in form, and history must therefore be without it. We asked permission to go a little in advance of his forces to prepare our people for the sudden transition from the Stars and Stripes to the Stars and Bars. General Hampton permitted my associates to do so, but detained me to pilot his advance guard at once to the telegraph office. I performed the duty assigned me with no great compunctions, as I had seen Mr. Gilmore, the operator, begin to “fix up” for them fully an hour before, and the rebel that outwits him must make a very early start. Messrs. Kennedy and Kimmell proceeded to town to get the people to retire peaceably, and prevent any provoking demonstrations; and so the rebel rule began in Chambersburg. They marched in very orderly, and most of their force started out different roads to procure horses, forage, and provisions.

I started in advance with them for my house, but not in time to save the horses. I confidently expected to be overrun by them, and to find the place one scene of desolation in the morning. I resolved, however, that things should be done soberly, if possible, and I had just time to destroy all the liquors about the house. As their pickets were all around me, I could not get it off. A barrel of best old rye, which Senator Finney sent me to prove the superiority of the Crawford county article over that of Franklin, was quietly rolled out of a cellar side-door, and a good-sized hole bored into it. A keg of Oberholtzer's best, sent me several years ago, but never tapped, followed Finney's testimonial to Crawford county distillation; and a couple cases of Presbury's best Girard House importation had the necks of the bottles taken off summarily, and the contents given to the angry storm. I finished just in time, for they were soon out upon me in force, and every horse in the barn—ten in all—was promptly equipped and mounted by a rebel cavalryman. They passed on towards Shippensburg, leaving a picket force on the road.

In an hour they returned with all the horses they could find, and dismounted to spend the night on the turnpike in front of my door. It was now midnight, and I sat on the porch observing their movements. They had my best corn-field beside them, and their horses fared well. In a little while one entered the yard, came up to me, and, after a profound bow politely asked for a few coals to start a fire. I supplied him, and informed him as blandly as possible where he would find wood conveniently, as I had dim visions of camp fires made of my palings. I was thanked in return, and the mild-mannered villain proceeded at once to strip the fence and kindle fires. Soon after, a squad came and asked permission to get some water. I piloted them to the pump, and again received a profusion of thanks.

Communication having thus been opened between us, squads followed each other closely for water, but each called and asked permission before getting it, and promptly left the yard. I was somewhat bewildered at this uniform courtesy, and supposed it but a prelude to a general movement upon everything eatable in the morning. It was not a grateful reflection that my beautiful mountain trout, from twelve to twenty inches long, sporting in the spring, would probably grace the rebel breakfast-table; that the blooded calves in the yard beside them would most likely go with the trout; and the dwarf pears had, I felt assured, abundant promise of early relief from their golden burdens.

About 1 o'clock half a dozen officers came to the door and asked to have some coffee made for them, offering to pay liberally for it in Confederate scrip. After concluding a treaty with them on behalf of the coloured servants, coffee was promised them, and they then asked for a little bread with it. They were wet and shivering, and seeing a bright open wood fire in the library, they asked permission to enter and warm themselves until their coffee should be ready, assuring me that under no circumstances should anything in the house be disturbed by their men. I had no alternative but to accept them as my guests until it might please them to depart, and I did so, with as good grace as possible.

Once seated around the fire, all reserve seemed to be forgotten on their part, and they opened a general conversation on politics, the war, the different battles, the merits of generals in both armies, &c. They spoke with entire freedom upon every subject but their movement into Chambersburg. Most of them were men of more than ordinary intelligence and culture, and their demeanour was in all respects eminently courteous. I took a cup of coffee with them, and have seldom seen anything more keenly relished. They said they had not tasted coffee for weeks before, and then they had paid from $6 to $10 per pound for it. When they were through they asked whether there was any coffee left, and finding that there was some, they proposed to bring some more officers and a few privates who were prostrated by exposure to get what was left. They were, of course, as welcome as those present, and on they came, in squads of five or more, until every grain of browned coffee was exhausted. They then asked for tea, and that was served to some twenty more.

In the meantime, a subordinate officer had begged of me a little bread for himself and a few men, and was supplied in the kitchen. He was followed by others in turn, until nearly 100 had been supplied with something to eat or drink. All, however, politely asked permission to enter the house, and behaved with entire propriety. They did not make a single rude or profane remark, even to the servants. In the meantime, the officers who had first entered the house had filled their pipes from the box of Killickinick on the mantle—after being assured that smoking was not offensive—and we had another hour of free talk on matters generally. When told that I was a decided Republican, they thanked me for being candid; but when, in reply to their inquiries, I told them that I cordially sustained the President's emancipation proclamation, they betrayed a little nervousness, but did not for a moment forget their propriety. They admitted it to be the most serious danger that has yet threatened them, but they were all hopeful that it would not be sustained in the North with sufficient unanimity to enforce it.

Their conversation on this point bore a striking similarity to the speeches of Frank Hughes and Charles J. Biddle; and had you heard them converse, without seeing them, you would have supposed that I was having a friendly confab with a little knot of Pennsylvania Breckinridge politicians. Of the two, I am sure, you would have respected the rebels the most; for they are open foes, and seal their convictions with their lives, and they openly avow their greater respect for open, unqualified supporters of the war over those who oppose every war measure, profess fraternal sympathy with the South, and yet say they are in favour of preserving the Union. They all declared themselves heartily sick of the war, but determined never to be reunited with the North.

At 4 o'clock in the morning the welcome blast of the bugle was heard, and they rose hurriedly to depart. Thanking me for the hospitality they had received, we parted, mutually expressing the hope that should we ever meet again it would be under more pleasant circumstances. In a few minutes they were mounted and moved into Chambersburg. About 7 o'clock I went into town, and found that the first brigade, under General Hampton, had gone towards Gettysburg. General Stuart sat on his horse in the centre of the town, surrounded by his staff, and his command was coming in from the country in large squads, leading their old horses and riding the new ones they had found in the stables hereabouts. General Stuart is of medium size, has a keen eye, and wears immense sandy whiskers and moustache. His demeanour to our people was that of a humane soldier. In several instances his men commenced to take private property from stores, but they were arrested by General Stuart's provost guard. In a single instance only that I have heard of did they enter a store by intimidating the proprietor. All our shops and stores were closed, and, with a few exceptions, were not disturbed.

There were considerable Government stores here; some 200 pairs of shoes, a few boxes of clothing, and a large quantity of ammunition captured recently from General Longstreet. It was stored in the warehouse of Wunderlich and Neale. About 11 o'clock their rear-guard was ready to leave, and they notified the citizens residing near the warehouses to remove their families, as they were going to burn all public property. The railroad station-house, machine shops, round-house, and the warehouses filled with ammunition were then fired, and the last of the rebels fled the town. In a little time a terrible explosion told that the flames had reached the powder, and for hours shells were exploding with great rapidity. The fire companies came out as soon as the rebels left, but could not save any of the buildings fired because of the shells. They saved all others, however.

So ended a day of rebel rule in Chambersburg. They took some 800 horses from our people, and destroyed, perhaps, $100,000 worth of property for the Cumberland Valley Railroad Company, probably $5000 for Wunderlich and Neale, and $150,000 for the Government. Our people generally feel that, bad as they are, they are not so bad as they might be. I presume that the cavalry we had with us are the flower of the rebel army. They are made up mainly of young men in Virginia, who owned fine horses, and have had considerable culture. I should not like to risk a similar experiment with their infantry. I was among them all the time here, and was expecting every minute to be called upon to report to General Stuart; but they did not seem to have time to look after prisoners, and I luckily escaped. But from the fact that I cannot find a horse about the barn, and that my fence is stripped of paling to remind me of the reality of the matter, it would seem like a dream. It was so unexpected—so soon over—that our people had hardly time to appreciate it. * * *

If they should recross below Harper's Ferry, they will owe their escape to the stupidity or want of energy of our military leaders, for they were advised in due season of the rebel route.

Hoping that I shall never again be called upon to entertain a circle of rebels around my fireside, believe me,

Truly thine,

A. K. MCCLURE.

The same journal also gives:—

THE CONFEDERATES AT CHAMBERSBURG BANK.

Mr. Ascher Smith, the cashier of the Chambersburg Bank, was in Chambersburg at the time the rebels entered the town, and has furnished the following particulars regarding occurrences that came under his personal observation during the occupancy of the town by them. Mr. Smith was in the bank about 6 o'clock on the evening of October 10, attending to some business connected with the institution, and in company with two of the bank clerks.

He at first thought about packing up and making his exit with his family from the town. He had proceeded to the balcony of the bank in company with the two clerks, and had scarcely arrived there before about 1600 cavalry occupied the streets, filling them completely.

Shortly afterwards, an officer of very fine appearance and splendidly dressed, came up and asked him if he was connected with the bank. He stated he was the cashier. He was then asked if the gentlemen with him were also connected with the institution (alluding to the two clerks). He replied in the affirmative. The officer, whose manner throughout was very polite and considerate, stated that it would be necessary for him to examine the bank, and immediately stationed guards around it.

On entering the institution, accompanied by a guard, and the cashier, and the clerks, he asked if any valuables were deposited there. Mr. Smith said there had been, but hearing the rebels were in the neighbourhood, they had all been removed from the town. The officer then asked Mr. Smith if he knew who he was; on being replied in the negative, he said, "I am Colonel Butler, of South Carolina. I am instructed to make an examination of the bank, and report to General Stuart my success." The guard placed over the bank were all South Carolina troops, belonging to the Hampton Legion. They were all well dressed, and generally speaking, fine-looking men. Shortly afterwards Colonel Butler said, "I understood before coming that the money had all been removed, but I hear there are some Government securities still in the bank." He then asked for the keys, which were reluctantly delivered, and the examination proceeded with. Mr. Smith informed him there were no Government securities, and the examination made was of a very slight character. All the doors were opened, and Colonel Butler merely looked in, without making a very minute search.

In one portion of the bank about $200 in specie was discovered, which the Colonel passed by, remarking that he would not disturb it, and that he had more than that in his possession at the time. During the conversation that ensued, and throughout which the rebel colonel was very affable and polite, he asked Mr. Smith if he was married. Mr. Smith said he was, and intimated that his family was close at hand. Colonel Butler told him that his family should not be harmed, and desired him to quiet the fears of any citizens he met with, and to report any misconduct of the troops under his command. After some further conversation the colonel left the bank.

THE ENGLISH PRESS ON THE PROPOSITION FOR AN ARMISTICE.

The Morning Herald, November 5.

"The Government of this country," says the Duke of Somerset, "would be only too glad if they could see an opportunity of assisting to put an end to the American war." We believe that this has for some time past been true of a portion of the Cabinet; we hope that his grace does not speak without warranty in affirming it now to be true of their hitherto dissentient colleagues. If so we feel assured that the nation will be content to waive inquiry into the reasons which have so long induced them to resist all attempts to arrange a joint action for that purpose, and to accept their late repentance in full satisfaction of its demands. It is absurd to tell us that no such attempts have been made. It is well known that France has all along been desirous to interpose her good offices; and that, if her desire has not been formally communicated to our Government, it has been because they have taken care that such a communication should not be made. But we have reason to believe that this faint shadow of an excuse is about to vanish. The Emperor of the French either has made, or is on the point of making, a proposal to Her Majesty's Government that France, England, and Russia shall jointly recommend to the belligerents a suspension of hostilities. Such a suspension, of course, means a negotiation for peace, and a negotiation for peace under such auspices as must tend to bring it to a speedy and successful conclusion. It rests entirely with the Government of Great Britain to say whether such an effort shall be made to deliver Lancashire from starvation, the North from bankruptcy and tyranny, the South from desolation and misery, and the world from a war which is as much a scandal to humanity as a scourge to America. The guilt, the madness of a refusal would be so obvious that we will not believe, until positively assured of it, that the present Ministry, irrational and inconsistent as their policy has hitherto been, will persevere in the fatal folly which has already entailed so much suffering on their innocent countrymen. If they should so persevere—if the obstinacy of Lord Russell should once more override the judgment of his wisest colleagues—if the Radical section of the Cabinet should still prevail against the voice of humanity and conscience, and against the interests of England, then on the Ministers, and on them alone, will rest the awful responsibility of the starvation of Lancashire, and it may be of the final ruin of the most important manufacturing industry of England. Already, on Mr. Cobden's own showing, a dishonourable policy is costing us from fifteen to twenty millions a year; it is starving, degrading, demoralizing half a million of honest, intelligent, industrious labourers, of whom we have much reason to be proud. It is to be believed that, when an opportunity offers of terminating this mischief and misery by the cheap sacrifice of the empty name and pretentious nonsense of "non-intervention," our Ministry will persist in a course which the opinion of America ascribes to cowardice, and which that of Europe stigmatises as imbecility.]

It may be said that, even if an armistice should be proposed by the Three Powers, it will not be accepted by the belligerents. Even were that the case nothing would be lost by making the attempt. It is absurd to say that the Government of the United States might make the proposal a casus belli. Even Mr. Seward and the rabble of ignorant Abolitionists who now seem to direct his policy are not silly enough to conceive that such a proposition affords them any ground of complaint, or could be otherwise resented than by an insolent answer; nor can they be mad enough to think of quarrelling with Three Powers any one of which could cope with them on equal terms even if they had no other enemy. War with the North is, then, not one whit more likely after the proposal has been made than it is to-day; nay, it is far less likely, inasmuch as the joint action would unite the mediating Powers in their American policy, and prevent the Washington Cabinet from entertaining the idea of getting up a quarrel with England singly. Nor is war—so long as it be not the result of any impatience, unfairness, or error on our part—more alarming or more to be deprecated than the present peace. It would relieve us at once; and ultimately, as compelling a speedy peace, it would be a gain to America. But the North would not follow up its rejection of the offer of the European Powers by a declaration of war; while that offer would put us thoroughly in the right, and give us a moral vantage-ground for any further action that might be deemed advisable. Again it is by no means unlikely that the belligerents might consent to an armistice. The Confederates would almost certainly do so. They would gain time to render their defences more efficient. They would prevent the North from availing itself of its naval superiority during the season when the rivers are full, and when its gunboats can co-operate with armies, which without such co-operation are invariably beaten. They would, moreover, incur a heavy moral loss by refusing; and though the people—proud, hot-headed, and sensitive—would, perhaps, care little about losing the good opinion of Europe, the able and prudent statesmen at the head of affairs are wiser and cooler than their countrymen. The South, then, even if she did not desire an armistice for her own sake, would accept it in order to entitle herself to the goodwill and good offices of those who propose it. The North might prove less tractable. The reasons which prove it an advantage to the Confederates, who stand on the defensive, would of course lead the invaders to deprecate it. But their army is in process of reconstruction; their finances are in disorder; their government is insecure, and possesses neither the confidence of the people nor its own. The Democrats are gaining ground; they are said to have carried a majority of the elections in the Keystone State; they have carried Ohio and Indiana; they are almost certain of Illinois, and our correspondent "Manhattan" evidently believes that they will carry New York. If these five States should declare themselves against Mr. Lincoln, the prosecution of the war would become, for his Government, an impossibility, and it is not improbable that he may choose to strike out a new policy before the opposition has time to complete its arrangements for impeding that which he has hitherto pursued. Moreover, resistance to the combined request of Europe would appear, to all prudent men, a doubtful and hazardous obstinacy; the fact that Russia, the old ally of the Union appears as one of the intervening Powers would go far to disarm American jealousy of France and England, and it is not impossible that the armistice might be as popular as it would be politic. Therefore we do not deem its acceptance by both belligerents an impossibility.

Of course the mere acceptance of an armistice would not bind either party to anything further. It is probable that some, at least, of the Southern ports would be opened and a certain amount of cotton would be released and find its way to England—enough, probably, to keep us going until the question of peace or war was finally settled. No hostile operations could be undertaken, and probably some check would be imposed on the infamous brutalities of the scoundrel Butler. In other respects matters would, we suppose, remain in statu quo. But the armistice would neither be proposed nor accepted save in the hope that it would, and in the intention that it should, lead to peace. Negotiations would be commenced, possibly under the auspices of the intervening Powers, perhaps independently; and, if undertaken with an honest desire on the part of the aggressor to come to terms, it is not likely that the settlement would be difficult. It is probable that the North would, under such circumstances, obtain a better frontier than it would ever extort by war. The South would never give up Maryland to the force of the enemy; she might be induced to submit the destiny of that State to European arbitration; while North-Western Virginia and Northern Missouri—which under a peace settled in America must probably share the fate of the larger portions of those States which are intensely Southern—might by European diplomatists, careless of the forms of American law and the doctrine of State unity, be given to the country with which they are naturally allied. Peace, and peace on fair terms, may be probably secured by the course which is now advised by the French Government. If the English Ministry stand in the way of so excellent a result they will incur, as they will assuredly deserve, the censure of history, the condemnation of posterity, the scorn of foreign Powers, and the anger, deep and bitter, of their wronged and wretched countrymen.

The Times, November 10

The Paris journal La Patrie has, for some days, affected to be exclusively informed upon a subject on which there is much less mystery than our contemporary would have us believe. La Patrie, as will be seen from the extract which appeared in our second addition of yesterday, asserts that an attempt at mediation in America has been projected by France and Russia, and has been submitted to England, with a view to the joint action of three Powers. This journal further states that this proposition, "emanating from France, and immediately accepted by Russia," contemplates an armistice for six months, and the suspension of all operations by sea or land during this period. Negotiations are, of course, to be in the meantime set on foot to terminate the war. "Yet," says La Patrie, "if we are to credit the still somewhat vague reports in circulation, the proposition of France and Russia has not met with a favourable reception at London." The French public is, however, informed that a Cabinet Council was to be held on Tuesday (yesterday), and at this Council the Palmerston Cabinet would adopt its resolution. Thus it is sought to create an impression throughout Europe and America that France and Russia are most anxious to terminate the civil war in America, and see their way to the accomplishment of that good work, but that England stands aloof, and is about either churlishly to refuse, or very reluctantly to afford a sluggish co-operation.

There is in the statement of our French contemporary some truth mixed with very considerable error. France is, no doubt, as France has been from the commencement of this war, very anxious to interfere. France wants the American cotton as much as we do; perhaps, looking at the state of our stocks, even more. France, also, is less patient under the exercise of extreme belligerent rights than we are. It is, we believe, quite true that France has communicated a circular diplomatic note to the Courts of London and St. Petersburg, inviting a joint action for the purposes stated by La Patrie. Russia, however, has no special interest in this question. Russia wants no cotton; her great staple is flax, and she is rather benefited by the scarcity of cotton in the markets of the world. Russia, so far from "immediately accepting the proposition of France," has, we have reason to think, by no means committed herself in the matter. The announcement in the Journal de St. Petersburg is anything but that of an intention to interfere in this strife. It is simply to the effect that foreign Powers have no right whatever to interfere in America, and that Russia can do no more than she has already constantly done, that is, tender advice in a friendly spirit. This seems to us to be a very different thing from "joint action," which, if it mean anything, must mean the putting forward a substantive proposition for acceptance or rejection by the belligerents, and the pressing that proposition upon them by some prospect of subsequent action against the belligerent which shall reject it, or in favour of the belligerent which shall accept it. Our information is not to the same effect as that of our French contemporary, and we are not convinced that the Government of St. Petersburg is prepared to go with France into the very dangerous and far-drafting policy of American mediation.

No very exclusive information was required to know that a Cabinet Council was to be held yesterday, nor to know that the French Note must form a portion of the matters to be discussed. But, until the Cabinet discusses and decides, any statement as to the favourable or unfavourable reception in London of this proposition must necessarily be premature. Nor is it very likely that at the first Cabinet Council held after the recess any "resolutions" would be adopted upon a subject so important as that with which we are now dealing. We believe, therefore, that this project of intervention is not nearly so far advanced as the French press would have the world believe, and that the true state of the case is that France is ardent in the matter, Russia unwilling but not absolutely averse, and England unsanguine, but anxious for a real opportunity.

Has that opportunity, however, yet arrived? What does France desire that Europe should propose to these belligerents? What hope can we have that the Federal Government would submit to a suspension of arms by sea and land for six months? Such an armistice would undoubtedly be very convenient to the South, very convenient to England, and very convenient to France. The South, relieved from the blockade of their coast, would be able to exchange their now valueless millions of cotton bales for sugar, salt, tea, coffee, calico, broadcloth, leather, and every other article not contraband of war, under the want of which they now so desperately suffer. England would be able to set her mills to work. France would recover her lost customers for her silks and wines and her Paris articles, and would also obtain the cotton which she now buys through us at fabulous prices. Both the mediators would find their account in such a mediation. But what would the North get by it? To her it would be a request to allow us to tie up her right arm. We are to ask her to allow her enemies to reprovise themselves, and to restore their credit by the export of their cotton; and we are to ask her at the same time to cut herself off from her most promising field of operations for a whole year. The season for the employment of the Northern gunboats is about to recommence; the spring will bring the possibility of a second invasion of the South. Yet we are to ask the North to forego their best opportunities, and to remain inactive till the heats of summer again drive their armies northwards and render the banks of the rivers inaccessible to their gunboats. If the North is determined to make peace, and is anxious only for an excuse, then, indeed, this or any other mediation would be feasible. But there is no evidence that the struggle is yet arrived at that point. If we go into this matter as a European league and draw upon ourselves insult, we shall be compelled to vindicate our honour. We cannot back out under such circumstances, and we cannot tell how far events may carry us.

All this and much more has to be considered, and we hope will be very carefully considered before we join any league such as that now proposed. At present we are quite free, and we have done no harm. To-morrow we may be closely bound and may do no good. Of course, no one can tell what private information our Government may have received; but we cannot see any public ground for great expectations of immediate results. If the North are ready to give up their blockade, they would undoubtedly rather give it up to France and Russia in conjunction with us than to us alone; but if they are to be forced to give it up, we hope we shall not be one of the party which is to compel them. This French note is matter for serious consideration, but we cannot think that it offers any good ground for sanguine expectation of an immediate return of prosperity to our manufactures, or of the sudden resumption of our old commercial intercourse with the two nations which once formed the United States.

The Times, November 13.

We observe that our contemporary, La France, has thrown aside the inaccurate statement of La Patrie as to the adherence of Russia to the French proposition for an armistice, and is content to argue that it would be very wrong in Russia and England not to accede to the French project. Our information was that Russia had refused to have anything to do with this project of an armistice, and the assertion to the contrary is now abandoned. All the story, therefore, of the adhesion of Prussia and of the Northern Powers, and perhaps of Austria and Spain, to this European mediation falls to the ground. It is simply a proposition made by France, and not yet backed by any other Power. La France thinks that "the Cabinets of London and St. Petersburg will have great difficulty in justifying to the public opinion of the world a refusal to join in the proposed enterprise." How that may be we need not now argue, for the contingency has not yet occurred; but when it is further remarked that if Mr. Lincoln should refuse the armistice, "the mediating Powers would thenceforward have the right to consult only their own interests," we see in this French proposition not only mediation, but intervention, and forcible removal of blockade and war.

PERRYVILLE, the scene of the recent severe battle, is situated between Danville and Bardstown, but much nearer the former place. It is a post village of Boyle county, Kentucky, and numbers but a few hundred inhabitants. It is forty-one miles due south of Frankfort, and 563 miles from Washington. There are but five stores and two churches in the place. The county contains 230 square miles, or about 157,000 acres. The surface of the country is undulating and the soil very fertile. The county is drained by the Salt River and branches of the Dick's River, and had a population in 1850 of less than 10,000 persons. Danville is the county town.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property, &c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political, social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent commercial, however remote, however small the class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the slipshod and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This co-operation has been most generously accorded us. There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no outlet through the muzzled press of those States. Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible misapprehension—that it is not the sole object. Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance. "THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

ESS ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

At eleven o'clock on the night of November 7, General M'Clellan received at headquarters an order from President Lincoln relieving him of his command, and appointing General Burnside as his successor. The event was quite unexpected, not only to the army but in Washington. It is true that the Republicans had stated that if Mr. Seymour was elected, the Democratic general would be disgraced, but no one ever credits the assertions made in the election. For once the Lincoln Cabinet acted with promptitude and, we may add, boldness; the details show that General M'Clellan was hated; and that the motives of action were to deprive him of power and disgrace him. He was given no time for reflection or consultation, and at midnight he was ordered forthwith to give up his command. Further, besides leaving his command, he was ordered to report himself at Trenton, so that he might remain in the neighbourhood of the army. At the moment he was called upon to prove his loyalty to the Federal Government by giving up his command, and which it is more than probable he would have retained in defiance of the President, he was immediately obeyed the mandate, and he gave his command to General Burnside, who refused to accept it, not only on account of his responsibility, but because of his personal regard for his late chief; but he ultimately did so, at the urgent request of General M'Clellan. The official act of the late Commander of the Army of the Potomac was to issue the following

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp near Rectortown, Virginia, Nov. 7.
Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac.—An order from President Lincoln devolves upon Major-General Burnside the command of this army. In parting with you I cannot but express my love and gratitude I bear to you. As an army you have been under my care. In you I have never found a fault. The battles you have fought under my command will live in our nation's history. The glory of our mutual perils and fatigues, the graves of our fallen in battle and by disease, the broken forms of our wounded and sickness have disabled, the strongest of which can exist among men, unite us still by an indissoluble tie. We shall ever be comrades in supporting the rights of our country and the nationality of its people.
G. B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General, United States' Army.
There is a studied coldness about the farewell

order that must be exceedingly annoying to Mr. Lincoln and his subordinates. There is no commonplace about duty to the constituted authorities, and M'Clellan claims the army as being formed and constituted by his care. He reminds the soldiers of the ties between them and him, but not a word about any allegiance to their constitutional Commander-in-chief. Finally, he speaks of the army supporting the Constitution; well knowing that if it does so it must oppose the Government, which has violated all the main principles of the Constitution. The farewell order is dignified and proper, but to the Lincolnites it must seem very sarcastic and bitterly contemptuous in its tone.

General M'Clellan would have left immediately, but it was impossible to get through the business in less than three days. On the evening of the 9th all the officers belonging to headquarters assembled at his tent to bid him farewell. The only toast given was "The Army of the Potomac," by General M'Clellan. The omission of the President's name on such an occasion is remarkable. On the 10th, General M'Clellan, accompanied by General Burnside, visited the various army corps. "As the General rode through the ranks the torn and tattered banners of the veteran regiments were dipped to greet him, while the thousands of soldiers gave vent in continuous rounds of cheers and applause to their feelings."

A commander never received a mere flattering ovation from his soldiers, and it has always been the good fortune of M'Clellan to be exceedingly popular with the troops. On the 11th, General M'Clellan left the camp, and proceeded to New Jersey. Everywhere on his passage he was received with enthusiasm, and preparations were made to give him a grand reception in Trenton.

The following is the order issued by General Burnside in assuming the command:—

In accordance with General Orders No. 182, issued by the President of the United States, I hereby assume command of the Army of the Potomac. Patriotism and the exercise of my every energy in the direction of this army, aided by the full and hearty co-operation of its officers and men, will, I hope, under the blessing of God, insure its success.

Having been a sharer of the privations and a witness of the bravery of the old Army of the Potomac in the Maryland campaign, and fully identified with them in their feeling of respect and esteem for General M'Clellan, entertained through a long and most friendly association with him, I feel that it is not as a stranger I assume command.

To the Ninth Army Corps, so long and intimately associated with me, I need say nothing. Our histories are identical.

With diffidence for myself, but with a proud confidence in the unswerving loyalty and determination of the gallant army now entrusted to my care, I accept its control, with the steadfast assurance that the just cause must prevail.

A. E. BURNSIDE, Major-General Commanding.

The new commander is careful to give prominence to his respect, esteem, and friendship for M'Clellan. By so doing he would not make the change popular with the soldiers, but he might make it more tolerable. Again, this is a blow for the Lincolnites. At the time they have disgraced M'Clellan, and are adding insult to insult by the publication of an official correspondence charging him with disobedience, and with defending his inactivity by paltry excuses, the new general proclaims that his predecessor, though disgraced by the Government, is worthy of the respect and esteem of the army.

He has held all his official positions since the rebellion broke out at the solicitation of the Republicans. He was appointed from Ohio by Republicans—called to Washington by the President, without desire on his part or recommendation from any political party—was placed at the head of the army by Mr. Lincoln and a Republican Senate without political recommendation or personal solicitation—took the field for the advance on Richmond at the President's order—returned by the same authority—was deprived of his army and again urged to resume command by the constitutional Commander-in-Chief, and again relieved from service by the same high functionary. Democrats have had nothing to do with all this; they have only asked for fair play.

At a Democratic meeting, Mr. Van Buren spoke of General M'Clellan as the democratic candidate at the next Presidential election, and the suggestion was received with great applause. The Republicans are, of course, professedly pleased at the downfall of a general whose politics are democratic, but the agitation in Wall-street, and the rise in price of gold consequent upon the event, show that the downfall of M'Clellan is regarded as detrimental to the public service. The rumours that were immediately set afloat about Burnside's defeat, prove that the public have no confidence in M'Clellan's successor, or, perhaps, we ought to say in the military capacity of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers. M'Clellan was disgraced for not obeying an order to advance and give the enemy battle contrary to his judgment. Will Burnside be more obedient? If so, the headquarters of the Army of the Potomac will absolutely be at the White House. The mode of conducting war is not very promising. People in New York are saying that if Mr. Lincoln or General Halleck desires to command the operations of the army, they ought to leave Washington, and go to the camp.

We elsewhere give the correspondence that has been published by the Government to justify the dismissal of General M'Clellan from military service.

We need not criticise that document. General M'Clellan wanted shoes for his army at the commencement of October; on the 6th of that month he was ordered to advance and give the enemy battle; and on the 25th it was asserted that 48,000 pairs of shoes had been received, and that "10,000 more were on their way, and 15,000 more ordered." It does not seem to have occurred to General Halleck that shoes on their way and shoes ordered were not available for immediate use. The general in the field is certainly the best judge of the propriety of advancing and giving the enemy battle; and the order would have been more intelligible if it had informed M'Clellan of the position of the Confederates. To play a game of chess by telegraph is possible, but to command an army by telegraph is simply ridiculous.

It was rumoured in Washington that the dismissal of M'Clellan would be followed by a disruption of the Cabinet.

In consequence of the report of the Military Commission on the surrender of Harper's Ferry, Colonel Ford and Major Baird have been dismissed from the service. Dismissals just now are the fashion in the North—"Lieutenant Johnson, of the 17th Kentucky Union Regiment, having tendered his resignation on account of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, has been dismissed the service in disgrace." Dismissing an officer who tenders his resignation is not a very severe punishment.

Archbishop Hughes gives himself a vast amount of unnecessary trouble in trying to make the North hate England. That hatred is already sufficiently strong.

Archbishop Hughes has written a letter to Mr. Seward, in which he says that America should be prepared, for there is no love for her on the other side of the Atlantic. Generally speaking, in Europe the United States are ignored, if not despised; treated of in conversation in the same contemptuous language that Americans might employ towards the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands or Vancouver Island. The Archbishop is sorry to say that these assertions are unquestionably true.

The Archbishop does not quite adhere to the truth, but we do not deny that the conduct of the North since the commencement of the war has done much to make her disliked in Europe. The empty vauntings, the false reports, the disregard of

Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

At 11 o'clock on the night of November 7, General M'Clellan received at headquarters an order from President Lincoln relieving him of his command, and appointing General Burnside as his successor. The event was quite unexpected, not only in the army but in Washington. It is true the Republicans had stated that if Mr. Seymour was elected, the Democratic general would be disgraced, but no one ever credits the assertions made in the heat of an election. For once the Lincoln Cabinet has acted with promptitude and, we may add, boldness. All the details show that General M'Clellan was feared and hated; and that the motives of action were to deprive him of power and disgrace him. He is allowed no time for reflection or consultation, but late at night is ordered forthwith to give up his command. Further, besides leaving his command, he is ordered to report himself at Trenton, so that he was not to remain in the neighbourhood of the army. At the moment he was called upon to prove his loyalty to the Federal Government by giving up a command which it is more than probable he might have retained in defiance of the President, he is treated as a suspected person. General M'Clellan immediately obeyed the mandate, and transferred his command to General Burnside, who at first refused to accept it, not only on account of the responsibility, but because of his personal friendship to his late chief; but he ultimately did so, it is said, at the urgent request of General M'Clellan. The last official act of the late Commander of the Army of the Potomac was to issue the following address:—

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp near Rectortown, Virginia, Nov. 7.

Officers and Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac,—An order of the President devolves upon Major-General Burnside the command of this army. In parting with you I cannot express the love and gratitude I bear to you. As an army you have grown up under my care. In you I have never found doubt or coldness. The battles you have fought under my command will proudly live in our nation's history. The glory you have achieved—our mutual perils and fatigues, the graves of our comrades fallen in battle and by disease, the broken forms of those whose wounds and sickness have disabled, the strongest associations which can exist among men, unite us still by an indissoluble tie. We shall ever be comrades in supporting the Constitution of our country and the nationality of its people.

G. B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General, United States' Army.

order that must be exceedingly annoying to Mr. Lincoln and his subordinates. There is no commonplace about duty to the constituted authorities, and M'Clellan claims the army as being formed and constituted by his care. He reminds the soldiers of the ties between them and him, but not a word about any allegiance to their constitutional Commander-in-chief. Finally, he speaks of the army supporting the Constitution; well knowing that if it does so it must oppose the Government, which has violated all the main principles of the Constitution. The farewell order is dignified and proper, but to the Lincolnites it must seem very sarcastic and bitterly contemptuous in its tone.

General M'Clellan would have left immediately, but it was impossible to get through the business in less than three days. On the evening of the 9th all the officers belonging to headquarters assembled at his tent to bid him farewell. The only toast given was "The Army of the Potomac," by General M'Clellan. The omission of the President's name on such an occasion is remarkable. On the 10th, General M'Clellan, accompanied by General Burnside, visited the various army corps. "As the General rode through the ranks the torn and tattered banners of the veteran regiments were dipped to greet him, while the thousands of soldiers gave vent in continuous rounds of cheers and applause to their feelings."

A commander never received a more flattering ovation from his soldiers, and it has always been the good fortune of M'Clellan to be exceedingly popular with the troops. On the 11th, General M'Clellan left the camp, and proceeded to New Jersey. Everywhere on his passage he was received with enthusiasm, and preparations were made to give him a grand reception in Trenton.

In accordance with General Orders No. 182, issued by the President of the United States, I hereby assume command of the Army of the Potomac. Patriotism and the exercise of my every energy in the direction of this army, aided by the full and hearty co-operation of its officers and men, will, I hope, under the blessing of God, insure its success.

Having been a sharer of the privations and a witness of the bravery of the old Army of the Potomac in the Maryland campaign, and fully identified with them in their feeling of respect and esteem for General M'Clellan, entertained through a long and most friendly association with him, I feel that it is not as a stranger I assume command.

To the Ninth Army Corps, so long and intimately associated with me, I need say nothing. Our histories are identical.

With diffidence for myself, but with a proud confidence in the unswerving loyalty and determination of the gallant army now entrusted to my care, I accept its control, with the steadfast assurance that the just cause must prevail.

A. E. BURNSIDE, Major-General Commanding.

The new commander is careful to give prominence to his respect, esteem, and friendship for M'Clellan. By so doing he would not make the change popular with the soldiers, but he might make it more tolerable. Again, this is a blow for the Lincolnites. At the time they have disgraced M'Clellan, and are adding insult to insult by the publication of an official correspondence charging him with disobedience, and with defending his inactivity by paltry excuses, the new general proclaims that his predecessor, though disgraced by the Government, is worthy of the respect and esteem of the army.

He has held all his official positions since the rebellion broke out at the solicitation of the Republicans. He was appointed from Ohio by Republicans—called to Washington by the President, without desire on his part or recommendation from any political party—was placed at the head of the army by Mr. Lincoln and a Republican Senate without political recommendation or personal solicitation—took the field for the advance on Richmond at the President's order—returned by the same authority—was deprived of his army and again urged to resume command by the constitutional Commander-in-Chief, and again relieved from service by the same high functionary. Democrats have had nothing to do with all this; they have only asked for fair play.

At a Democratic meeting, Mr. Van Buren spoke of General M'Clellan as the democratic candidate at the next Presidential election, and the suggestion was received with great applause. The Republicans are, of course, professedly pleased at the downfall of a general whose politics are democratic, but the agitation in Wall-street, and the rise in price of gold consequent upon the event, show that the downfall of M'Clellan is regarded as detrimental to the public service. The rumours that were immediately set afloat about Burnside's defeat, prove that the public have no confidence in M'Clellan's successor, or, perhaps, we ought to say in the military capacity of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers. M'Clellan was disgraced for not obeying an order to advance and give the enemy battle contrary to his judgment. Will Burnside be more obedient? If so, the headquarters of the Army of the Potomac will absolutely be at the White House. The mode of conducting war is not very promising. People in New York are saying that if Mr. Lincoln or General Halleck desires to command the operations of the army, they ought to leave Washington, and go to the camp.

We elsewhere give the correspondence that has been published by the Government to justify the dismissal of General M'Clellan from military service.

We need not criticise that document. General M'Clellan wanted shoes for his army at the commencement of October; on the 6th of that month he was ordered to advance and give the enemy battle; and on the 25th it was asserted that 48,000 pairs of shoes had been received, and that "10,000 more were on their way, and 15,000 more ordered." It does not seem to have occurred to General Halleck that shoes on their way and shoes ordered were not available for immediate use. The general in the field is certainly the best judge of the propriety of advancing and giving the enemy battle; and the order would have been more intelligible if it had informed M'Clellan of the position of the Confederates. To play a game of chess by telegraph is possible, but to command an army by telegraph is simply ridiculous.

It was rumoured in Washington that the dismissal of M'Clellan would be followed by a disruption of the Cabinet.

In consequence of the report of the Military Commission on the surrender of Harper's Ferry, Colonel Ford and Major Baird have been dismissed from the service. Dismissals just now are the fashion in the North—"Lieutenant Johnson, of the 17th Kentucky Union Regiment, having tendered his resignation on account of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, has been dismissed the service in disgrace." Dismissing an officer who tenders his resignation is not a very severe punishment.

Archbishop Hughes gives himself a vast amount of unnecessary trouble in trying to make the North hate England. That hatred is already sufficiently strong.

Archbishop Hughes has written a letter to Mr. Seward, in which he says that America should be prepared, for there is no love for her on the other side of the Atlantic. Generally speaking, in Europe the United States are ignored, if not despised; treated of in conversation in the same contemptuous language that Americans might employ towards the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands or Vancouver Island. The Archbishop is sorry to say that these assertions are unquestionably true.

The Archbishop does not quite adhere to the truth, but we do not deny that the conduct of the North since the commencement of the war has done much to make her disliked in Europe. The empty vauntings, the false reports, the disregard of international law and courtesy, and the barbarities of such men as Butler, Turchin, and McNeil, disgust civilized nations. Does the Archbishop think the following narrative, taken from the items of the New York telegram, calculated to make Europe respect the United States?

Letters are published in the New York journals showing that Superintendent of Police Kennedy, of New York city, on his own authority, caused a lady from New Orleans, 22 years of age, named Brinsmode, to be arrested in Washington and brought to New York, where she was confined in a common cell of a police station during five weeks. All applications of her friends to see her were useless, Kennedy threatening, if they continued their applications, to have them arrested. They then applied to the War Department and to Provost Marshal Draper at Washington, who denied all knowledge of this arrest, and ordered the lady to be released at once. The grounds of her arrest were Kennedy's assertion that she sang Secession airs on the steamer coming from New Orleans, and that she was a spy. The New York journals denounce Kennedy's conduct as most infamous.

General Scott has replied to President Buchanan's communication, that Buchanan might have reinforced Forts Jackson and St. Philips with small garrisons until Congress could have raised volunteers. General Scott cannot believe that Mr. Buchanan, although acknowledging himself responsible, consented to Secretary Floyd's removing guns and rifles from Northern repositories to Southern arsenals; also to the removal of artillery to Ship Island and Galveston. General Scott also defends himself for publishing various official communications. It is but justice to Mr. Buchanan and Secretary Floyd to remark that the removal of arms, the number of which has been grossly exaggerated, was made in the regular course of the business of the War Department, according to law, which provided for the periodical distribution among the various States of the surplus stock of the Federal armories.

General Fremont has been ordered to report himself for duty. He is a Republican, and so his military failures, and his past offences in respect to fort building, are forgiven.

In New York the draft has been indefinitely postponed; in plain truth, the Government dare not enforce it. Will the collection of the taxes be also indefinitely postponed? We are told that the Lager beer, brewers and cigar manufacturers of New York city are organizing themselves to resist the taxes affecting their trades, as they say the taxes are so onerous as to destroy their business.

It is almost unnecessary to state that the reported captures of 3000 Confederates and of Mobile are not confirmed, which is a Northern expression which means that they are known to be false.

From the South we have the following interesting intelligence:—

The Bishop of Georgia announces that the union of the diocese of Texas, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, the Carolinas, and the Virginias, is completed under the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Confederate States of America. The first general council will meet at Augusta.

The Merrimac (No. 2) is reported to be below Fort Darling. She will do good service to the Confederacy if she does half the work the Northerners fear she will accomplish.

The Northern Government winked at its soldiers uttering forged Confederate notes, and it is now realizing the danger and wickedness of giving any countenance to forgery.

Two brokers in New York have been sent to Fort Lafayette for defrauding the Government by issuing forged bills on the Government Subsistence Department. Fifty persons are said to be implicated, and the frauds are said to exceed $1,000,000.

Commander Maury has arrived in Europe from the South.

ENGLAND.

The people of Lancashire are sinking deeper every week into starvation and despair. The increase in pauperism last week was above 10,000, distributed as follows:—

	Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	1,110	Manchester	2,000
Blackburn	380	Oldham	1,300
Bolton	390	Preston	730
Burnley	140	Rochdale	690
Bury	400	Salford	480
Chorley	90	Stockport	390
Chorlton	900	Todmorden	100
Glossop	100	Warrington	110
Haslingden	230	Wigan	130
Liverpool	370
Macclesfield	120	Total	10,290

The total number is now over 250,000, in a population of two millions. Over one-eighth, therefore, are paupers; one-fourth, probably, are without other resources than those received from charity; ere long one-half the entire population of the distressed districts will be living on alms. This state of things is frightful to contemplate; but this is not all. There are hundreds of thousands who have been reduced, not from good wages to starvation, but from a comfortable position to indigence—small shopkeepers and others, whose little capital has wasted away, who are equally unemployed with the factory operatives, but who do not come in for their share of the compassion and relief, to which they are equally entitled. In four or five years, at worst, if things should presently begin to mend, the traces of this horrible calamity will have vanished from the condition of the operatives; but the men of small means who have lost their all will never recover themselves. Next to their condition, that of the overlookers and managers—the higher class of factory employes, who might take rank with clerks in merchants' offices—is the most deplorable. They are looking to emigration as a remedy; we consider this a mistake, for reasons which we have already explained, but it is a very natural one. They held a meeting on Saturday, in St. John's Hall, Manchester, when the secretary of their association read letters empowering him to select several families (about thirty) for Queensland, to be sent at Government expense, and five for Algeria, to farm on the estates of a Parisian gentleman, who offered what seem very fair terms. The reports from the Guardians and Relief Committees are enough to sicken the hearts of feeling men. Blackburn has 22,500 paupers, and about 11,000 persons besides in receipt of charity. Here the Unemployed Overlookers' Committee have withdrawn fifty-one families from the list, undertaking to support them themselves, allowing 2s. per man, and 1s. 6d. per head for wives and children. Arrangements have been completed for the division of the sufferers between the Relief Committee and the Union; but we do not learn that the former have made the increase of the parish allowance a condition of the bargain, which they certainly ought to have done. Wigan has above 17,000 persons dependent on alms, and has just raised a third subscription, amounting to between £7000 and £8000. The colliery owners have made very large donations of coal, and it is hoped that the poor will not suffer for want of fuel. This town was one of the earliest to feel the distress, and has suffered very severely; though, perhaps, less absolutely dependent on the cotton trade than many others. In Preston there are 37,000 persons living on the parish allowance and the charity distributed by the Relief Committee. An interview has taken place between the latter and a deputation from the Board of Guardians. The Committee refused to divide the suffering population with the Union, as has been done in Blackburn; they protested against the reduction of the relief granted by the Board in proportion to that received from charity, reminding the Guardians that the object of the benevolent was not to lighten the rates, but to mitigate the sufferings of the poor; and they affirmed that the parish allowance was insufficient. The conference broke up with great dissatisfaction on both sides. The Guardians are clearly in the wrong.

Liberal subscriptions are being made in all directions. The Mansion-house Committee last week received £35,000 and distributed £38,000.

The Central Relief Committee held its meeting on Monday, and received deputations from Leeds and Bradford. Mr. Farnall read his report:—

MANCHESTER, Nov. 24, 1862.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report for the week ended the 15th inst., on twenty-seven unions in the cotton manufacturing district, will show you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of 11,021 persons. There were on the 15th inst. 248,764 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 51,413 persons were so relieved; there is therefore, an increase of 197,351 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 381.9 per cent. The total weekly cost of out-door relief on the 15th inst. was £16,646 0s. 7d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2,505 12s. 3d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £14,140 8s. 2d., or 564.2 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions, on the 15th inst. was 12.5; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.6. The average amount of out-door relief per head per week, in these unions, on the 15th inst. was 1s. 5d.; the lowest was 1s. 5d., and the highest 1s. 10d., at Glossop. On the 15th inst. 12,540 persons were receiving in-door relief, and 236,224 were receiving out-door relief in these unions. I have received returns from the honorary secretaries of fifty-five local committees formed in the cotton manufacturing districts for the distribution of charitable aid, and I am now enabled to state that the fifty-five local committees adverted to were, on the 15th inst., relieving 132,011 persons who were not also receiving parochial relief from the Guardians, and that these fifty-five local committees expended £12,195 1s. 6d. in charity during the week ended the 15th inst. I have received no returns from ten honorary secretaries of local relief committees, and, therefore, my report is so far incomplete.

Mr. Farnall also made some remarks on the questions asked as to the rates actually paid in Lancashire. He took as a fair example the case of Ashton-under-Lyne, where the rateable value of property is under £300,000 a year, and the amount of money expended on the relief of the poor is now at the rate of over £125,000 a year. The following letter from Lord Derby bears on the same subject:—

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th inst., in which you inform me * * * I regret that I am unable in the compass of a letter to give a detailed answer to these objections; but I am going over to Manchester to-morrow, and will hand your letter over to a sub-committee which we have recently appointed for the express purpose of furnishing such information as may be required from a distance. In the meantime, however, I may say, generally, that the amount of contribution from those locally interested cannot and will not ever be known; but there is no doubt that the sums expended, of which no public notice has been, or will be taken, very largely exceed the total which has appeared. I do not mean to say that some persons have not grossly neglected their duty in this respect, but, taken as a body, I am bound to say that the manufacturers and employers of labour generally have, by keeping their own people in pay, though out of work, and in other ways made individual sacrifices and payments in comparison with which the largest amounts subscribed would appear very insignificant indeed. The Lord-Lieutenant has also, on the recommendation of the Central Committee, called a county meeting for the 2nd of next month, at which I hope to see a very large sum locally raised, and those who have hitherto not given, or given inadequately, make up for their short-comings.

With regard to the second point, I would observe, that though the amount of poor-rate in the pound may not appear high, that rate must not be taken as a test of the severity of the distress in a district where it is universal, where one-eighth of the population are actual recipients of parochial relief, and where, perhaps, five-sixths of the remainder are either living by the aid of charity, or are so nearly on the verge of pauperism themselves that the slightest increase in the rates would convert them from payers to receivers. To this it must be added that the small minority who are still solvent, and on whom alone the rate falls, are themselves paying rates upon the value of mills and machinery which are not only yielding no profit, but are actually entailing daily loss. I think it right to mention this, because in the south and in agricultural districts the universality of pressure is not understood, and much misapprehension has, I know, been the result. I earnestly hope that such misapprehension will not interfere with your benevolent efforts in Fimlico, for I can truly say that the extent of the distress is such as to require all the aid that can be obtained from all quarters.

I have, &c,
DERBY.

H. Kingscote, Esq.

A controversy, provoked by the Rev. C. Kingsley, has been raging in the columns of the Times. The Cambridge Professor wrote a letter reviling the Manchester millowners, partly because their rates had always been low, and partly because they had used slave-grown cotton. A reply immediately appeared, pointing out that rates in Lancashire were low because wages were high; that permanently high poor-rates prove not that the rich are doing much for the poor, but the reverse; and that the use of slave-grown cotton was a matter in which the manufacturer had no choice. Mr. Kingsley is one of those men who are always the better for being smartly answered; and his reply, though very silly, was a good deal less violent than his original letter. The Times took up the cudgels in his behalf; but in vain. The effect of the attack, which was calculated to damp public charity, was unimportant, and brought out a mass of facts which demonstrated beyond doubt that Mr. Kingsley had been bearing false witness against his neighbours, and that with great recklessness. It is shown that the average amount expended in poor-law relief is about 2s. in the pound on the property of the distressed districts, and above 4s. in the pound on that portion of the property which can pay rates; that one of the suffering unions has already levied 7s. 6d. this year, and will have to levy 5s. more at Christmas; and that, in fact, the rates are so heavy as to be actually and seriously increasing pauperism. The following passages in the controversy deserve attention. The Rev. Hugh McNeile, of Liverpool, says:—

Allow me briefly but warmly to protest against Mr. Kingsley's "wet blanket." It is one-sided. He contrasts skilfully the amount of poor-rates in Wessex with the amount in Lancashire, but he is silent on the subject of wages in the two localities. He knows a clergyman who has been paying for the last twenty years more than £100 in poor-rates, besides his subscriptions and private charities. Will he have the kindness to inform your readers what wages for out-of-door labour that clergyman has been paying all that time? I believe the answer must be from 10s. to 12s. per week. I know a clergyman who lived in the south many years, and paid a poor rate of from 3s. to 5s. or 6s. in the pound, while he got out-of-door labour done on his glebe and garden for 11s. or 12s. per week. He removed to Lancashire, where he found his poor-rate nil, but where he paid, and is still paying, 18s. to 20s. a week as a labouring man's wages. I should venture to think that the system of liberal wages with low or vanishing rates is to be preferred to a system of low wages eked out by an onerous poor-rate.

Another writer, Mr. Ecrody, of Burnley, speaks feelingly of the consequences of a heavy poor-rate at the present juncture:—

Once for all, let me assure Mr. Kingsley, that so far as my information extends, it is neither the large owners of property in Lancashire, nor the wealthy merchants and manufacturers, who are unwilling to pay poor-rates of 10s. in the pound, if needful. Scheming and selfish as he may consider them, I believe they would gladly pay enormous rates if such could with propriety be laid. Not even Mr. Kingsley's bitter taunts, however, will induce them to take a course which would only result in crushing down most of those between themselves and their afflicted workmen into one gulf of hopeless ruin, and would place in their hands, at any price they might choose to offer, the small properties of their neighbours and of their less wealthy fellow-manufacturers.

For upon whom do the present poor-rates fall with most fatal force? I know but too well. On co-operative associations; on that worthy portion of the working class who have built small shop and cottage properties, to which they cling with affecting desperation; on small shopkeepers, tailors, shoemakers; on artisans in general, and on that large class of small manufacturers who have but recently risen from the ranks of labour, and whose long-cherished savings are being paid away shilling by shilling, with bitter tears, to satisfy the unrelenting claims of this sad crisis.

Now, I ask, is all our sympathy to be given to the lower class of operatives? And are we to pursue without pity the deserving classes I have enumerated, embracing as they do the highest order of working men—by exacting still heavier rates from them, while their incomes are totally suspended, and thus driving them to sacrifice their little properties?

These are the stern practical questions which we have daily to consider, on whom devolves the grave responsibility of saving life, and at the same time acting justly and considerately towards all. I sat with my neighbours for five hours last evening on the business of the local relief committee. We had, as usual, many affecting cases to investigate, but I think none quite so distressing as those of men who are struggling against the irresistible current which is sweeping them and their families back from the position of proprietors and ratepayers to that of paupers and rate receivers.

One had a number of shares in a co-operative company on which he had borrowed all he could, and must now let them go. Another had ten powerlooms which he could neither work nor sell, and famine was already written on his countenance. Another had been hunted out by the district visitor, and though found to be starving, both he and his wife refused to apply for relief—the bitterness of such a necessity seeming to them worse than death.

It is affirmed that £90,000 has been subscribed in Manchester alone; and subscriptions form only a small part of the money spent by the capitalists of Lancashire on its labourers. The remarks of Mr. M. Ross deserve attention:—

From careful calculations he could state that the actual and positive loss of employers of labour in the cotton trade was £130,000 per week. This was exclusive of depreciation of property and interest on capital. Many of the millowners were also cottage owners, and they could not—even if they desired to do so—distrain upon their tenants, and there was this loss, in addition to depreciation of property and machinery. The position of the millowners consequently demanded their sympathy. He held in his hand the balance-sheet of a large firm, giving a statement of the results of the last 1½ years. The mill employed about 1100 hands, and worked on an average forty-two hours a week. During the period mentioned the actual loss sustained by this firm was £12,985, and in this amount not one penny was charged for interest on capital or depreciation of machinery, the value of the plant being £80,000. If the works had been entirely stopped during the period named, the expenses would have been for rent, taxes, coals, and wages, £6430, thus showing a loss through working of £6555. During this period there had been paid in wages to the workpeople, £33,966. Out of 1100 hands there had not been twenty applications to the parish for relief. This same firm had a mill in another locality working the same time at a similar loss. They at present paid wages exceeding £1000 per week, and they held property assessed to the poor's rate at £5000 per week, upon which they were paying rates in the townships where the distress existed. In addition to all this the principal had contributed £500, and the junior partners £300. A statement like this, extracted from the books and properly endorsed, showed that the cotton trade had not been so desirable as some had imagined it to be. He had in his hand a list of cases, all of which he applied for, and which had the same tendency as the other. A. feeds his hands—800 in number—at a cost of £80 per week, or £1160 per annum. B. has from 1000 to 1100 hands, and gives in money and provisions £110 per week, and £24 weekly to a sewing class. This equals £6968 per year, and the schooling of forty-two boys is also paid for, and money is given to the support of many old superannuated hands. C. has expended for his workpeople, cash £1340; bread £220, coals £48, total £1608. D. has 2000 hands, and entirely employs his idle workpeople. E. has from 1800 to 2000 hands; gives a daily dinner to the whole; has taken their clothes out of pawn, has provided much fresh clothing, and has given in addition 1000 to the general fund. (Cheers.) F. gives, in addition to his subscription to the Central Relief Fund, £20 per week to the Provident and another Society, and furnishes coals and food to 700 hands. No cottage rents have been taken since the mill stopped; 330 children are sent to school at the expense of the employer, who pays for them 3d. per head per week. (Cheers.) G. gives £50 per month to the fund, and, in addition, pays wages equal to £230 per week to his own hands. H. pays to his hands £130 per week, in addition to large subscriptions to the general fund. I. (a small concern), with limited means, gives from £10 to £20 per week for clothing. J. have arranged to spend £10,000 among their workpeople as required, besides foregoing their rent. K. are spending £800 weekly in relieving the wants of their own workpeople. L. gave £500 to the general fund, and has given in cash in small sums to workers upwards of £1500, and has also given clothing. (Cheers.) There were also two cases as strong as any of those he had named, of which no particulars could be given, one of the persons concerned having given 405 sacks of flour within the last two months. This gentleman refused to give any information as to what he had given, and the fact just mentioned was only obtained through the dealer who supplied the flour. It was due to the great masses of the community that these facts should be known, and they were the best answers to the charges made against the Lancashire millowners.

The Saturday Review says that four-fifths of the charity on which the operatives now depend comes from Lancashire. If so, the charges made against the Lancashire men are utterly false; and it is not Lancashire, but the rest of England, that does less than its duty.

A curious case has recently come before the courts, in which Mr. Serjeant Glover, formerly proprietor of the now defunct Morning Chronicle, claims £14,000 from MM. Billault and De Persigny for work done as the organ of the French Government. The French Ministers resist the claim, and the evidence will have to go before a jury. It is obvious that whatever price Serjeant Glover may put on his work, he does not set a high value on his character.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—A pamphlet has just appeared which contains some curious letters written by the present Emperor, or his brother, at the time when the two were in arms with the Italian insurgents against the Papal Government. They prove that Louis Napoleon was then hostile to the temporal power of the Pope, and that is all.

GERMANY.—The King of Prussia has taken high ground towards Hesse, ordering the Elector to submit the Budget to the Chambers, and threatening him with "consequences" in case of refusal. Meantime His Majesty resists as haughtily as ever the demands of his own subjects for their constitutional rights, as will be seen by the language of the following extracts from the speeches he has made in reply to the addresses presented to him on behalf of the reactionary party:—

I shall continue to maintain the reorganization of the military force. I have been misrepresented in many quarters, and my words have been misunderstood. I have sworn to uphold the Constitution received from my brother, His late Majesty, and I shall conscientiously keep my oath in the sense expressed in my programme of November 1858. But it is also requisite to govern constitutionally, so as to promote the welfare of the country. The Sovereign alone can do this in Prussia. The representatives of the people should assist him by constitutional co-operation in legislation, and not further obstruct his Government.

ITALY.—The ball has been extracted from Garibaldi's wound. It may be hoped, therefore, that the General's recovery will henceforward proceed more rapidly.

The Chambers have met, and an angry impeachment of the Government is going on. Signor Buoncompagni led the attack, and has been followed by speakers from all sides. It is charged against the Ministry that they came into power by an intrigue, supplanting Ricasoli, who had the confidence of the majority; and endeavoured to sustain themselves in power by intriguing for the support of the Garibaldians. There is no denying the charge; no question that Aspromonte was the close of a long series of intrigues in Court and Camp and Chambers by which Ratazzi endeavoured to sustain himself in power by relying on the personal favour of the King (affronted by the stern morality of Ricasoli), on his popularity with ladies who were intimate at Court, and on the support which he bribed the Garibaldians to give him, so long as he pretended to countenance their designs. Buoncompagni asked:—

What were the means employed by Government to prevent the Garibaldi expedition, and to undeceive those who thought it met with the approbation of the Government? 2. Why did they not call Parliament together? 3. Why, again, was not Parliament summoned at the time that the state of siege was proclaimed, that it might sanction with its votes such measures as circumstances required? 4. What have the Ministers achieved for the internal organization of the kingdom? 5. How happens it that the Ministers find themselves further than ever from a solution of the Roman question?

The Garibaldian deputies illegally arrested in Sicily made strong complaints; and the temper of the Chamber has been shown by its decision that elections held during the state of siege were void. Great effect was produced by the publication of the following letter, dated December 25, 1859, and understood to refer to Ratazzi:—

I will not relate to you the history of my appointment as Italian representative to the Congress (of Zurich); all the intrigues, all the lowest arts were set at work to render it impossible. Dabormida and La Marmora, however, have no hand in these. It will be easy for you to guess who the authors of them were. If they did not carry their point, they succeeded in adding difficulty to my most arduous mission, by revealing the antipathies, the rancours, and base jealousies, with which certain persons honour me. . . . I accepted, nevertheless, because, had I refused, I should have had necessarily to proclaim an antagonism fatal to Italy; but, by accepting, I feel that I have made the greatest sacrifice a public man may make to his country, not only by consenting to bear cruel insults in silence, but also by accepting a mission from a Government which inspires me neither with esteem nor confidence.

C. CAVOUR.

An influential party in Italy is arrayed against Ratazzi; and if he succeed in retaining office, it will be because the King's personal aversion to Ricasoli makes it impossible for the Parliamentary majority to place in power the man of its choice.

GREECE.—In despite of the Treaty of 1832, which precludes the election to the throne of a Prince of the reigning Houses of England, France, or Russia, there seems great reason to expect that Prince Alfred will be chosen. The Greeks are inclined to such a choice, hoping to get Corfu and the other Ionian Islands; and the English Government do not appear to discourage it. France probably, and Russia certainly, would resent and protest against the Prince's elevation; and the surrender of the Ionian Islands, if we could suppose it possible, would approach to an act of high treason on the part of the Minister who should sanction it. Prince Alfred is heir to the safe and respectable Duchy of Coburg; he would be running a great risk relinquishing it for the insecure throne of the parvenu Greek kingdom.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, November 26.

Our last report left the market very dull and lifeless on the basis of 14d. for Fair Dhollerahs, and 21d. for Middling Orleans.

On Thursday the greatness of the decline attracted the attention of speculators, and a decided change in tone became visible as the day advanced; the sales reached 4000 bales, and Fair Dhollerahs closed at 14½d. On Friday the market was very strong with sales of 10,000 bales at 1½d. to 1d. advance. On Saturday the trade continued to buy largely; the sales reached again 10,000 bales at a further advance, Middling Orleans closing at 23d., and Fair Dhollerahs 15 to 15½. The market opened with a much more subdued tone on Monday morning; and a general desire was shown on the part of holders to meet the market at Saturday's prices, as fears were entertained that Manchester might not fully respond to our advance the following day; the sales resulted in 8000 bales at barely steady prices. The Manchester report on Tuesday, though satisfactory, was not of a nature to justify a further rise here, the business doing was only to a moderate extent at the full prices of the previous week but little or no advance could be obtained. Our market has accordingly become very quiet, and with a business to-day of 4000 bales; prices are again rather easier. Fair Dhollerahs may be quoted 15½d., Fair Omrawutties 15½d., Middling Bowdels 21d., and Middling Orleans 22d. to 22½d.

The principal item in the American news is the removal of McClellan from command of the grand army, and the appointment of Burnside in his place. This step on the part of the President, while its policy is questionable, betokens a resolve to brook no interference at the hands of the Democrats, and a determination to carry out those extreme measures of which McClellan disapproved. Rumours of mediation in American affairs by France alone, and of the approaching recognition of the South by at least one European Power, were revived a few days ago, the first, however, obtained no credence, and the latter is premature.

The late advance here was again too rapid, and spinners who were prepared to buy largely on the basis of 14d. for Fair Dhollerahs have been driven out of the market; production, however, is gradually increasing, and a healthier tone becoming apparent in Manchester; and it seems probable that these they have now seen the worst.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday Nov. 25.

Since Tuesday last our market has evinced some little degree of improvement both in yarn and cloth, especially in those qualities suitable for the home trade.

Many manufacturers who believe that prices have about reached the lowest point, and partly induced by the improved position of Liverpool market, have bought rather extensively of Nos. 32 to 50s twist and pineops at an advance in some cases of fully 1d. per lb. upon the prices of the week before; whilst for No. 60s twist cops, Bolton spinning, as much as 2d. per lb. advance has been paid.

Cloth is more inquired for, and where holders are inclined to accept last week's quotations, a considerable business can be done. Printers, T. cloths, long cloths, and shirtings are in moderate request, but there is little disposition to sell, except at improved prices.

To-day our market opened quiet, but towards afternoon there was a decided improvement in demand, and altogether there has been a moderate business done.

Home trade yarns were decidedly better, and some contracts were placed at 1d. per lb. advance upon the prices of this day week. Some little business has also been transacted in bundles for the Levant. 8½ lbs. India shirtings have been sold at an advance of from 3d. to 6d. per piece. 36 inch printers are 6d. per piece dearer than they were on Thursday last. Home trade shirtings for dyeing purposes are dearer and in better request, with a prospect of a good demand setting in before long.

TOBACCO MARKET.

LONDON, November 26.

The transactions of late have been only to a moderate extent, but the business embraced considerable parcels, establishing the values on the standard of late quotations. Eight-pence has been paid for Western strips in large lots, prepared in Owensboro'; other sorts at a fraction lower. In leaf, few transactions have taken place in the finer or fancy sorts; but several lots of Missouri growth have found purchasers at from 9d. to 11½d.

In Virginia descriptions scarcely anything doing.

For Maryland there is only a retail demand for the lower grades.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

CAPTAIN W. D. BROWN, Commander of the Chesapeake Artillery, with General Lee's army, has been appointed Acting Chief of Artillery, in General Ewell's division, vice Major J. Snowden Andrews, wounded. The Chesapeake battery was recruited in Richmond from refugee Marylanders, and was for some time stationed at battery No. 3, on the James.

The battery has participated in every battle in Maryland and on the Potomac, losing a number in killed and wounded, and every horse in the battery. The latter have, however, been replaced.

The Montgomery Alabama Advertiser, has a dispatch from Atlanta, dated October 8th, which says:—"A letter was received here this morning from John For-yth, dated Bardstown, Kentucky, 27th ult., which says that he and several others were taken prisoners by a scouting party of Yankees, and sent to General Buell at Cave City, but was subsequently released on parole.

The Charleston Courier says we have before us the "Report of W. H. Gist, Chief of the Department of Construction and Manufacture to Governor Pickens," and we append a few facts and statements derived from it.

This department was established by the Executive Council, on March 24, 1862, with a view to erecting a foundry, armory, and military workshops for the State.

The services of Mr. Campbell, of the Tredegar Shops, of Richmond, were engaged to select site and material. David Lopez, a well known carpenter of this city, was appointed Superintendent of State Work. The pig-iron from the King's Mountain mine was examined, tested and approved as peculiarly fit for ordnance use.

Greenville Court House was selected as the site for the State Works, in consideration (with other reasons), of the fact that V. McBee, Esq., offered the use of twenty acres of land.

Machinery was purchased in Charleston and other places, when supposed to be in danger of attack or invasion. A large purchase was made, on very favourable terms, from the State of Tennessee.

South Carolina has sent to Virginia 11,260 stands of arms, and to other points of service 9,000 stands.

The foundry works will be in full operation by the 1st of October.

Among the items of expenditure, charged to this department, we find the following:—

Cotton cards, for soldiers' families, $3,780; cost of removing bells from Charleston, $1,704; spikes for gunboats, $982; cash for bacon not needed at the works, $5,000. The total amount expended is $95,212.02.

The following is a statement of value of work done and comprised in report of General Superintendent of State Works:—

Altering to percussion, repairing and cleaning 1620 muskets at $8 per musket	$12,960
Repairing and cleaning 239 rifles, carbines, and double-barrel guns, and 874 bayonets	817
Building six caissons and limbers complete	3,600
Building one battery wagon]	750
1000 pikes	3,000
Spikes for gunboat, for Captain Ingraham	1,766

NEW YORK, November 11.

One of the greatest humiliation that the United States Government has yet been subjected to, is the necessity of pledging thirteen millions of Treasury notes bearing an annual interest of 7 30-100ths per cent. for a fifteen days' loan of twelve millions of dollars from the bankers, who only pay in their own non-interest bearing notes. This shows that the credit of the Treasury Department has reached a very low ebb, that Mr. Chase has exhausted his limit of "green backs," and is thus obliged to borrow from moneyed institutions that cannot pay their own debts, in order to meet the pressing demands for small amounts upon the navy and war bureaux, for it is well established that no large sums have been settled for, except in "certificates of indebtedness" at twelve months' date. Mr. Chase has, by his boldness, carried a heavy load of debt up to the present time, and so kept in motion the machinery of the Government, although the temporary assistance from the banks is a relief for a few days, it remains to be seen whether Wall-street will grant further aid. It must be remembered that the Bank Presidents, who have had control of financial affairs, are considered in this community as being only first class clerks, and they by no means represent the voice of the people, as recently expressed at the ballot-box.

The immediate future is full of interest, financially as well as politically.

PARIS, November 25.

The relations between England and France are getting worse and worse. The last feather which is likely to break the back is the candidature of Prince Alfred to the throne of Greece, which, if really persevered in, must bring about very serious complications, and may even lead to war.

Immediately on the Greek throne becoming vacant, it was reported that the French and Russian Governments intended to put up the Duke de Leuchtenberg as a candidate. The Duke being connected with both the French and Russian Imperial families. On this, the English Government is understood to have put forward Prince Alfred with the object, it was believed at first, of merely compelling the other powers to abandon this Russo-French candidate. The Greeks, however, were not slow to perceive their advantage, and the prospect of having a son of the Queen of England for their king, drove them wild with enthusiasm, and there is no doubt whatever of the election of His Royal Highness. Thus what the English Government originally intended as a simple demonstration, has become a reality, and the attitude of France and Russia, and the enthusiasm of the Greeks will make the non-acceptance of the Prince appear as a disgraceful recalade, prompted not by policy, but under foreign pressure. Hence the rumours of war which are so prevalent, and to which the articles of the semi-official France, and of the equally semi-official Globe and Morning Post, have not a little contributed.

It has been judiciously observed that in this matter England and France appear to have completely changed sides—England now going for the "will of the people" as paramount over every other consideration, and France having been smitten with a sudden attachment for the inviolability of treaties. The truth of the affair is, that for some time past, the two Governments have been gradually approximating to that point when the slightest pretext is sufficient for a quarrel. The present issue is far more than a mere pretext, involving as it does supremacy in the East and in the Mediterranean. But notwithstanding its serious aspect, it is to be hoped that a rupture will be avoided, which would be fatal to the interests of the two countries, which have now so many interests in common. The French Government is, it is said, determined to proceed with its humane endeavour to put an end to the carnage in America, and a hope is entertained that the victory of the democrats in the recent elections in the Federal States will materially contribute to the success of the overtures which M. Mercier is instructed to make.

During the past week the propriety of intervention has been the subject of an animated controversy between the Debats and the Revue des Deux Mondes, on the one hand, and the Constitutionnel, and other Government journals, on the other. The Debats and Revue charged the Government with gross partiality to the South, and ascribed to the least disinterested motives the desire of the Government to interfere in the affairs of America, the whole being supported by a running accompaniment of praise of the system of non-intervention. An able letter, refuting these attacks, has appeared in the Constitutionnel. As it fully sets forth the nature of the polémique, I subjoin its salient points:—

Of all the considerations of a nature to throw light on the impartiality, the opportuneness, and the prudence of the proposition addressed by the Emperor's Government to the English and Russian Cabinets, with a view of pacifying the United States, the reasons imagined by the Debats and the Revue des Deux Mondes, in condemnation of that step, and in denial of that prudence, that opportuneness, and that impartiality, appear to me the most convincing; and if the despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys required to be explained and defended, it could not be more clearly and more effectually done than by those very attacks.

I am now about to take those attacks into consideration one after the other, and your readers shall decide whether advocates were ever more completely mistaken. The principal complaint brought forward by the Revue against the proposition of the French Government is, of not having offered to the two parties engaged in the sanguinary struggle "the rough sketch of a peace which might make them fall into each other's arms?" "Have you," it asks, "yourself conceived a plan of peace which you could submit and recommend to them?" "Some plan of pacification," it continues, "is necessary, and without that you are neither reasonable, just, nor impartial." Certainly not; the French Government has not proposed to the belligerents any plan or any basis of pacification; and it would take good care not to do so in order to remain impartial, just and reasonable, towards both parties. How do we stand towards the United States? As friends of the first and last hour, and as old, constant, and sincere allies. The quarrel which has separated the North and the South has not changed our sentiments; we are pained at all the dangers and the sufferings of that energetic and noble country, and we make no distinction either in the blood spilt or in the tears shed. It would be to show partiality if we were to lean to one side rather than to the other; for it would be impossible, without taking part, at least morally, in the quarrel, to indicate before hand the points on which the refusal of one ought to be given and the pretensions of the other rejected. Such a conduct would not be impartial and reasonable, but absurd and uncivil; it would be making ourselves judges even before being arbitrators. What is the part which belongs to us legitimately and incontestably as friends and allies, and as a great power in this fratricidal struggle? It is to suggest, as soon as possible, in the name of the common feelings of pity, humanity, morality, and religion, propositions for an armistice, which would, were it only for a time, prevent further bloodshed. To seek to put an end to massacres, conflagrations, and ruin, and to alleviate the sufferings of America and of Europe, is what belongs to us. All the rest—that is to say, the bases of pacification, the relations for the future restoration of the Union, or final separation—all that belongs to the parties themselves at least, until they themselves place the decision into other hands.

The writer then diverges into the question of slavery, repudiates on the part of France the most distant intention of upholding it. He proceeds to demonstrate that slavery would by no means be affected by the step proposed by France, and then proceeds:—

Yes, the French Government is really neutral in the American question, but there are people who are not so, and they are those who, like the writers in the Debats and Revue des Deux Mondes, have taken a part in America, and have become belligerents. They may be said to be there enrolled under the banner of their Princes, but with principles and sentiments which their chiefs certainly would not accept. When it was known in France that two young Princes had gone to America to there learn the noble science of war or perhaps something more, the impression produced was not an unfavourable one. They were young, unemployed, and the excitement attracted them.

But if they interfered in the struggle of the Americans it was certainly with the deep conviction that France was neutral in it. If in drawing their sword for the North they could have supposed that the French Government was for the South, that sword would have been returned to its scabbard. Thus, therefore, they declared for one party because the preference of France was exclusively for neither. The journals I alluded to are not so prudent. They accuse the French Government of having, by the steps it has taken, betrayed visible preference for the South without thinking that by thus speaking they calumniate their country, or those young Princes. In fact, one of two things: either they believe, or they do not believe in the partiality of the French Government in favour of the South. If the former, they accuse the Princes of having carried arms against a cause adopted by their country; if the latter, they knowingly accuse the Government of their country with a duplicity which would be dishonest, if it were not imaginary. So much for the accusation of partiality shown from the fact that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has not proposed a plan of pacification to the United States; and we will now come to that of partiality, founded on his having proposed an armistice. To propose an armistice of six months, exclaims the Debats, is to call on the North to give up for ever, to tie up its right arm, to deliver up its arms, and to commit suicide. A year ago, with the armaments of the North, its suddenly-raised fleets, its armies of 700,000 men, its budget of two millions, those words might have had some sense in them; at the present time they have none. The North, you say, is called on to give up what advantage she has gained; but what does she hold in any decisive manner? Nothing. She has not been able to gain possession of the enemy's capital, and her own is not completely in safety. She is master of the houses and streets of New Orleans, but the women there brave the invader.

The North has used immense armies, and expended sums which the imagination can with difficulty comprehend; it blockades the ports of its enemy, but it has lost more battles than it has gained, and it is both materially and morally less advanced than it was on the first day. M. Drouyn de Lhuys was able to say with all sincerity what all Europe sees, that the position appears for the moment to be without issue; that there is between the belligerents an equality of forces; that, after so much blood has been shed, the situation has not sensibly changed; that there is nothing to authorize the expectation of soon seeing more decisive military operations, or any advantages sufficiently important to make the scales lean to either one side or the other, or to accelerate the conclusion of a peace. This state of things is indisputable, and it is also the most propitious for bringing about a pacification such as all the friends of the United States must desire. In the situation in which things now are, reason might also dictate conditions of peace. At a later moment, when time and events shall have destroyed that equilibrium, it is force which will impose them. At the present time, the solution may therefore be discussed; later it can only be submitted to. Now, the friends of the United States may make an appeal to the general interest of the Republic, to the old feelings of fraternity, and to the glory achieved under the same flag; and although much useless brutality, many inconsiderate threats and regrettable excesses may have excited hatred, it may not be impossible to re-establish honourably for all parties a Union which had raised so high the name, the riches and the power of the common country. Under any circumstances, if separation were considered inevitable, the ulterior relations of the two Republics might, under the influence of an opportune conciliation, preserve the character of esteem and kindness, which is always for smoothing down international difficulties. Lose the advantages of the present time and of the present situation of affairs; and allow the stream of blood which now separates the combatants, to become wider and deeper, and you will have nothing more in perspective than a Union rendered impossible from fury, or a separation rendered perilous by vengeance."

The stories of plots, &c., continue more rife than ever. The last invention is that a great many arrests have taken place among the police themselves. The Constitutionnel has emphatically contradicted all these canards, for which I have every reason to believe there is no foundation but the clumsiness of the authorities, who led all the world to suppose that there had been some mysterious cause for the adjournment at the opening of the new Boulevard.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

THE SENATE, Oct. 4th.

The following resolution proposed by Mr. Leno, of Georgia, was adopted and referred to committee:—

"That it be referred to the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the extent of the legal right which the military authorities have in putting restrictions upon the facilities of the citizens of the Confederate States in travelling from one section of country to another; and how far they have the legal right to pass military orders restricting and prohibiting the transportation of the property of citizens upon railroads, canals, or other mode of transportation; and to report by bill or otherwise."

TO ENCOURAGE MANUFACTURES.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it pass, the House Bill authorizing the President to import, duty free, machinery to be used in the manufacture of clothing and shoes for the army. The bill was passed, and sent to the House.

BOUNTIES TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. Sparrow, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the House Bill providing "for securing their bounty to all soldiers and non-commissioned officers who have entered the army for three years or the war, whether they shall die or be killed in battle or not." Adopted.

THE PRIVILEGE OF VOLUNTEERING.

Mr. Sparrow, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it should not pass the House Bill providing that men between the ages of 35 and 45 years subject to military duty, may volunteer and join such companies from their State they may select.

Mr. Hill, of Georgia, was surprised the committee had reported adversely to this bill. It was not fair to new conscripts to refuse to allow them to select their regiments. The privilege had been extended to others. To extend it to men now conscripted would save the government the expense of retaining officers and soldiers at home to hunt up conscripts. If this bill did not pass, you would have the office of the Secretary of War crowded with soldiers seeking transfers. The bill only proposed to give to conscripts between the ages of 35 and 45, the privileges which had been extended to those between 18 and 35. Make it a condition, if you choose, that they should volunteer before enrolment. He was receiving letters every day asking whether men between 35 and 45 will be allowed to volunteer into any regiments they may select, and asserting that if so, the writers would instantly volunteer without waiting for the enrolling officer.

Mr. Yancey favoured the bill. He thought it would prevent discontent. The allowing men to choose their own companies would certainly tend to make them contented. It was certainly desirable to have an army of contented rather than discontented men. There was some feeling in the country tending to draw a distinction between volunteers and conscripts, to the disparagement of the latter. It was desirable to get rid of this feeling. He was not one of those who believed the men who had not volunteered, had failed to do so from want of patriotism. The country had never at any time been able to equip all of the men who had been enlisted. Owing to this circumstance, it was not surprising that many men, not wanting in spirit, had not enlisted. If the country had proclaimed its ability and readiness to equip five hundred thousand volunteers, he believed the volunteers would immediately have been forthcoming. There will be men enough to fill the regiment, both old and new. If this bill pass, it will do much to do away with the distinctions between new and old regiments, and between volunteers and conscripts.

Mr. Haynes, of Tennessee, was as much in favour of conscription as any man, but at the same time he favoured this bill. The question was whether men were to be allowed voluntarily to enter the army or to be taken by the nape of the neck and thrust into it. He approved of the former expedient.

Mr. Wiggfall, of Texas, said he was in favour of having a Confederate army in the field, and keeping it full, regardless of what State the troops shall be drawn from. As to the policy of keeping these troops on the one side or the other, it was just what our enemies would advise. But if I was the commander-in-chief, I would order General Holmes as quickly as the lightning could flash the words, to bring every soldier to the east side of the Mississippi and reinforce Bragg, and enable him, by an overwhelming force, to crush Buell. Buell annihilated, the whole West would be freed. If I had had the power last summer I would have concentrated the whole Confederate force in Virginia, have crushed McClellan, and have gone into the enemy's country and taught him on his own soil what war really was. This was his policy, and he only regretted that he had been induced to say so much.

Mr. Johnson would only say he was very thankful the gentleman was not the commander-in-chief. He was much misunderstood if it was thought he desired the troops of the Confederacy to be divided out into thirteen armies. He only desired that when the trans-Mississippi district was actually invaded, all its troops should not be withdrawn. He requested that the bill be permitted to lie over. Rejected.

On motion of Mr. Johnson the bill was laid on the table.

THE TAX BILL

On the motion of Mr. Preston of Virginia, the adjournment of Congress was postponed in consequence of the Tax Bill being under consideration in the House of Representatives. Mr. Preston said there was a measure now under consideration in the other House, to which in importance, all that Congress had done, was as nothing. He alluded to the Tax Bill, by which it was proposed to raise seventy-five or a hundred millions of dollars for the prosecution of the war. It was either a forced loan, or it was such a taxation as this country never heard of. He had almost as leave see General Lee defeated as that Congress should adjourn without disposing of this Bill, and by some means providing for the prosecution of the war. While General Lee was the arm and the sword of the army, this Bill for providing the sinews of war.

Oct. 8th.

THE CONFEDERATE CENSUS.

Mr. Yancey introduced the following, which was agreed to:—
Resolved, That the Committee of the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill provided for the enumeration of the white inhabitants, free coloured people, and slaves of the several States; and that they report at the next session of Congress.

THE MILITARY AUTHORITY.

After an animated discussion, the following resolutions were passed:—

1st Resolved, by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, That no officer of the Confederate Government is by law empowered to vest Provost Marshals with any authority whatever over citizens of the Confederate States, not belonging to the land or naval forces thereof, or with general police powers and duties for the preservation of the peace and good order of any city, town, or municipal district in any State in this Confederacy, and any such exercise of authority is illegal and void.

2nd Resolved, That no officer of the Confederate Government has constitutional or other lawful authority to limit or restrict, or in any manner to control the exercise of the jurisdiction of the civil judicial tribunals of the States of this Confederacy, vested in them by the constitutions and laws of the States respectively, and all orders of any such officers tending to restrict or control or interfere with the full and normal exercise of the jurisdiction of such civil judicial tribunals are illegal and void.

3rd Resolved, That the military law of the Confederate States is, by the Court and the enactments of Congress, limited to the land and naval forces and the militia when in actual service, and to such other persons as are within the lines of any army, navy, corps, division, or brigade of the army of the Confederate States.

October 9th.

PURCHASE AND IMPRESSMENT OF COTTON BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Finance, said the committee had had under consideration the bill submitted by Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, providing for the purchase or impressment by the Government of a million bales of cotton, and to issue in payment therefor Confederate bonds, &c., and had determined to report by amendment. The Government was already, by existing law, authorised to purchase cotton. The bill authorised it to impress cotton. To this provision the committee were opposed. Mr. Semmes then read the amendment reported by the committee.

After some discussion Mr. Semmes arose to explain the reasons which had influenced the committee in making their report. He read the existing law which authorises the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase thirty-five million dollars worth of cotton, and said that under that law the Secretary had purchased not more than ten thousand bales, owing to there being no demand for cotton in consequence of the blockade.

Mr. Yancey said he thought this subject should be considered in secret session, and he therefore moved the bill be transferred to the secret calendar.—Agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Oct. 4th.

FILLING UP EXISTING REGIMENTS AND BATTALIONS.

After the doors were reopened, Mr. Swan, of Tennessee, from the Military Committee, reported back a Senate bill to authorise the President to accept and place in the service certain regiments and battalions heretofore raised, with amendments. The bill is as follows:—

"The Congress of the Confederate States do enact, that the President be, and he is hereby authorised and empowered, whenever, in his opinion, the public good would be promoted thereby, to receive into the service regiments or battalions which have been raised in good faith under authority or by the direction of the Secretary of War, or any general officer of the government, although the said regiments or battalions may be composed in part of persons between the ages of 18 and 35 years. Provided that this authority shall not extend to military organizations raised after this time, except in those States and locations where the conscript law may be suspended.

"Sec. 2. That the President be and he is hereby authorized and empowered, whenever, in his opinion, it would promote the public good, to receive into service regiments or battalions which have been heretofore organized, of conscripts, by a general officer, in any of the States lying west of the Mississippi."

October 8.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. Garnett moved the following as an amendment to a previous resolution proposed by Mr. Perkins:—

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report next session a bill for the purpose of raising a sufficient sum to meet the accruing interest upon the whole interest-bearing debt of this Government, heretofore created, and such as may be contracted hereafter previous to the 1st day of January, 1863; and that the committee be further instructed now to bring in a bill providing that all Treasury notes, not bearing interest, issued on and after the 1st day of December next, shall be made fundable in Confederate States stock, bearing six per cent. interest per annum.

Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, introduced the following resolution as an amendment to the amendment:—

"And that it shall be the duty of said committee to inquire into the expediency of making the notes and bonds of the Treasury a legal tender in payment of all debts due either to the Government or to individuals, as part of a judicious and comprehensive system of finance, and with a view to the maintenance of the public credit."

Mr. Garnett said that he did not view the vote of Monday as an indication that the House was determined to impose no tax for the support of Government. He was for bringing in a tax bill of some kind, and his amendment, he thought, precisely met the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. It instructs the committee to provide next session for the payment of the war tax, and provides an absorbent meanwhile, for the redundant circulation.

Mr. Russell, of Virginia, moved that the whole subject be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The motion was agreed to—ayes 22, noes 19—and the resolutions were referred.

THE WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the special order, to wit: The bill reported from the Judiciary Committee to authorise the President to suspend the Writ of Habeas Corpus in certain cases.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, took the ground that there was no power in Congress to declare martial law, but it had the power to authorise the President to suspend the Writ of Habeas Corpus. Martial law, in his judgment, was what General Van Dorn had defined it to be in Mississippi—the will of the officer who declares it; but he believed that whoever declared it, did so unconstitutionally.

Mr. Dargan, of Alabama, said there was nothing in the constitution relative to martial law, nor any power in Congress to declare it. The nearest approach to it, if any at all, was the power vested in Congress to suspend the Writ of Habeas Corpus in times of invasion, insurrection, or rebellion.

Mr. Baldwin, of Virginia, rose to offer the following amendment to the bill reported from the Committee:—

1. It shall be a sufficient answer to the Writ of Habeas Corpus in any case that the party in whose behalf it is granted is held in custody upon the warrant of the President of the Confederate States for reasons and upon evidence filed in writing in the Department of State.

2. It shall be the duty of the President to report to Congress as soon as practicable every case of arrest and confinement upon his warrant as aforesaid, with the cause of such arrest and confinement; and he shall, when required by either House of Congress, transmit the written reasons and evidence filed as aforesaid.

Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, offered the following amendment to the original bill:—

"Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to justify the President or those appointed by him, in setting aside or disregarding the provisions of the Constitution of the Confederate States, or the Constitution of any of said States, or the laws made in conformity therewith, except so far as the same may revert necessarily from the suspension of the Writ of Habeas Corpus; and, in no case, is the ordinary action of the courts, either of the Confederacy or of the States respectively, to be set aside, superseded, or defeated, except so far as may necessarily result from the suspension of the writ aforesaid."

After a brief discussion the debate was adjourned. The following is a copy of the bill as reported by the committee:—

The Congress of the Confederate States do enact—

That during the present invasion of the Confederate States, the President shall have power to suspend the privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus in any city, town, or military district, whenever in his judgment it shall be required by the public interest; but such suspension shall apply only to arrests made by the authorities of the Confederate Government, or for offences against the same.

2. The President shall cause proper officers to investigate the cases of all persons so arrested, in order that they may be discharged if improperly detained, unless they can be speedily tried in due course of law.

3. This act shall continue in force for thirty days after the next meeting of Congress and no longer.

Oct. 9.

DELEGATE FROM THE CHEROKEE NATION.

Mr. Elliott, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the question of the right of Elias C. Boudinot to a seat in the House as Delegate from the Cherokee Nation, reported that after a full examination of the subject, the committee was of opinion that the said Boudinot had been duly elected, and was entitled, under the treaty to a seat, to propose and introduce measures for the benefit of the said nation, and to be heard in regard to the same and on questions in which the said nation may be interested.

The report of the committee was agreed to, and Mr. Boudinot came forward and took the oath to support the Constitution of the Confederate States.

A bill was also reported from the committee, fixing the pay and mileage of the delegates from the several Indian nations authorized to have delegates under their respective treaties, at the same rate allowed to members of the House of Representatives. Passed.

INTEREST ON THE FUNDED DEBT.

Mr. Kenner, from the same committee, reported a bill to reduce the rate of interest on the funded debt of the Confederate States, as follows:—

"The Congress of the Confederate States do enact, that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to reduce the rate of interest on all bonds and certificates of stock to be issued after the first day of December next, to a rate per annum not exceeding six per cent., payable semi-annually; and all Treasury Notes issued after the said first day of December, shall be fundable only in the said bonds or stocks issued at such reduced rate. Provided, however, that the reduction shall not include any bonds or stock which are required to meet any contracts made before the rate aforesaid, or any Treasury Notes which shall then have been issued."

"2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority, by public notice, duly advertised, to require the holders of treasury notes to come in and fund the same in eight per cent. bonds or stock within four months after the date of such notice; and all notes which shall not be presented for funding within the said time, shall thereafter be entitled to be funded only in the bonds or stock which shall thereafter be issued under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent."

The bill being taken up, Mr. Garnett, of Virginia, moved to amend by striking out all after the enacting clauses in the 1st Section, down to the proviso, and inserting as follows:—

"All treasury notes issued after the first day of December next, shall be made fundable only in bonds bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, but in all other respects similar to the bonds bearing eight per cent. interest."

Mr. Kenan suggested that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Garnett) would accomplish his idea quite as well by moving to strike out the second section of the bill.

The question was first taken upon Mr. Gray's amendment, and it was agreed to, and the House refused to strike out the second section.

THE WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. Hartridge addressed the House in explanation of his substitute. He thought it would remove the objections to the main bill, the chief of which was the delegation to the President of a power alone conferred upon Congress. It confided no discretion in the President, but provided for a suspension of the writ by Congress in certain cases and for certain specified crimes.

Mr. Hartridge then offered his amendment as a substitute for Mr. Baldwin's. It reads as follows:—

"The Congress of the Confederate States do enact that in all cases, where any person or persons, charged on oath with treason, misprison of treason, or other crime or misdemeanour against the Confederate States, and endangering the safety thereof, shall be arrested or imprisoned by virtue of any warrant or authority from the President of the Confederate States, or from any person acting under the direction or authority of the President of the Confederate States, the privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall be and the same is hereby suspended, from and after the passage of this act, until after the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of this Congress."

The original bill was then ordered to its engrossment, was read a third time and passed.

We append a copy of this bill as passed:—

"The Congress of the Confederate States do enact, That during the present invasion of the Confederate States, the President shall have power to suspend the privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus in any city, town, or military district wherever in his judgment the public safety may require it; but this suspension shall apply only to arrests made by the authorities of the Confederate Government, and offences against the same.

"2. The President shall require a proper officer to investigate the cases of all persons so arrested, in order that they may be discharged if improperly detained, unless they can be speedily tried in due course of law.

"3. This act shall continue in force thirty days after the next meeting of Congress and no longer."

ARMY PROMOTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. Miles, under instructions of the Committee, reported an additional section, as follows:—

"Be it further enacted, That whenever any officer of a company, battalion, squadron or regiment, shall have been dropped or honourably retired, in accordance with the provisions of this act, then the officer next in rank shall be promoted to the vacancy, if competent; and if not competent, then the next officer in rank shall be promoted; and so on until all the commissioned officers of the company, battalion, squadron or regiment, shall have been gone through with; and if there be no officer of the company, battalion, squadron or regiment competent to fill the vacancy, then the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, fill the same by appointment—Provided, that the officer appointed shall be from the same State as that to which the company, battalion, squadron or regiment belongs. And provided, further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting the power heretofore conferred upon the President, by existing laws, to fill any vacancy by the promotion of officers, or the appointment of privates distinguished in the service by the exhibition of extraordinary valour and skill."

Mr. Gartrell, of Georgia, moved to amend by adding to the second section of the bill—"Provided, such officer shall be entitled to be heard and to call witnesses in his defence."

The following amendment to the independent section was offered by Mr. Smith, of North Carolina, and agreed to.

"And provided, further, That vacancies arising under the operations of this act, in regiments or battalions, which were organized under the laws of a State, for the war, or a period not yet expired, shall be filled as in case of death or resignation."

NORTH AND SOUTH.

LETTER FROM COMMANDER MAURY TO ADMIRAL FITZ ROY.
(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

RICHMOND, Va., Aug. 4, 1862.

Dear Fitz Roy,—It has been about a year since I last wrote you. Since that time the war has passed through several phases and Lincoln has tried it on as many new tacks. At first, you recollect, he only intended to "repossess and occupy" the public places in the South; and to enable him to do this, an army of 667,000 men was called out for three months. The battle of Manassas satisfied him that it wouldn't do. Then he called for more men, and proceeded to raise an army of 667,000 for three years, or the war. In the meantime we stood stock-still in our encampments—perhaps unwisely—until he marshalled his host, trained it to his liking, and moved with it upon us. But where are the men now that composed that army? Let his new call for 300,000 more troops, and the continual cry from his side that, in every fight we outnumbered him, answer. We have never claimed to have over 400,000 men under arms at one time. His object now is no longer to "repossess" the Custom Houses and "occupy" the public places of the South, but to subjugate and exterminate a whole people. The war he is now waging is, he would fain have the world to believe, waged in the cause of human freedom. The crimes that the Yankees are committing under this cry, call to mind Madame Roland's apostrophe to the statue of Liberty, when she was on her way to the scaffold—the time "France got drunk with blood." The Yankees are fighting for self-government, they say. They are doing battle for the freedom of man, for a free press free speech, free worship, and the right of self-government—such are their words; now for their acts: They have suspended the writ of Habeas Corpus, and have been, for more than a year, issuing lettres de cachet.—They drag preachers from their pulpits and haul them to prison because they will not preach for Yankee rule. They have muzzled the press, abridged the freedom of speech, turned Legislatures out of doors, imprisoned members, stepped between man and his maker, forbidden Christians to pray from their hearts and forced them into lip service.

Since I saw you, some eighteen months ago, you, on your side of the water, have made considerable progress in your studies of us as a people, of your cause, the Yankee character. As your knowledge of us and of them has increased, you have thought better of the South, and worse of the North. Excelsior, go on; you have much to learn yet.

I recollect when, in the Fall of 1860, I was explaining to a circle of friends in England the cause of all our then impending troubles, I told one of your statesmen that "all the right was on our side." He laughed. If I am not mistaken, he now begins to perceive that we of the South are in the category of the children of Israel, seeking to escape from bondage with this our Pharaoh, the "rail-splitter."—He has got to let us go, that's as certain as though another Moses and Aaron had told him so.

His people pretend, and many Englishmen seem to think, that African slavery is at the bottom of all our present troubles. No such thing! The causes of them are deep-seated and ramified. The Union was formed with slavery in it—Slavery served as a landmark in dividing the country into sections; but it had about as much to do with the origin of our troubles as "Tenterden Steeple had with the Goodwin Sands." Slavery happened to mark a geographical line, which separated the Northern from the Southern States. But Kentucky, a slave State, has never been with us; neither have Delaware, Maryland, and Missouri come out for us. These are slave States, and whatever be the feeling of the great body of their people, their so-called Governors have all furnished Lincoln each with his contingent for this war upon us.

The old Government of the United States had become utterly corrupt, and it had corrupted the people, and with or without slavery, the dissolution of that Government was bound to occur. Look at its history and the facts.

For more than thirty years, the country has been ruled by a faction—first of one party, then of another—and the master spirits of the faction ruled, and there was a lack of statesmanship in the national councils. Presidents and their Cabinets, lawgivers and the officers of the Government ceased long ago to be selected for their fitness, but solely for their party availability. Thus the great men of the country—Calhoun, Webster, Clay, &c.—were proscribed, and the populace came down below mediocrity in search of rulers. Thus, in the last presidential canvass, the successful candidate was the man that could split the most rails in a day, a man unknown to the people, and without any, the least experience in the affairs of State. It has not been many years since a man was chosen President because it was said he trafficked in coon skins, lived in a log-cabin, and drunk hard cider; any one versed in American politics will tell you that every president, from Van Buren down, has been elected, not because of their fitness, but because he was the most available man that the successful party could forward.

What was the effect of putting such men in this high office? Naturally enough it was to convert the Government into a party machine, and to place its honours and its patronage at the disposal of the "King Makers."

Finally, it became so that party fealty was almost the only test of fitness for any office, from that of tidewater, up. And when an Administration was turned out at the end of four years, as it was sure to be, the successful party raised the cry that "to the victors belong the spoils," and went into the Government like a victorious army into the encampment of a vanquished foe. The whole energies of the Government then were directed to secure the succession to the party in power at the end of the four years.

Besides the patronage connected with places of mere honour and power, each Administration had all the patronage connected with the disbursement, during the Presidential term, of three or four hundred millions of dollars; and for this there was a scramble among the politicians. They inflamed the public mind upon the subject of the Presidential election, and once in every four years the Government was overturned. All who were charged with the administration of the offices had to retire and give place to a new and inexperienced set of hungry and greedy politicians.

In this way, the Government ceased to be managed for the good of the people. It became the instrument of party for the reward of partisans; consequently its checks and balances became first deranged; high sectional interests were involved.

Prominent among these were those of free trade on one hand, protection on the other. As a rule, the agricultural States, which happened also to be Slave States, were for free trade; the manufacturing and mining States, which happened to be free States, were clamorous for protection, as the Morrill Tariff abundantly shows.

Now for statistics to assist me in making these points clear.

The South contained, roundly stated, about one-third of the population of the United States. About three-fourths of the exports of the whole country were furnished by the South. The industry of the South was, you may therefore infer, eminently profitable; and it is evident that the bounties required to make profitable the unremunerative labour of the North must be paid chiefly by the South.

The manner of exacting this tribute to the North was forcibly illustrated in the Senate, some thirty years ago, by Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, in what is known as his "Forty Bale Theory." It was proposed to give the cotton spinning of New England a protection of 40 per cent. Whereupon that Senator put this case:—

A certain cotton planter of South Carolina, who grows one hundred bales of cotton, fancies to export them to Liverpool on his own account, and to exchange them there for one hundred bales of manufactured goods. With these he returns to Charleston, where he meets the New England manufacturer, who bought one hundred bales of cotton in South Carolina at the same time; but instead of carrying them to Liverpool, shipped them to Massachusetts, manufactured them there, and returned with them, also, to Charleston.—Here, now, is a hundred bales of merchandize which represents the industrial skill and energy of two sections. The next morning the two importers appear at the Custom House. The manufacturer is told that, because he brings his bales from New England, he may pass his whole one hundred bales through duty free; but the planter is told that, because he brought his from Old England, he must leave forty in the Custom House to pay for the privilege of getting the sixty through.

And thus, from that day to this, and long before, the South has been paying, under the forms of tariffs and protection, annual tribute to the North.

Some fifteen years ago, the Secretary of the Treasury put forth an Official Statement, showing that the indirect taxes to which the country was then subjected, in consequence of this protection of Northern sectional industry, amounted annually to not less than $80,000,000.

Your Parliament, if I rightly remember, reprinted that document.

This was tribute money; for though the South was taxed for the larger portion of it, not a cent of it went into the coffers of the common treasury. It all went into the pockets of the Northern manufacturer as a bounty to enable him to undersell in Southern markets his English and French competitors.

Twenty years ago, when Congress had the tariff under revision, every trade sent from the North its deputation to Washington to explain the state of its yield, and the degree of protection required. Among others the shoemakers of New England appeared with a statement of this sort. The French and Germans are sending their shoes to the South and selling there at sixty-five cents the pair. As honest men, we assure you we cannot afford to make such shoes and sell them there for less than one hundred cents the pair. Therefore, protect us; in other words, put such a tariff on French and German made shoes as will make it cheaper for those Southern nabobs to buy of us. Congress did so. The consequence was that the French and German shoes ceased to come, and the Southern man, instead of paying sixty-five cents to the Frenchman for a pair of shoes, besides the duty to the Government, paid a dollar to the Yankee, and no duty. In the same way the iron men, the sailmakers, the cotton and woollen spinners, et al., called for protection against their English, Swedish, and Russian competitors. Thus the South paid duties upon all articles that the tariff kept out of the country; but these duties, instead of going into the Treasury as revenue, went into the purse of manufacturers as bounty. After paying this tribute money to the North, the South had then to pay her quota for the support of the Government. The Morrill tariff, had the South submitted to it, would have exacted from her something like $100,000,000 as an annual tribute to the North.

The South has been remonstrating with the North and protesting against this thing with more or less earnestness for upwards of thirty years; and thirty years ago the Union was brought to the brink of dissolution by one of these tariff bills. But for the first time the factions of the North in 1860 formally declared their hostility to the South. This they did in the Chicago platform—that is, the supporters of Lincoln took in that instrument, without regard to the Constitution, broad grounds of hostility to the South. He pledged himself to stand by them; and, with his election, the fact became obvious that the whole machinery of the Federal Government was to be turned, as far as he could turn it, against the South. Its checks and balances had already, by imprudent legislation, been destroyed, and agencies were at work which it was evident, would in the course of a few years, bring the whole Federal machinery—executive, legislative, and judicial—according to the forms of the Constitution, under the control of the North. The predominant faction there was pledged to turn it against the South for certain purposes of unfriendly legislation. Such legislation lurks in the Morrill tariff. It was to be directed, in an especial manner, not only against the industry of the South, but against her dignity and the rights of her citizens in the territories.

And in proof that we understand better than you the smothered animosity of the Northern mind against us, behold the envenomed hatred, the savage and barbarous spirit in which they are waging this war upon us. Haynau, who excited the indignation of the London brewers to such a pitch, was mild, merciful in comparison with some of Lincoln's lieutenants.

Thus you observe that slavery was neither the remote nor the proximate cause of this war. It is true that the enemy is trying to strike it down now; but in his rage at what does he not strike. He has been trying to erase a haven from the sea; he has been devastating, laying waste, pillaging and robbing our country and people to such an extent and in a manner that English men and women at home have no conception of; and he has been trying to strike at every Southern interest, and wherever a blow would entail suffering, inflict loss or gratify revenge. Your ministers have stood up in their places to pronounce the conduct of his lieutenants infamous.

They who hold that slavery is the cause of this war, show that they have by no means been attentive observers or close students of the American Government, its institutions, its operations, and its people. The truth is, that Government had, in many ways, and for diverse reasons, ceased to answer the purposes for which it was established. In that fact, and not in slavery, is to be found the cause of this war.

This is a long disquisition, but I could not well make it shorter.

This is not only a very wicked war, but a very foolish one. Why does the North wage it, and why do the people there cry out that they are fighting for their nationality and even for existence? We have assailed them in no point; we simply wish to dissolve all political association with them. Let us consult statistics and see if, instead of the negro, we do not discover the Yankee yearning after the "Almighty dollar" lurking at the bottom of all these difficulties.

By the official returns touching the commerce and navigation of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1860—the last year of the Republic—it appears that the foreign exports of the country for that year amounted, in round numbers, and exclusive of bullion and coin, to $316,000,000 consisting of the products of the sea, of the forest, of the field, and the workshop. And of this $316,000,000, $236,000,000, or three-fourths, were furnished exclusively by the South.—Northern ships, Northern seamen, and Northern capital found profitable employment in distributing this produce among the markets of the world; for the Union gave them privileges and advantages in the coasting and carrying trade, which amounted to well nigh a monopoly. The coasting trade by sea and river between the two sections greatly surpassed in value the foreign trade. None of it was in the hands of foreigners—nearly all of it was in the hands of the North.

Now, more—the North, for there was perfect free trade between the States, had a preference over all the world for its wares in the markets of the South. This preference amounted to 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 per cent., and even more, according to the article and the existing tariff. It extended over a country having twelve millions of customers.

The Yankees are a nation of shopkeepers, you know, and they well understood the bankruptcy, the poverty, the distress and misery which such a loss of custom and of business is to entail upon them.

When the separation of the two sections is completed—which, with God's help, we intend shall be—and that, too, we hope, at no distant day—this coasting trade, with its monopolies by sea, river, and rail, will no longer be open to the Yankee vessels and factors. The free trade between the sections will become foreign trade; their preference in our markets of twelve millions of people will be shaved, if not monopolized, by foreign nations; and all this fetching and carrying which belonged to the North will be transferred to French, or some other foreign bottoms, in the treaties we intend to make.

It was this commerce, this business, this fetching and carrying of Southern produce, which gave the universal Yankee nation its maritime power, made it great, and caused England to dread the displeasure of the North. With secession this maritime sceptre will depart from the North, and the South can place it in the hands of any power she pleases.

You can now perceive why the Yankees are so loth to let us go, why they have invoked the horrors of war, and incurred such enormous expenses to restrain us. The twofold fact that we simply seek to withdraw from all political association with them, and that they seek to restrain us by force of arms and the expenditure of untold sums, shows of itself with what ought to be convincing force for all the world, that the old Union was a one-sided affair, hurtful to the South, beneficial to the North.

The impression exists here among observant men, that when these troubles commenced the Governments of both England and France sympathized strongly with the Lincoln Government; that through that sympathy the doctrines announced in the 8th article of the treaty of Paris were ignored, and this unheard-of monstrous blockade by some forty or fifty vessels, of a coast line nearly 3,000 miles in extent, came to be acknowledged and respected; that, influenced by that sympathy, England led off in that course of so-called neutrality which has operated against us with chilling effect, and with a force but little, if any, short of active hostilities.

We had no commerce; but in that the enemy was rich. We had no navy; in that he was strong. Therefore when England and her allies declared that neither the armed cruisers nor the prizes of either of the belligerents should have hospitality and protection in neutral ports, she simply said to us—you shall not touch the commerce of your enemy—for we had no ports of our own to flee to, and she virtually said you shall go to none others.

The impression also exists that Mr. Seward has intimated both to France and England that he would treat any recognition of the Southern Confederacy, by either or both of them, as an open declaration of war against the Lincoln Government, and that both France and England have looked at the Yankee navy, and have been restrained by the threat.

Now we, who understand the Yankee character so well, looked upon that threat merely as the braggart's boast; and so we thought Seward's conduct in the Trent affair would have induced you to do.

Lincoln's navy is now in its upper culmination. With the South cut off, he will have, in proportion, no more to support a marine, if as much, than Canada has; for Canada enjoys some commercial advantages with the mother country which his Government will not enjoy with any part of the world. The lumber, the rice, the sugar, the tobacco, the naval stores, the breadstuffs, and the cotton of the South are all bulky articles. In proportion to their value, they are the best articles in the world for the support of a marine and the basis of maritime power. We export almost exclusively in the raw. One ship freighted with the precious metals will transport as much value in a single voyage as hundreds would do laden with the raw and bulky produce of the South, and the only crops now left to the North for general commerce are, their merchants are already telling you, their gold and grain crops.

Unlike the demand for our great Southern staples, which is certain, the demand abroad for grain is very uncertain. We know in advance how much cotton and tobacco and what quantity of naval stores you will want of us. But as for the quantity of grain that you will want of the Yankees, that depends entirely upon your own harvest and the harvest of some half a dozen other countries. Moreover, grain never rigged up any nation on the face of this earth, either into a vast maritime or a great naval power.

As for the crops of gold that belong to the States on the Pacific, the attachment of those States to the old Union is so slight that they have furnished no contingent for the war. Nor has Mr. Lincoln ventured to call on them either for men or money. No one here expects that those States will submit to the taxes imposed by this war. They will either set up for themselves or put themselves under the protection of some other Power.

Your pursuits make you peculiarly well acquainted with the ways of commerce, the influences of trade and the real sources of maritime consequence and naval power. Tell me this, therefore, out of the abundance of your knowledge, where is the North to find recuperation when she shall be deprived of all these commercial privileges, advantages, and monopolies in the South, which she enjoyed under the Union, and which, with that Union gone, she can never regain.

The Northern people are already tired of this war; no paper in that section is allowed to utter Southern or secession sentiments; all that dared to do it have been suppressed. No man there is allowed to plead our cause, to state our case, or to find fault with Lincoln, on pain of incarceration.

Northern prisons are full of men. Through such instrumentalities the politicians and that muzzled press of the North have hoodwinked the people. Consider the efforts that the war faction there is now making to raise new recruits; and if, out of a population of 20,000,000, 300,000 cannot be raised for this war of embittered feeling and intense animosity which the fanatics of the North are waging against us, how is it possible for Lincoln to make war with France or England for any cause whatever? My word for it, the North, as soon as this war feeling subsides and her present navy requires to be replaced with new ships, will dwindle down into a second or third rate naval power.

Study the object of this war and the conduct of Northern rulers, and you will be satisfied that their judgment has been taken away and their people afflicted with judicial blindness.

The first dawn of returning reason is just beginning to appear among the Yankee people. Notwithstanding the muzzled press and their gagged orators, the masses are beginning to perceive that they can no more restore the broken union of these States, by fighting over it, than you can make whole again the broken egg by trampling upon it. The enthusiasm which existed among the Northern people this time last year is gone; their war spirit is broken, for it is now evident that Lincoln's call for 300,000 more men is to be met only by compulsion. The trying crisis is over with us; and I may speak of things now which in my first letter it might not be proper to do.

At first we were anxious for foreign recognition, and desirous of intervention. But now we are comparatively indifferent as to either—indeed, we rather fear and dread the latter.

The recognition by France and England of Lincoln's paper blockade, has by no means proved an unmitigated evil to us. When peace comes, your manufacturers, your merchants, and your shipowners, will feel the effects of the course of your Government with regard to that blockade very sensibly, and in more ways than one. It has forced us into many branches of industry, into which, but for that blockade, we should have never entered; for instead of producing the articles ourselves, we should have depended upon you and other foreign countries for them.

When you acknowledged the blockade, and warned your vessels not to violate it, we were sadly in want of powder and arms. Now, we have excellent powder-mills of our own, and two fine armories in full blast. They turn out muskets, rifles, sabres, &c., rapidly, of fine quality, and as fast as we want them. Our last orders for arms from abroad have, in all probability, already gone forward.

So, too, with iron. The war found no more than half a dozen furnaces in blast in the whole Confederacy, and most of those have been destroyed by the enemy. But the Government has given such encouragement to the iron men that new mines have been opened in other parts of the Confederacy, and furnaces enough are already up or in the course of erection, not only to supply the wants of the Government, but to satisfy the railroads and the people generally with cast and wrought iron.

Also with the coarse wollen and cotton fabrics. A large amount of capital has been invested in establishments for their fabrication, so that your Ministers, by their course with regard to Lincoln's paper blockade, have forced us to arm ourselves, to clothe ourselves, and to feed ourselves. Hence, when peace does come, we shall have much to sell and but little to buy. We accept this condition now with a degree of pride and pleasure, because of the manner in which it was forced upon us. Moreover, there is satisfaction in the thought that it has all been accomplished in but little more than a year.

We are beginning to see daylight; but I do not see yet any beginning to the end of the troubles which this war is entailing upon certain interests with you.

Your operator's begin already to have presented before them, for contemplation, the prospect of another winter without cotton.

This will be worse than the last—for your stock now of American on hand is not more than one week's full supply in ordinary times. I say the prospect is actually before you now, because from the day your Ministers make up their mind to open a cotton port, until the first cargo arrives in Liverpool several months must intervene. After it is decided to break the blockade, the fleet to do it has to be collected. That would not take long.—But then notice must be given also in advance to the merchants, and a place of rendezvous appointed in American waters where the cotton ships may assemble for convoy.—This, you well know, requires time. Then, after that, the cotton has to be brought down from the interior and placed at the shipping port, and means of transportation, both by river and rail, are limited with us. They are already taxed well nigh up to their capacity for army purposes, and other governmental necessities. Those ships cannot fly. The slowest sailer in the fleet regulates the speed of the whole. Time must be given them to come and go—and the voyage to and from one of our cotton ports will, at this season of the year, and especially under convoy, occupy not less than fifty days each way.

Now make your own calculations, and you will see that unless within thirty days at farthest after this letter is due to you, notice be given to your merchants to get ready their cotton ships, ministers will have virtually decreed another hard time for operatives, for Manchester will be doomed to a second winter without cotton.

We planted last spring not more than one-fourth the usual breadth of land in cotton. Our surplus labour is directed to breadstuffs and provisions. We grow the finest of wheat. The flour from it usually commands in transatlantic markets a dollar the barrel more than flour from Northern grain.

This time last year it was the cry at the North that they would starve us out. Those who joined in it knew but little of the resources of our "sunny South," or of the energy of our people.

Thanks for the homage paid by the Great Powers to the Lincoln Government and his paper blockade, we now have enough and to spare. It is highly gratifying to our young pride as a nation to find in this practical way how rich and diverse are our resources, and how independent of the rest of the world we may be if necessity so require.

The part in this war for our navy to play has been very humble, and our navy itself of the moderate proportions. Indeed, secession found us without a single man-of-war afloat or on the stocks. Still we have been able to improvise two or three, and they have given a pretty good account of themselves.

Our steamer, the Arkansas, is a makeshift, for she is covered with railroad iron, and her armour, therefore, is by no means shot proof. Still her performances in the Mississippi River and before Vicksburg, would grace the annals of the proudest navy that ever floated. So would the performances of the Manassas, the Merrimac, and of all who have had a chance at the enemy.

But as soon as we recover the command of our waters, we should address ourselves with earnestness to the subject of a navy, well knowing that no nation can command the respect of her peers without physical force.

So far this war has, as nearly as I can ascertain, cost the Treasury about $260,000,000 (two hundred and sixty millions). About $60,000,000 of this sum is in 8 per Cent. Bonds; the rest in Treasury notes, which for the most part constitute our currency. These notes bear no interest. So that you observe we have not gone into debt much beyond the sum which our average cotton crop would bring. Neither have we sought to borrow from strangers. By a survey of our situation, means, and resources, you will discover our pecuniary ability to build and maintain a respectable navy is ample. Peace will give us water on which to float it, and I join your operatives most heartily in the wish that that may be right soon.

Yours truly,

M. P. MAURY, C.S.N.

Admiral Robert Fitz Roy, R.N., London.

DISMISSAL OF GENERAL McCLELLAN.

LETTER OF GENERAL HALLECK.

GENERAL HALLECK TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Head-quarters of the Army, Washington, Oct. 28.

Sir,—In reply to the general interrogatories contained in your letter of yesterday, I have to report:—

1. That requisitions for supplies to the army under General McClellan are made by Staff officers on the chiefs of bureaus here—that is, for quartermaster's supplies by his chief quartermaster on the Quartermaster-General; for commissary supplies by his chief commissary on the Commissary-General, &c. No such requisitions have been, to my knowledge, made upon the Secretary of War, and none upon the General-in-Chief.

2. On several occasions General McClellan has telegraphed to me that his army was deficient in certain supplies. All these telegrams were immediately referred to the head of bureaus, with orders to report.

It was ascertained that in every instance the requisitions had been immediately filled, except one, where the Quartermaster-General had been obliged to send from Philadelphia certain articles of clothing, tents, &c., not having a full supply here. There has not been, so far as I could ascertain, any neglect or delay in any department or bureau in issuing all supplies asked for by General McClellan or by the officers of his Staff. Delays have occasionally occurred in forwarding supplies by rail on account of the crowded condition of the depots, or of a want of cars; but whenever notified of this, agents have been sent out to remove the difficulty. Under the excellent superintendence of General Haupt, I think these delays have been less frequent and of shorter duration than is usual with freight trains. An army of the size of that under General McClellan will frequently be for some days without the supplies asked for, on account of neglect in making timely requisitions and unavoidable delays in forwarding them, and in distributing them to the different brigades and regiments. From all the information I can obtain, I am of opinion that the requisitions from that army have been filled more promptly, and that the men, as a general rule, have been better supplied than our armies operating in the west. The latter have operated at much greater distances from the sources of supply, and have had far less facilities of transportation. In fine, I believe that no armies in the world, while in campaign, have been more promptly or better supplied than ours.

3. Soon after the battle of Antietam, General McClellan was urged to give me information of his intended movements, in order that, if he moved between the enemy and Washington, reinforcements could be sent from this place. On the 1st of October, finding that he purposed to operate from Harper's Ferry, I urged him to cross the river at once and give battle to the enemy, pointing out to him the disadvantages of delaying till the autumn rains had swollen the Potomac and impaired the roads. On the 6th of October he was peremptorily ordered to "cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy or drive him South. Your army must move now while the roads are good." It will be observed that three weeks have elapsed since this order was given.

4. In my opinion there has been no such want of supplies in the army under General McClellan as to prevent his compliance with the orders to advance against the enemy. Had he moved to the south side of the Potomac, he could have received his supplies almost as readily as by remaining inactive on the north.

5. On the 7th of October, in a telegram in regard to his intended movements, General McClellan stated that it would require at least three days to supply the 1st, 5th, and 6th Corps; that they needed shoes and other indispensable articles of clothing, as well as shelter tents. No complaint was made that any requisitions had not been filled, and it was inferred from his language that he was only waiting for the distribution of his supplies. On the 11th he telegraphed that a portion of his supplies, sent by rail, had been delayed. As already stated, agents were immediately sent from here to investigate this complaint, and they reported that everything had gone forward. On the same date (the 11th) he spoke of many of his horses being broken down by fatigue. On the 12th he complained that the rate of supply was only "15" horses per week for the entire army there and in front of Washington." I immediately directed the Quartermaster-General to inquire into this matter, and report why a larger supply was not furnished. General Meigs reported on the 14th that the average issue of horses to General McClellan's army in the field and in front of Washington for the previous six weeks had been 1459 per week, or 8754 in all; in addition, that large numbers of mules had been supplied, and that the number of animals with General McClellan's army on the Upper Potomac was over 31,000. He also reported that he was then sending to that army all the horses he could procure.

On the 18th General McClellan stated, in regard to General Meigs's reports that he had filled every requisition for shoes and clothing, "General Meigs may have ordered those articles to be forwarded, but they have not reached our depots, and unless greater effort to insure prompt transmission is made by the department of which General Meigs is the head, they might as well remain in New York or Philadelphia, so far as this army is concerned." I immediately called General Meigs's attention to this apparent neglect of his department. On the 25th he reported as the result of his investigation that 48,000 pairs of boots and shoes had been received by the Quartermaster of General McClellan's army at Harper's Ferry, Frederick, and Hagerstown; that 20,000 pairs were at Harper's Ferry depot on the 21st; that 10,000 more were on their way, and 15,000 more ordered. Colonel Ingalls, Aide-de-Camp and Chief Quartermaster to General McClellan, telegraphed on the 25th:—"The suffering for want of clothing is exaggerated, I think, and certainly might have been avoided by timely requisitions of regimental and brigade commanders." On the 24th he telegraphed to the Quartermaster-General that the clothing was not detained in cars at the depots. "Such complaints are groundless. The fact is, the clothing arrives and is issued, but more is still wanted. I have ordered more than would seem necessary from any data furnished me, and I beg to remind you that you have always very promptly met all my requisitions so far as clothing is concerned. Our depot is not at fault; it provides as soon as due notice is given. I foresee no time when an army of over 100,000 men will not call for clothing and other articles."

In regard to General McClellan's means of promptly communicating the wants of his army to me or to the proper bureaus of the War Department I report that, in addition to the ordinary mails, he has been in hourly communication with Washington by telegraph.

It is due to General Meigs that I should submit herewith a copy of a telegram received by him from General McClellan.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief."

GENERAL McCLELLAN TO GENERAL MEIGS.

[United States' Military Telegraph.—Received Oct. 22, 1862, 9 40 p.m., from McClellan's Head-quarters.]

To Brigadier-General Meigs.—Your dispatch of this day is received. I have never intended in any letter or despatch to make any accusation against yourself or your department for not furnishing or forwarding clothing as rapidly as it was possible for you to do. I believe that everything has been done that could be done in this respect. The idea that I have tried to convey was that certain portions of the command were without clothing, and the army could not move until it was supplied.

G. B. McCLELLAN, Major-General.

THE RECOGNITION OF TEXAS.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—In your last number you gave an account of the annexation of Texas to the United States; and by the historical facts therein set forth proved the recognition of that Power to be a parallel case to that now pending in the matter of the Confederate States of America. In further testimony I submit the following extracts taken from Mr. Kennedy's excellent work published in 1841:—

General Hamilton, of South Carolina, had continued to aid Texas in her difficulties, and effected a negotiation with an eminent English banker, by which the basis was laid of the naval power of the Republic, by the purchase of a war steamer at New York. He had sacrificed his personal pursuits and his domestic enjoyments, and had advanced his money freely for Texas, because he believed that the regenerating principles of free trade and civilization were at issue in her fortunes, and was satisfied that the whole world would gain by placing a fertile and beautiful territory under the sway of the British race, instead of remaining a valueless waste, of which Mexico was the nominal, and the marauding savage the real possessor. General Hamilton became associated with Mr. Albert T. Burnley, for negotiating a loan of five millions of dollars for the Republic, and was allowed by a special resolution of Congress to become a citizen of Texas (without disfranchising him at home). In August 1839, he arrived in England, and proceeding to Paris, co-operated zealously with General Henderson in his endeavours to obtain the recognition of Texan independence by France. These endeavours were successful; and on the 25th of September, 1839, a treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce was signed by General James Pickens Henderson, Plenipotentiary on the part of the Republic of Texas, and Marshal Soult, Duke of Dalmatia, President of the Council, on the part of France. The Marshal, in affixing his signature to the treaty, said he was proud to have been the European god-father of the Republic. The treaty was ratified in Texas on the 18th January, 1840, in the city of Austin, which had been selected as the permanent seat of Government, and to which it had been removed from Houston in the autumn of 1839.

The time had now arrived when the acknowledgment of Texas by England could not be much longer delayed, without incurring the danger of alienating the Republic from this country, and leading her to grant exclusive advantages to some more friendly Power. General Hamilton, having obtained the recognition of Texan independence from Holland and Belgium, renewed his application to the British Government in the autumn of 1840. Lord Palmerston—who had avoided, on the one hand, affording, by undue precipitancy, pretext for offence on the part of Mexico, and had on the other shown respectful consideration for the position and claims of Texas—agreed to arrange the terms of a treaty, or treaties, with General Hamilton. A commercial convention was framed on the basis of perfect reciprocity; and conditional stipulations were made for the assumption of one million sterling of the debt due by Mexico to British bondholders. The treaties finally agreed upon were signed at the Foreign Office on the evening of Monday, November 16, 1840, by Lord Palmerston and General Hamilton, and were ratified by the Texan Government in February 1841.

The recognition of Texas, in the face of prejudice and clamour, was an act of patriotic firmness, for which the British Minister is entitled to the thanks of all Englishmen who hold the interests of their country superior to the obligations and purposes of party.

In order to make the cases of Texas and the Confederate States identical, France would be required to recognize first; but then that would disturb certain arrangements said to have existed since the commencement of hostilities in America between the Government of Her Majesty and that of the Emperor, in reference to the course to be followed by both Powers concerning that unfortunate conflict. Napoleon, however, may now consider that he is free to act without concert with this country, in which event he would possibly claim some advantages that would render Havre a most formidable rival to Liverpool. The promptness with which Texas was recognized as an independent State, after the arrival of her commissioners in Europe, bears a most favourable comparison with the tardiness that has been exhibited towards the Confederate States, when we reflect that their representatives have been in this country since April 1861. I am assured that Spain, Prussia, Belgium, Holland, and several other of the lesser Powers of Europe, are prepared to act in the premises as soon as the initiative step is taken on this side of the Atlantic, and that Russia will not be slow to follow them, notwithstanding the apparent coquetry between her and the United States. So it is Lord Palmerston's "carriage that stops the way."

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1862.

The Political Condition of the North.

Though beaten at the ballot-box, it was not to be expected that the Republican party would give up its present tenure of power without making a single effort to retain it. Why should it do so? Is it not the party of Revolution? Has it not trampled on the Constitution of the United States, not only in making war on the South, but in sustaining at home a despotic Government, and in inaugurating a reign of terror? If the Republican party refuses to abide by the verdict of the majority of electors—if it determines to forget right, and make an appeal to might—it will at least act consistently, for so it did when it resolved to disregard the constitutional rights of the Southern States, and to bring them back into the Union by force of arms. The Democratic victory is perhaps as likely to issue in civil war in the North as it is to bring about a peace between the North and South. As yet it is impossible to form any decided opinion as to the action of the Republicans, because a Revolutionary party is not restrained by ordinary prudential considerations, and is always ready to play a desperate game—irrespective of probable results. The indefinite postponement of the draft in New York might lead us to suppose that Mr. Lincoln and his advisers were not prepared to defy the power of the Democrats, but we must remember that the conscription is not altogether a party question, and that it has been unpopular with Republicans. A much more significant event is the dismissal of General McClellan.

It is impossible to ascribe this measure to military motives. We grant it is very important for the Lincoln Government that there should be a show of activity and such movements of the army as would enable it to report some paper victories; but this object is not likely to be obtained by the removal of McClellan, and the manner in which that general was dismissed further proves the proceeding was intended as a defiance to the Democrats. Let us take the Lincoln account of the transaction. According to that, McClellan was ordered on October 6 to cross the Potomac and give the enemy battle or drive him South. For some reason or other McClellan did not obey this command. He alleges that he could not advance because his soldiers were in want of shoes, and that his cavalry was in want of horses. But after the lapse of three weeks the Northern army did cross the Potomac; it did advance, and was advancing when Mr. Lincoln summarily dismisses General McClellan—that is to say, so long as that commander disobeyed urgent orders of his Government, his command was not taken from him; but when he was engaged in carrying out those directions he was disgraced. It is evident, we think, that McClellan was not removed for the alleged fault.

If McClellan's dismissal had been for military reasons it would have been unnecessary to have made the manner of it insulting. General McClellan was treated as though he were the traitor that the fanatics of New England represent him to be. Instead of the intention of the Government being courteously communicated to him, he receives, without any warning, and late at night, a peremptory order to transfer his command to General Burnside; and, as if his presence was intolerable or dangerous, he is not only deprived of his command but ordered to leave the army and forthwith report himself at Trenton, New Jersey. The Lincoln Government, not contented with these proceedings, take care to announce that General McClellan was removed for an act of insubordination, and whilst he was taking farewell of the army publishes a letter of General Halleck's, in which he is accused of disobedience to orders, and of making false representations with respect to the supplies for his troops. It seems to us that the Lincoln Government intended by such conduct to defy the Democratic party, of which McClellan is a leading member, and to declare its intention of carrying out the policy of a servile war; and if we wanted further evidence of the correctness of this conclusion, we have it in the ostentatious order to General Fremont to hold himself in readiness for active service. The Democratic general engaged in carrying out the directions of the Government is disgraced, and the Republican general, who has proved himself a military failure, and who has been accused of something very much like peculation, is restored to power.

The Democrats accept the issue. McClellan resigned his command without hesitation, but in such a way as to evince supreme contempt for the Washington Government. In his address to the army, he reminds the soldiers that he formed and fostered the Army of the Potomac, and it is bound to him by special and indissoluble ties. He does not ask the troops to transfer the willing allegiance they have paid to him to his successor; he does not indulge in any stereotyped compliment about their duty to the Executive; but he bids them remember that they are his comrades for the defence of the Constitution. But how can the Army of the Potomac defend the Constitution of the United States, and yet render obedience to a Government that has trampled upon every provision of that Constitution? When General McClellan bade the soldiers fight for the Constitution, he unmistakably exhorted them not to fight in defence, or for the furtherance, of the policy of the Lincoln Government. The retiring general could not have sounded a bolder note of defiance, and yet obey. The enthusiastic, we might almost say the affectionate, greetings of the soldiers as their late chief rode from corps to corps to bid them farewell, show how thoroughly they sympathise with the only general in whom they have confidence, and how little hold the Lincoln Government has over them. More than this, it is worthy of remark that General Burnside, in the order which he issued on the assumption of command, found it necessary to testify to the universal respect and esteem felt for his predecessor, and to make a kind of appeal on account of his friendly relations with General McClellan. The new commander virtually apologises for that act of his Government to which he owed his elevation.

Another notable circumstance—for at such a crisis minor matters are important—is, that when the staff officers assembled to take leave of their late commander there was one, and only one, toast proposed, and that was "The Army of the Potomac." The usual compliment of toasting the President was significantly dispensed with. General McClellan has no doubt acted in accordance with the wishes of his party. If he had disobeyed the President's mandate, he would have compromised the Democrats by inaugurating a civil war. By resigning his command he scarcely weakens, in case of need, his influence with the army. Besides, his ill-treatment gives the Democrats just what they wanted—a tangible point of attack. It will weld the party together, and even give them the support of the moderate Republicans, who are unwilling to see the safety of the army jeopardized to gratify the spleen of the Lincolnites. The panic in Wall-street, and the rumours of the defeat of Burnside, indicate how much public confidence is shaken by the removal of the best of the Northern generals.

If Mr. Lincoln's ability and courage were as unquestionable as the ambition of his supporters, we should have no hesitation in predicting that the McClellan coup d'état would be followed by similar attacks on the Democrats, and that we were on the eve of a political crisis in the North, which must eventuate in a trial of strength between the partisans of revolution and the friends of order. If Mr. Lincoln acted according to his own judgment, or rather according to the natural timidity and vacillation of his character, we should think that he would be satisfied with what he has done, and not provoke a civil contest. But Mr. Lincoln has thrown himself into the arms of the extreme section of the Republican party, and he is under the direction, we may add in the power, of men who have no dread of civil strife, and who may force him to defy and make war on the Constitutional party. Under these circumstances, the refusal of England to join with France in an offer of mediation will encourage the Republicans to insist upon the continuance of the war, and to some extent it will discourage the more timid Democrats. The Lincolnite supporters may say—"England is aware of our intention to inaugurate a servile war in the South, and refuses to take any step to prevent the consummation of the design. England will watch the course of events. She will see if the proclamation is a dead letter, or not. If the negroes cannot be reached, if they will not rise up and work out their actual freedom with the aid of and protection of Federal gunboats and Federal armies; and if, therefore, this last card fails, and there is no prospect of bringing the war to a close, England will, at some future time, assent to the proposal of an offer of mediation. If, on the contrary, the prayers and expectations of the clergy of New England should be fulfilled, and in the South there should be a massacre such as the world has never seen, if the South should become a huge St. Domingo, if every homestead should become a little Cawnpore, if the now docile slaves should be changed into ruthless savages, then the interference of England may be unnecessary; for then the Northern troops may be able to possess themselves of the desolated and blood-stained homes of the South." We are not saying that the English Government has made any such calculation in refusing to join with France in the attempt to bring about a suspension of hostilities. Lord Russell, no doubt, looks upon the threat of a servile war as unworthy of any serious attention, but it is certain that the Republican party will regard, or pretend to regard, the refusal of England to interfere as a tacit sanction of the proposed policy of Southern extermination. On the other hand, the Democrats, if they should openly protest against Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, and demand its withdrawal, will be taunted with being more anxious for the safety of the Southern people than is England. Or if the Democrats should venture to breathe a word of peace, would they not, and with some show of reason, be reproached for despairing of the reconstruction of the Union, whilst England avows, by her rejection of the French proposition, that she does not look upon the cause of the North as hopeless? In the present political condition of the North, the late action of our Government has done much to neutralize the Democratic victory, and to encourage the war party. The French proposition was made at a moment when its acceptance by England would have had the happiest results in strengthening the party of peace and order, and, unhappily, at a moment when its rejection materially strengthens the party of war and revolution.

The Distribution of Free and Slave Labour in the South.

In considering the social and economic conditions of the slave-holding States of North America, no subject presents greater difficulty to the European inquirer, or is more fruitful of error, than the relative position of free and slave labour. The party which, by the election of Mr. Lincoln, acquired for ^{any} first time a transient predominance in the non-slaveholding States, had so long and so loudly proclaimed an "irrepressible conflict" between the two systems of labour, that to the superficial observer this "conflict" might seem the true and only cause of the disruption of the Union. If this were the case, it would be only a natural inference that the antagonism must be most violent where the antagonistic elements come into nearest contact, and that if slaveholding and non-slaveholding States could not co-exist in the same political federation, still less could the two systems harmonize in one and the same State. Yet that they do so harmonize, in the South at least, is conclusively proved by the exceptional productiveness of that country in time of peace, and by the self-sustaining energies it has evinced under extreme trials in time of war. This fact presents an interesting problem, which deserves a closer study than has heretofore been brought to bear upon it.

The first error to be guarded against is that of confounding with each other the climatic and social characteristics of widely remote portions of so immense an extent of territory as the South. In reference to our subject, the slaveholding States may be divided into three groups, differing but slightly in point of free population, but essentially in the statistics of their respective slave population. A glance at the subjoined table will illustrate the difference, which coincides suggestively with the historic position of each group in the events of the last two years. The group which contains alone over one-half of the entire slave population, comprises those States which first resolved on complete and irrevocable separation. The next group consists of the States which, although their preferences, were never doubtful and were manifested in no ambiguous manner, did not resort to the last remedy until after they had essayed their friendly efforts at conciliation. To the third group belong those States which are still, in the opinion of many, doubtful, and which both North and South claim.

In the last group predial or plantation slavery is confined to special localities only; as in Maryland, to what is termed the "Eastern Shore;" and in Missouri, to the southern counties. By far the greater part of the soil, being devoted to the cultivation of cereals and the raising of cattle, is in the hands of small farmers, and tilled by white labour. Three of the great commercial metropolises of America are within the limits of these States—the cities of Baltimore, St. Louis, and Louisville; the population of each of which is largely composed of foreign immigrants, and in each of which the employment of slave labour is exceptional. The only form in which slavery is general in these four States is that of domestic slavery. The negro serves in the family in which he is born and of which he forms a part. The ownership of slaves is scarcely, if at all, a source of profit, and hence it becomes, more peculiarly even than in other States, the distinction of an aristocratic class; and it would argue but little knowledge of human nature to measure the hold which the institution has over the popular mind in those States by the number of slaves in each, or by any calculations, however well founded, of the profitableness or unprofitableness of their employment. The important fact is, that the great bulk of all labour, both agricultural and other, is and has always been done in these States by whites, without apparently impairing this hold.

The same middle position which the next group of States occupies between the more northern and more southern groups, it occupies also in regard to its slave population, and it partakes, therefore, in an almost equal degree of the characteristics of both. In Western Tennessee slave labour produces cotton; in East Tennessee white labour has almost a monopoly of the tillage of the soil. In North Carolina the chief articles of export—naval stores—are almost the exclusive produce of white labour. Virginia, within herself affords the complete counterpart to that polarization of the white and slave population which we observe in the South at large.

It is, therefore, in the group of States which contain the greatest number of States—the planting States, as they are appropriately called—that our problem is studied with the greatest advantage. These States form a compact territory, extending from the 35th parallel of latitude to the Rio Grande, singularly homogeneous in soil and climate, as in the character and pursuits of its population. With the exception of the swampy rice districts of South Carolina, the sugar fields in the delta of the Mississippi, and the cold, windy desert in the extreme west of Texas, the whole of this immense expanse may be viewed as one great cotton plantation, dotted plentifully with salubrious "piney barrens," where the sterile sands support only the hardy pine, and where the inhabitants find refuge from the miasmal exhalations of the moist, rich, alluvial soils. Huge lazy rivers traverse in every direction this vast undulating plain, which is nowhere broken by any considerable mountains. When the cotton crop ripens, these rivers and their tributaries swell rapidly and afford convenient access to every part of the cotton regions.

The country we have described produces and exports, besides large quantities of rice and sugar, and some lumber, about four million bales of cotton, averaging 400 pounds each, and worth in the aggregate at least thirty millions sterling. In addition to these large exportable productions, it supplies by far the greater part of its consumption of food. All this is no inconsiderable result of the labours of an aggregate population, free and slave, scarcely exceeding five millions, and would lead us to conclude a priori that not only must the entire available industry of the country be employed, but that it must be husbanded and directed with remarkable success to produce this result. Yet some persons expect us to believe that less than one-half of this aggregate population, only the slaves, are so employed, and that the more numerous free population are mere idle drones, if not worse; and this we are expected to believe for no better reason than that, because the slaves monopolize the field-work, there is nothing left for the mass of the whites to do. It is forgotten, or purposely kept out of sight, that the manipulation of such vast agricultural surplus, not consumed on the spot, must employ at least as many persons as its production. The cotton which is grown hundreds of miles from the seaport must be transported thither, and there exchanged for the necessities as well as the luxuries of the plantation. If we assume the producer to receive a fair equivalent for the value of his produce, this transportation alone amounts to an inland trade of at least sixty millions of pounds sterling—vastly more than would suffice in most other countries to employ three millions of people. If, then, we were to believe that every Southern white man is idle who is not a planter nor an overseer, nor belongs to any of the professional classes, we should require the whole number of negroes, assuming their capacity for these duties, to fill all the counting-houses of all the busy thriving cities, towns, and villages; to engineer and man all the railways and steamboats; and to perform all the skilled mechanic work, and, in brief, to absorb all the innumerable useful occupations to which such a trade gives profitable employment. The fact is, that except as an agricultural labourer, or as a domestic servant, the negro, nowhere in the slaveholding States, competes with the white man in any of the various vocations of life. Even in these pursuits he competes successfully only in proportion as climate or social usages secure to him some special advantage—the social usage which, even in the most northern portions of the slave-holding States, prefers him as a menial; the climate which in the more Southern States excludes the white man from the cotton fields on penalty of death.

Many interesting deductions may be drawn from this distribution of white and negro labour in the three principal groups of slaveholding States. Our present object is confined to point out that in exact proportion as the white man is physically enabled to compete with the negro, the negro ceases to be a competitor, and that even where the negro enjoys, as it were, a special monopoly, the white labourer has still the advantage. This will explain why, in the slaveholding States themselves, free labour and slave labour have never come into that "irrepressible conflict" which it is assumed must necessarily exist between the two, and which undoubtedly would exist were both directed into the same channel.

The Military Career of General McClellan.

General McClellan has been unsuccessful; and in war failure is the one fault for which there is no forgiveness, though there may be abundant excuse. Even a commander who, under the most trying circumstances, avoids defeat and saves the force committed to his charge from destruction, but does not gain a victory, cannot escape the censure of his contemporaries, though he may hope that posterity will do him justice. We all remember the fate of Admiral Napier. When he left this country in command of the Baltic Fleet he had such a reputation for daring and conduct that the public expected in a few weeks to see London illuminated for a naval triumph that would recall the glory of the Nile and of Trafalgar. He did nothing but bring his fleet home safe and sound; and his reputation was gone. In vain he urged that his ships were not fitted to storm stone fortifications, and that his crews were insufficient and required training. In vain he represented the important service he had rendered his country in not sacrificing his fleet in a desperate, unequal, and hopeless encounter. He was sent forth to fight and to conquer, and if he had returned with his fleet crippled by an unsuccessful contest he would not have been more unpopular than he was. We should not, therefore, be surprised at a section of the Northern press finding fault with McClellan, and we might have regarded his dismissal as natural, if not reasonable, but for the manner of it, and the moment selected for it; which show that it was instigated by political rather than by military motives. But McClellan, though insultingly dismissed by the Lincoln Government, has earned for himself a conspicuous and honourable place in the annals of the present war. He may review his military career with regret, but without any feeling of shame. He has shown considerable ability for organization and administration. He is not, like Pope, an idle boaster, the general of an hour, who no sooner appears on the scene than he is crushed, and who, as he is forced into exile, whines like a beaten cur, and seeks to blacken the characters of the officers whom he led to disaster. Nor is he like Halleck, who wasted a large army in inglorious inactivity, and besides that has done nothing to rescue his name from oblivion, except writing the most mendacious despatches that were ever penned. He is not like the commander who announced to the world that he was going to change the course of the Mississippi, and dug a ditch a few yards wide to effect the purpose. He is not like Hunter, who sought to arm the blacks, to do the work the white men shirked; and he is not to be named in the same breath with such miscreants as Butler, Turchin, and McNiel. General McClellan waged war like a brave soldier, and not like a vain-glorious imbecile, or a pantomimist, or a ruthless savage. Of all the Northern generals he too has been the most efficient. Military critics who condemn his tactics do not deny that he has military capacity. His character is respected by Europe, and the South regards him as a worthy and by no means insignificant enemy. He is an exception to the general rule; he has made his mark, although he has failed. If his military career is over, he will be remembered as McClellan the unfortunate. His unsuccessful campaign will adorn the story of the war, as well as point a useful moral.

Much has been said about the folly of the Washington Government in taking a railway official from his civil occupation and placing him at the head of a large army. It seems to be forgotten that McClellan had received a military education, had distinguished himself in warfare, and was the author of a clever report on the war in the Crimea. Nor was his temporary retirement from the service a fair reason for ignoring the recommendation of a military education and military experience. Many of the West-Pointers in the Southern army who have signalized themselves had not performed military duties for some years before the commencement of the war. It was, perhaps, unlucky for McClellan that soon after he took the command in Western Virginia he had an opportunity of vindicating the choice of his Government. He gained a decisive, though unimportant, and, we may add, accidental victory. Instantly the North, then in the first paroxysm of the war fever, spoke of the affair as a second Austerlitz, and christened the hero of the day the Young Napoleon. Possibly it would have been better for McClellan if he had continued to command a small army, for there are many officers who can do well with a few thousand men who find themselves unable to operate with a hundred thousand. But at this crisis occurred the memorable battle of Bull Run. The Northern army was disgracefully beaten. It was numerically superior to the Confederates, who were, besides only partially armed, and in want of ammunition; yet it fled panic-stricken from the field like a herd of frightened Chinamen. No official ingenuity could conceal or palliate the disaster, and in its extremity the Government called upon General McClellan, the only Northern commander who had gained a victory, to assume the chief command; not the command of soldiers, much less of an army, but of the elements from which a fighting force might be produced. General McClellan saw at once he had the herculean task before him of changing an undisciplined and disorganized mass into an army. His officers, as well as privates, were raw recruits. The men were neither of one mind nor one nation. The majority were Irishmen and Germans, who fought for pay; a number of his troops were the scourgings of the Atlantic cities, who cared for nothing but the chance of plunder; and the minority, of native Americans, who thought too much of their individual importance to submit themselves with alacrity and heartiness to military domination. In a few months, by energy and perseverance, this heterogeneous crowd became the Army of the Potomac. It may suit the clergymen and fanatics of New England to sneer at General McClellan, and call him a mere drill-sergeant, but the unprejudiced observer must admit that the formation of the Army of the Potomac from such materials as we have described was a task that many captains illustrious for their victories in the field could not have accomplished, and which demanded a special ability that is near akin to military genius. Dazzled by the numbers, the magnificent equipment, and the discipline of the Army of the Potomac, and not making due allowance for the spirit, the animating cause, and the natural prowess of the South, European critics pronounced it invincible. On this side the Atlantic, even those who saw the impossibility of the ultimate conquest of the Confederate States, thought that McClellan must be successful against the numerically inferior and ill-supplied Southern forces. It seems to us that McClellan was more farseeing and less sanguine. He had made an army, but not a veteran army, and he appreciated the difference between the work of parade and the exigencies of the battle-field. He therefore advanced slowly, perhaps too slowly, and successively sat down before Manassas and Yorktown. We offer no excuse for this strategy, nor are we sufficiently acquainted with the details to condemn it. A Fabian policy is excellent for defence, but fruitless, not to say ruinous, for aggression. The exact numbers of the Army of the Potomac are not known. Some accounts say it was 200,000 strong. It is probable that from the time McClellan set forth from Washington until he retired from the peninsula he had altogether 180,000 men, and that there were times when he had 130,000 effective troops at his disposal. With such a host delay is to some extent demoralizing, and almost as destructive to the life and health of the soldiery as active warfare. Bloody battles frequently claim less victims than bloodless sieges. It is probable if McClellan had pushed on he would have been defeated, but it would have been better to have encountered that risk than to have delayed and hesitated. After all, he could not avert, though he could postpone the ordeal of the first battle. We are, however, not quite sure that McClellan could have pushed on by any sacrifice. True, the fortifications before which he paused were not so strong as he expected. Some of the guns were dummies; but, nevertheless, so long as the Confederates defended them they were formidable obstacles to an advance, and undoubtedly the Federals would have found it tremendous work to drive an enemy from his fortifications who afterwards drove them from their entrenchments. It is quite within the range of possibility that an attempt to force Manassas or Yorktown would have anticipated the slaughter and destruction of the Seven Days' Battle. Possibly, when the war is over, and the history of it is written, it will be found that the regular siege operations of McClellan were prudent and indispensable.

After the evacuation of Yorktown, and the advance towards Richmond, the incompetency of McClellan to contend with the Southern generals became manifest. Although the invader, and nominally the aggressor, he was in all the chief battles placed in an attitude of defence. His enemy always chose the time and place of attack, and the army before Richmond, though numerically inferior to the Army of the Potomac, managed to attack on nearly equal terms. The Southern generals understood the art of massing their forces against the comparatively weak points of the Northern positions. The battle of Seven Pines revealed to the Confederates their strength, and to McClellan his weakness; but at that juncture the Northern commander could not withdraw without ruin and disgrace. The cavalry expedition of General Stuart, in which he passed round the Northern army, showed that McClellan had either neglected some very palpable precautions, or that his lines were so extended as to make his position dangerously vulnerable.

We need not dwell on the culminating disaster of the Seven Days' Battle. McClellan was fairly outgeneralled. For once he seems to have abandoned his cautious advance, to have eagerly occupied some ground vacated by the Confederates, and thus have fallen into a cleverly-devised trap. Whilst the telegraph wires were informing the North of the successful advance, the great contest commenced which ended in the Army of the Potomac being driven back from day to day, until it reached the shelter of the gunboats on the James River. No credit can be given to McClellan for the obstinately-contested fights. He was evidently unprepared for, and unable to deal with, the enemy. The battles before Richmond were essentially soldiers' battles; and they proved incontestably, that if McClellan could not compete with the genius of the Confederate commander or his generals, he had constructed an army of which the North might be justly proud, though it was beaten and so nearly annihilated on the first grand occasion; it had of manifesting its prowess. If, instead of imitating the ridiculous boasting of Mr. Lincoln, who told the beaten army it never had and never would be beaten, McClellan in his address had highly extolled the valour and determination of his troops, no one would have criticised at his language. We grant the Northern troops were like cornered rats; but they fought, rather than lay down their arms.

When McClellan entrenched himself on the banks of the James River he found his troops fearfully thinned by recent battle—for on the retreat the wounded had been necessarily left to perish—and that his splendid equipments had fallen into the hands of the victorious foe. He seems to have acted manfully. Having provided for the safety of the French Princes, who left him in the hour of defeat, he did his best to provide for the safety of his troops. He could do but little. To advance was impossible, and a retreat was dangerous. From Washington came assurances of succour, and he remained where he was. It was the unhealthy season, and he saw his troops deprived of fresh provisions, and fast dying around him. Pestilence was a more deadly foe than fire and sword. At length it became plain that he must withdraw from the peninsula at all hazards. He did so without molestation, for while he was removing the broken remnant of his army, the Confederate forces were engaged in beating the fresh troops of the North.

We grant that McClellan's loss had been almost incredible. We think it far from improbable that he did not lead back to the Northern capital half the troops with which he entered Virginia. Thousands had deserted, thousands had been captured, thousands had been maimed and wounded; the killed, too, were counted by thousands; and those who died from disease were more than the loss by all other casualties. We have no reason to suppose that he did not do all that was possible for the health of his army; and if next year or any succeeding year a Northern army remains in Virginia during the heat of summer that fair land will be to it a charnel house. The Southern climate is a formidable obstacle to the Northern invader.

From the moment McClellan left the peninsula his movements, and indeed the whole campaign, were directed by General Halleck. It is impossible to blind ourselves to the determined hostility of Halleck to a general who was beloved by his army, and who in misfortune, and despite ceaseless and acrimonious party attacks, was still trusted by the people. Even in the West, where Halleck lost 40,000 or 50,000 men, and did nothing but take possession of Corinth after it had been evacuated by General Beauregard, and capture two negroes and a few dogs, he did not blunder so grossly as in Virginia. All his arrangements were out of time and place. His purpose was to mass together the Federal armies and to make McClellan play the part of a general of a division. The Confederates spoilt the plan. Wherever Pope encamped to await the arrival of McClellan he was attacked and forced to withdraw. The junction was not effected until the army under Pope had been routed, and the five Federal armies that had operated in Virginia were behind the fortifications of Washington—broken, dispirited, and disorganized. Halleck could not repair the mischief he had done, and nothing remained but to restore to McClellan the command of which he had been hastily deprived. Once more, with signal success, McClellan organized an army from broken regiments and new levies, and this time with marvellous rapidity. His intention was no doubt to remain before Washington until the fresh troops came in, and the army was in a proper state of discipline and amply equipped. The enemy forced him to abandon his design. The Confederates entered Maryland, and threatened Pennsylvania. McClellan saw his danger, and did his best to meet it. It was better to risk the loss of Harper's Ferry than allow the enemy to operate without molestation in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and so cut off the communication between the West and the North. Those who condemn McClellan for not protecting Harper's Ferry, as well as confronting the Confederates in Maryland, forget that, with the whole of his available force, he did not gain a decisive victory, though the Southern troops were not half as numerous; and that at Antietam his army was so badly used that he could not renew the engagement, though the Confederates remained in his front.

With the Maryland campaign it may be said the military career of McClellan, at least for the present, ends. He was not strong enough to prevent General Stuart's Pennsylvania incursion, or to molest the return of the gallant troop laden and cumbered with booty. McClellan needed supplies for his army; and according to Halleck's account, they were in the depots or on the rivers. This is a question of fact we cannot decide, though we incline to think McClellan would not have been urgent for stores if stores had been within his reach. General Halleck's report on this matter, though dated the 28th of October, was, in our opinion, written after the 4th of November, and is marked by that disregard for truth for which Halleck is notorious. Day after day McClellan was urged to advance, and at last was peremptorily ordered to cross the Potomac, and give the enemy battle, or drive him South. Possibly Halleck forgot that real victories are not so easy as paper victories; but McClellan refused to sacrifice the army for the sake of an electioneering dodge. He did, however, advance cautiously, and laboured zealously to increase the efficiency of his army. On November 7, at 11 o'clock at night, without any previous warning, he received an order to transfer his command to General Burnside. He did not, perhaps, anticipate the further insult of General Halleck's published correspondence, but the mode of his dismissal was in itself sufficiently irritating and insulting. If he felt any resentment it did not interfere with his duty, and he forthwith gave up a command which, so long as he held it, would have enabled him to defy the power of the decrepid and tottering Government. In violating the Constitution he would have been following in the footsteps of Mr. Lincoln; and there are those who think he would have done his country good service in refusing to obey the command of the President; but he pursued the plain path of duty, and by his last official act set an example of obedience to the law and Constitution worthy of his fame as a brave, though unfortunate, soldier.

The Press of the Confederate States.

The Southern press, like that of England, is representative. It does not seek to make, but to feed and direct public opinion. Still, it is not a mere delegate, but exercises a controlling influence over that which gives it power and vitality. When a member of it ceases to be representative its influence is gone; so long as it is representative its influence is nearly dictatorial. In this country we have seen newspapers lose their authority and die because they have abused their constitutional functions, and have endeavoured to impose their special views upon their readers. A political journal, both here and in the South, is placed in a position analogous to that of an equity judge, who must expound, not make, the law, and who yet by his exposition exercises a legislative influence. In France and in Germany the journalist has been regarded as a maker of opinions rather than as a mere exponent of them; and the articles that appear in French and German papers, although remarkable for ability, erudition and brilliancy, are didactic. In the United States a newspaper, when it ceases to be a mere news sheet, becomes the mouthpiece of individual demagogues or theorists, or of the views of the chiefs of a party or faction. We naturally think the English and Southern system is the best, but we do not therefore infer that it would be well to apply it in France and Germany. We have no faith in the political quackery which assumes that which is good for one nation must be good for all nations.

The war has stopped a large number of local papers in the South, and which, from the specimens we have seen, bear a close resemblance to our local papers; that is to say, anything approaching to literary excellence is ingeniously borrowed from other journals, and the original matter consists of local gossip and terrific storms in a local teacup. The war has also, by making paper and labour scarce, obliged the principal journals to decrease in size, but their main features are the same as formerly. There are one or two leaders, which are digests of events and opinions, but which are generally more condensed than those which appear in London papers. Besides the leaders, there are numerous "editorials," which announce important events, or are comments on events, in which much is said in a few words. The bulk of the matter is news—reports of Congress, public meetings, law proceedings, events social, literary, and domestic, and the innumerable occurrences that people ought or wish to be informed of. Advertisements occupy considerable space, for in the Confederate States, as in England, the commercial prosperity of a paper greatly depends upon its advertising patronage.

The majority of the first-class Southern journals are old-established, but they are as vigorous as the youngest of their contemporaries. Each of them is distinguished by a special character, and we propose to shortly explain the pretensions and policy of the principal daily journals, so that our readers may be better able to appreciate the opinions of the Southern press when they are quoted in English papers. We do not mean that any of the opinions are unworthy of attention, for they are always representative; but their value much depends upon the peculiar character of the journal. If, for instance, a paper supporting the Government intimated in an editorial that there was a prospect of peace, such an intimation would be entitled to much more consideration than if it had appeared in a paper opposed to the Government. On the other hand, there are a number of questions on which the dictum of an opposition journal is of more authority than that of a Government organ. We confine our attention to the daily press, mainly because the Southern weekly papers are made up from the daily issues, and what they lack in originality is compensated for by their comprehensiveness.

The oldest paper in the Confederate States is the Richmond Inquirer. Twenty-five years ago, under the editorship of Mr. Ritchie, who was regarded as the father of the Southern press, the Inquirer obtained a reputation which it has not yet lost, and that entitles it to be looked upon as the leading journal of the South. It has always been consistently democratic, but it has never been so extreme in its views as to make it the organ of that section of the party which thinks that it is better to have no Government at all than to have a Government that does not practically endorse its ultra opinions. The Inquirer represents that great division of the party which, without compromising any essential principle, is ready to submit to the inexorable exigencies of expediency. The Inquirer is conducted with great ability; its articles are distinguished no less by their literary merit than by their practical efficiency. It is very careful in its statements, and avoids giving the stamp of its authority to unauthenticated reports. It reproduces current rumours and ou dits, but in such a manner that its readers will not give them credit because of their publication in its columns. The Inquirer supports the present Government; but not as the Morning Herald supports the Conservative party, or as the Morning Post is reputed to represent the views of Lord Palmerston; and its support of the Confederate Government does not bear the slightest resemblance to the official connection existing between the Moniteur and the French Government. The best analogy we can think of is the support which the Times accords to the Palmerston Ministry; though, of course, the war in which the Confederate States is engaged renders the connection between the Government and its supporters closer though not less independent.

The Richmond Whig is the opponent of the Inquirer. As its name implies, it was formerly the organ of the Whig party, and rather leaned to centralization in place of a strict observance of State Rights. Since secession, its views have changed, and, like all converts, its zeal is somewhat indiscreet. At present, it is more democratic than the democratic Inquirer. It watches with the utmost jealousy the powers and the conduct of the Confederate Government, and advocates restrictions that would make the Executive powerless and useless. The Whig is placed in an annoying position. It finds those in office to whom it has been utterly opposed, and yet it has adopted their principles. If the Whig is somewhat factious in its opposition, it has on all great questions adopted a fair and patriotic course. As against the common enemy, the Whig is as much a supporter of the Government as the Inquirer, and at this moment its sharpest criticisms have reference to the conduct of the war, which it thinks should be more energetic and uncompromising; but they are not very telling, because success is an unanswerable rejoinder to its fault-finding.

The Richmond Examiner is the Ishmael of the Southern press, so far as it is against everybody. All parties, all men, and we may add, all measures, are in turn censured in the Examiner. In nine cases out of ten the censure is undeserved, but the articles are almost invariably written with wit and smartness. Clever young men who have to make their mark, or clever men who have failed to make their mark, naturally vent their spleen in the Examiner, and when there is some ground for censure, no paper is more calculated to bring about a redress of the grievance or abuse. There are many points of resemblance between the Richmond Examiner and its brilliant and censorious English namesake.

The Richmond Dispatch does not profess any political creed, and is, in fact, a cheap newspaper, its selling price being two cents, or about one penny. It is conscientious in giving its readers a good pennyworth. It is printed in very small type, so that the quantity of two pages of our Times is compressed into a single page of the Dispatch. It enjoys a large circulation, and in the selection of its matter consults the taste and requirements of the masses.

The Charleston Courier is so like the Richmond Inquirer in its policy and conduct that we need only observe its circulation is large and its influence considerable, not only in its own State, but in other States. The Charleston Mercury is almost rabid on the question of State Rights, and this will be readily understood when we remark that at the time of secession this journal opposed the formation of a Confederate Government, and suggested in lieu thereof a kind of Diet, to which was to be delegated rather less authority than is enjoyed by the German Diet. Since the establishment of the Government the Mercury, though vehement in opposition to its acts and policy, has not, in its advocacy of State Rights, real or imaginary, assaulted the Confederate Constitution.

The Mobile Register is one of the best known and most frequently quoted papers in the Confederacy. It is eminent for its literary ability, for the extent and reliability of its information, for its political moderation and thorough independence. It supports the Government, but not so closely as the Inquirer or Courier. If there is any fault to find, it gives expression to its discontent without hesitation. Perhaps, it is this exceeding frankness which makes it a valuable adherent of the Government. During the last Presidential election for the late United States the Register was the principal organ of the Douglas party. The Augusta Constitutionalist is democratic, an independent supporter of the Government, and was also a staunch advocate of the Douglas candidature. Neither of these journals were for secession, until the election of Mr. Lincoln made secession inevitable.

It is unnecessary to extend this list, as we have now referred to those journals which are most frequently quoted in the English papers, and we believe that to some this brief account of the press in the Confederate States will make such quotations more intelligible and instructive than they have hitherto been. We may, in conclusion, observe that in the South the press is not only free, but its freedom is abundantly used. Every act of Government and Congress is canvassed without the slightest hesitation. Such liberty would have been impossible in a revolution. To a revolution, the free expression of adverse opinion is death. The Confederate States did not revolt, but in secession exercised a constitutional right. The Southerners regard the present struggle as a foreign, not a civil war; hence, agreeing that the enemy shall be opposed to the last man and the last dollar, they feel there is no reason for sacrificing their political liberty. In opposing secession by war the North played a revolutionary part, and the result has been the loss of Northern liberty, as exemplified in the press being gagged, the Constitution trampled under foot, the law despised, and the State prisons filled with political suspects. We could not desire better evidence of the healthy political and social condition of the Confederate States than the disunity of the Confederate press on affairs that do not concern the defence of Southern independence and Southern territory against the efforts of the North to crush the one and possess itself of the other.

England and the Emperor.

In journalism, as in war, the attack has the advantage over the defence; it is easier, more pleasant, and generally more spirited and more effectual. But this general rule hardly suffices to account for the peculiarly unfortunate position in which the Emperor of the French is so often placed. No living man is so bitterly and forcibly abused; no eminent man is so very ill defended. At this moment Napoleon III. is the mark of frantic vituperation in England, of suppressed execration, low murmurs, or outspoken reproach, in Italy; of brilliant though covert sarcasm in France; and neither in England nor in Italy can he be said to have any warm defenders; while in France the journals which are really friendly to his person, his dynasty, or his Ministers, have lost all influence with educated men, from the universal belief that they are paid for their advocacy. In his own country the Emperor was unfortunate to alienate at first the whole existing journalistic talent; he came to the head of affairs by a counter-revolution, after a revolution in which the press had played a considerable part. The reaction was, in no small degree, a reaction against the anarchical tendencies of French journalism—against the poetic imbecility of Lamartine, the socialist insanity of Ledru-Rollin, the regime of clever editors and smart newspaper contributors, who were prepared at any moment to sacrifice society to a theory, and order to a dream. The defeated party, of course, never forgave this second revolution de meprise; and the journalists of higher character and more sober views were unfortunately, through the French system, which forbids the anonyne, pledged irrevocably to the cause of one or the other of the parties overthrown by the emete of February. The Moderates were devoted to the House of Orleans; the Conservatives to the cause of Henri V. Therefore, while nine-tenths of the upper and middle classes in France accepted the Empire with satisfaction, as the restoration of order and security—while ninety-nine in a hundred of the peasantry hailed it as the renovation of the glorious traditions which surround the memory of the first Napoleon—the most respected statesmen in France stood obstinately aloof, and the French press devoted all its talent to annoy and injure, if it could not undermine, the man who, in bringing back peace to France, had crushed out the hopes of those who would have plunged her once more into civil war in order to bring back the Republic, the Orleans family, or the older Bourbons. Nine-tenths of the literary talent of France belongs to the Liberal party; and the one intelligible principle of that party—the one dogma to which it has always been faithful—is hatred to the Emperor. The French Liberals have, since 1852, been in turn Anglophobists and Anglomaniacs, Piedmontists, and Papists: they have sympathized in turn with despotism and with revolution; with English liberty, with American equality, with Garibaldian anarchy, with Austrian tyranny—they have, in fact, embraced at each moment the cause of that country, doctrine, or institution to which the Emperor was supposed to be hostile. Against the phalanx of unprincipled talent thus arrayed against them, the Imperialists had nothing to oppose, except the peremptory dicta of “M. Communique,” and the fluent indiscretion of M. de la Guéronnière. If, indeed, the Emperor were to advocate his own cause with his own hand, he might prove a match for his adversaries; and the few pamphlets ascribed to his immediate “inspiration” have effectually served their purpose; but when he is obliged to rely on the Moniteur and the Constitutionnel against the Journal des Debats and the Revue des deux Mondes, we can hardly wonder if M. de Persigny sometimes declines the unequal combat, and substitutes warnings for replies.

English journalists have hardly behaved better than their French brethren. They have been almost as unfair, and not nearly so consistent. They have judged the Emperor without the least regard to the difficulties of his position and the necessities of France, simply according to their own prejudices and partialities. When his action has happened to suit their views, they have condoned even the destruction of a republic; when he has deviated from the course they would have marked out for him, they cannot forgive him even the punishment of a libeller. In 1852 he was a traitor, a scoundrel, an imbecile, a very Satan; in 1855 he was a great, magnanimous, and loyal ally; in 1857 he was a man whom it was a duty to assassinate; in 1859 he was a hero, and had he but taken Mantua and liberated Venice, he could have expected nothing less than an apotheosis from the philo-Italian press in England. Now they cannot find epithets to convey their abhorrence of his character and his conduct; not only has he been guilty of the crime of refusing to yield to the menaces of Garibaldi that which he had refused to the dignified reclamations of Count Cavour, the stern protests of Ricasoli, the subtle flattery of Ratazzi, but he has actually dared to desire the termination of the war in America otherwise than by the complete triumph of the North, and the appointment of General Butler as Governor-General of the South, with McNeil as his Provost-Marshal. Words fail some of our contemporaries when they would express the feelings with which they read the despatches of M. Drouyn de Lhuys upon the Roman and the American questions; and every accusation that has ever been made against the “Man of December” is now raked up again, and found too feeble.

The Conservative press is more just to the Emperor now, as it generally has been; but Conservatives are never very warm defenders of a foreign potentate. They are too jealous of their country's dignity to be lavish of eulogy on a Prince whose Government divides with hers the supremacy in strength and influence throughout the world; and too exclusively English in their views thoroughly to understand the position and policy of a Sovereign whose administration, if not his character, is so completely French. It is hardly to be wondered at, therefore, that the Emperor is not always popular in England. In Germany the heir to the memories of Jena and Austerlitz could never expect to be a favourite; to Italy, the Sovereign whose troops maintain the Pontiff on his throne cannot but be for the moment somewhat obnoxious.

And yet it would be hard to say what right any of these countries have to complain of Napoleon III. He has never committed any act of aggression against Germany—whether he would have done so or not had Austria forborne to cross the Ticino, no one now can say. He has—we say it advisedly—behaved loyally to England. It is said that the ready acknowledgment of his title by the British Government, and his friendly reception by the Queen, have deeply impressed him, and that, as a matter of feeling even more than as a principle of policy, he is anxious to preserve, under all circumstances, a friendly understanding with the country. Certainly he has acted as if such were his purpose. Twice only has his Government behaved discourteously to ours; once when the French people were driven frantic by the outrage of the Rue Lepelletier, and once when their sensitive vanity was wounded by the seizure of a French ship—an alleged slaver—by the Portuguese authorities. In the former case, we believe that both the publication of the vulgar impertinence of the French colonels, and the offensive despatch which led to the overthrow of Lord Palmerston's Government, were merely Ministerial blunders, for which the Emperor was no more answerable than Queen Victoria is responsible for the despatches of her present Foreign Secretary. For the too peremptory dealing of the French Government with “our ancient and faithful ally,” there can be no other excuse than such as may be found in the significant fact that England declined to interfere. But against these two faults, during a friendship of ten years, we have to set a course of unvarying frankness and fair dealing. We do not except the annexation of Savoy and Nice. That was, no doubt, a wrong towards Italy, Switzerland, and Europe. But it was not treacherously done. England knew the consequences of persisting in her attempt to unite the North of Italy in defiance of the Treaty of Villafranca. The Emperor considered that French policy, French interests, or French prejudices, demanded that if a Power of the second-rate rank were created on her south-eastern frontier, she should receive some compensation. And he had thus much of reason on his side—that a united Italy, becoming, as she one day must become, a sixth great Power, would certainly check and limit the Continental supremacy of France and her power in the Mediterranean. Lord Russell might be perfectly justified in resisting the annexation; but when he endeavoured to represent it as a surprise and an act of treachery he did that which was unjustifiable.

The naval armaments of France are represented as insidious aggressions on England, and they are, no doubt, the cause of great uneasiness and necessary expense to us. But even here there has been perfect openness. It has suited the views of Napoleon III. to make France a great naval Power. We think he has missed his way; there are very able Frenchmen who think so too. But he had a perfect right to make the attempt, and we had no right to remonstrate, nor to revile him in Ministerial papers and Ministerial explanations, as if his iron-sides were preparing for a sudden attack on Portsmouth. Our Ministry have always known what he was doing. Our Admiralty might, if they would, have built two ships for one. Nay, we are credibly informed that the Emperor himself has frequently remarked on the necessity that they should do so; has declared that the stronger England makes herself the more impossible an invasion becomes—the better for his policy, of which peace with England is the corner-stone. He is quite right. An English war might be the ruin of his dynasty; but an English war will never be altogether out of the minds of the French nation until they see that it would end, not in avenging, but in renewing, Waterloo and Trafalgar.

In his American policy, the loyalty of Napoleon III. is unimpeachable. He has been so anxious to act only in concert with England that he has subordinated his policy to hers, as the country most deeply interested. He has refused to recognize the Confederate States only because England declined to join in such a step. He has abstained from intervention only because England, or rather the English Ministry, recoiled from intervention. Until lately his communications have been so strictly secret that the English Ministerial journals have ventured to assert that France was not ready for recognition or mediation, and that the policy of Lord Russell received not merely the support, but the full approval of the Imperial Government. Now, at last, the Emperor has spoken his mind in a despatch which the English Cabinet could not mistake; the latter refuse their co-operation; and still their ally allows his policy to wait on theirs.

But it is the Italian policy of Napoleon III. which has most perplexed impartial observers, and which has provoked most abuse. We do not pretend to fathom the depths of Imperial reserve, or to solve the riddles of apparent inconsistency and irresolution in one of the most resolute and clear-sighted of modern statesmen; we do not pretend to explain the Peace of Villafranca or the protection accorded to Gaeta; but we believe that the clue to the greater part of the Italian policy of France may be given in two words; the Emperor sympathizes with Italy, and he dreads the revolution. His Italian sympathies, the relics of the days when he was himself a Carbonaro, have led him to drive the Austrians from Lombardy, Tuscany, and the Legations; his dread of the revolution prompted him to discountenance the Garibaldian invasion of Sicily and Naples, and to maintain the Pope in possession of the patrimony of St. Peter. In reference to the French occupation of Rome, there can be no doubt that the policy of England has done harm, though it would, perhaps, have been wiser of M. Drouyn d'Lhuys to omit all allusion to the opposition of a friendly Power. The interference of a Protestant Government in that question ought to have been most cautious, delicate, and unassuming. England could not allow herself to be set aside entirely; she could not permit the Catholic Powers to arrogate to themselves an exclusive jurisdiction between the liberties of a great nation and the rights of the Head of Catholic Christendom; but she ought to bear in mind the peculiar position which she occupies as the first and most anti-Papal of Protestant countries, and to have carefully avoided any affront to the national vanity or religious susceptibilities of France. We fear that Lord Russell has been dictatorial and unobservant; that he has manifested a spirit of hostility to the Pope which was sure to awaken the suspicions of Catholics, and assumed a tone which could not but wound the sensitive jealousy of the French nation. If it be, as many think it is, the fact that Napoleon cannot quit Rome because France would never forgive him for doing so, perhaps the English Government is mainly answerable for the prolonged subjection of the Romans. The point was one which required gentle and tender handling; it has been entrusted to a Minister who is not celebrated for diplomatic tact and discretion.

The Kingdom of Greece.

Beyond the gratification of the sentiment of nationality, the Greeks have yet gained little by throwing off the Mussulman yoke. Life and property have been little more secure under the guardianship of Greek Representative Chambers than under the rule of Turkish Pachas; justice has been about as arbitrary and corrupt; public works have been quite as much neglected; the cultivator of the soil has had the same good reasons to abstain from all attempts to increase its productiveness. The intellect and energy of the country have sought a field abroad, just as when the Sultan's tyranny barred it against them at home. In the way of positive benefits we can find little more than the license again given to the Athenians to talk of "some new thing," and the liberty given to every man to try to rob, under pretence of patriotism, his fellow-countrymen. The Greeks, however, tell us that all this disappointment and all their shortcomings are no fault of the nation; they are all chargeable to the man to whom the great Powers of Europe committed the sovereignty of their country. This incubus they have, at last, thrown off; and henceforth liberty and progress are to hover hand in hand, as its tutelary deities, over the land of their birth. So be it, but the promise is one which we may rather hope than expect to see fulfilled.

In the most critical moment of its life and death struggle for independence, Greece, so far from being united in its efforts against the foe, was distracted by party feuds. The strangers who, inflamed by the memories of Old Greece, rushed to the classic land, to aid its modern inhabitants in their struggle, were, one and all, disgusted by the jealousies and intrigues in which its chiefs were incessantly engaged, the one against the other. The nation was tired of a republic, and would have abandoned it even if the intervening Powers had not allowed it to be clearly understood that they wished to see the new State enter the family of nations in the usual orthodox manner of a kingdom—and, as if to express this sentiment unmistakably, the President, Capo d'Istrias, was removed by assassination. Whatever may have been the faults of King Otho, the protecting Powers cannot fairly be blamed for their advice. Their task was a difficult one; and that they consulted the interests of Greece is shown by their offer of the crown to the present King of the Belgians. He wisely refused it; and the Powers, after his refusal—the second—did, perhaps, the best thing they could in selecting Prince Otho. His youth, in one respect, no doubt, a drawback, may in another have been considered an advantage. It was desirable, above all things, that the new King should know the language, and, if possible, imbibe the sentiments, adopt the customs, and share the aspirations of his people. With a youth of eighteen, there was yet time for all this education; and perhaps, but for the stipulations made in the treaty about a regency, Otho might have secured himself a place in the hearts of his subjects. He was cordially received by them; but the system of government introduced by the Bavarian Regency which ruled the country until June 1835, framed upon German bureaucratic models, was but ill-adapted to the circumstances of Greece. Unhappily, too, the King, upon his own assumption of power, retained the system and the advisers who had established it. The Greeks, governed by a highly centralized system worked by foreigners, possessing no constitutional control over their King, grew more and more impatient; and at last, by the most bloodless of all revolutions, not even excepting their own last, compelled the King, in September 1843, to exile the Bavarians, call a Ministry which they named to power, and convoke a National Assembly to prepare a Constitution. The Constitution was duly enacted, and was in force up to the day of the King's dethronement. It was as liberal in its terms as a paper Constitution usually is. It provided a Chamber of Deputies elected by the people, and a Senate named by the King; it guaranteed free speech and all usual liberties given by constitutional charters; gave, in fact, a constitutional Government, in which the people had, nominally at least, the power which the people of England and Belgium possess.

From March 30, 1844, the sins of the Greeks, therefore, must be on their own heads. Up to that time they were very much at the mercy of their King. From that time he has been at their mercy any time they have liked to use legal power. But the Government of Greece, instead of getting better since 1844, has rather got worse. The Greeks explain this by accusing the King of a wholesale system of corruption. Otho, however, could not have bought electors and deputies, if such had not been ready to sell themselves. Greek politics have, in fact, been nothing but a scramble for places. One party has been as bad as another. The interests of the country have been entirely lost sight of by the leaders in the promotion of their own interests, and they have not scrupled to attempt that promotion by making themselves, not only the tools of the King, but the tools of English, French, and Russian Ambassadors. In 1854 the King was placed in the difficulty of having to choose between the friendship of France and England, and the loyalty of his people. Greece was in a ferment of enthusiasm for its "great idea." It believed that the moment had come to establish the Greek Empire at Constantinople, and without waiting for Russia to begin the war, the Greeks, with the concurrence and assistance of the Greek Government, raised the standard of revolt in the Greek provinces of Turkey. King Otho was extremely popular; but Turkey remonstrated, and when the Government neglected to attend to her remonstrances, England and France intervened, and guaranteed the neutrality of Greece by occupying the Piræus. The disappointment of the Greeks was intense, and with the humiliation of the King vanished altogether his popularity. He has never had since a gleam of it.

The great question which has since been busying him and his people has been that of the succession. The Constitution of 1844 made this one alteration in the law of succession imposed in the treaty of 1832—that it required from the successor to the throne the adoption of the Greek faith. Prince Luitpold, the successor designated by the treaty, refused to abandon the Catholic faith, and so did his brother, Prince Adalbert. The King seems to have had some design of getting one of his nephews, a boy of seventeen, a son of Prince Luitpold, declared successor. But the Greeks have settled the difficulty in a much more radical manner. The discontent has gone on increasing. The people do not seem to have asked whether the evils of which they complained were not in very large part due to their own indolence and cowardice. They identified the King with them. A few months ago a military insurrection at Nauplia, after long holding its ground, was suppressed, and to foreign observers the King seemed seated securely enough on his throne. But it was not so; a conspiracy was at work throughout the army and the educated classes generally; nay, it is said, was not unknown to some of the Ministry. The King suspected nothing, however, and left Athens on the 13th of October, with the Queen, for a triumphal progress through the Peloponnesus. That day week the news arrived at Athens of a military insurrection at Vanitza; the next day came the intelligence that a Provisional Government had been proclaimed at Patras. Athens was all excitement, but no one seemed bold enough to move. At last, on the Wednesday night, with loud firing of guns and pistols, the insurrection began. By a most curious combination of chances it met with no resistance, and the next morning a Provisional Government, appointed by itself, proclaimed that the reign of King Otho had ceased, that the Regency of the Queen (provided in the Constitution of 1844) was abolished; and promised that a National Assembly should be immediately convoked to settle the basis of the new Government. The same evening the dethroned King arrived at the Piræus. Four-and-twenty hours earlier he would probably have saved his crown; as it was, he did not take long to make up his mind. He accepted his fate, and sailed away the next morning in a British vessel; not sorry, in all probability, to be relieved of a crown which could never have been a comfortable one. This prompt departure of the King removed all difficulties from the way of the insurrection. If the King accepted it, Europe could have nothing to say against it, and the Greeks were therefore left, by common consent, to the arduous task of settling the basis of the new Government.

The National Assembly has been convoked; its composition is, perhaps, open to much criticism—with respect, for instance, to the suffrage given to Greeks abroad, but that is a question which must be left to the Greeks themselves; and so leaving it, Europe has taken upon itself to settle, so far as public opinion can do it, the basis of the new Government. The Greeks are to have another King; they are to try monarchy again, and see if they can choose better for themselves than the great Powers did for them; and the work of the National Assembly will be to elect him. A host of candidates have been put forward, not by the Greeks, but by their kind friends in Europe; but at present the only two who are talked about as possessing the slightest chance are Prince Alfred of England, and the Duke de Leuchtenberg; both candidates whose pretensions are decidedly barred by the protocol of 1830, if that protocol is to be considered still in force. In that protocol England, France, and Russia renounced for themselves the elevation of any member of their reigning families to the throne of Greece. Whether that protocol is equally now binding we will not inquire. If it is, Prince Alfred and the Duke de Leuchtenberg, the grandson of Czar Nicholas, and, by order of an Imperial ukase, adopted in the Russian Royal Family, and styled a Romanowski, are both excluded. But the Greeks may say, probably will say, that protocol does not pro-

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee nation. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.
The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European Journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.
Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.
We will soon appoint agents in each important seaport and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The movements in Virginia are important, but whether they will lead to any great battles is not certain. Possibly, General Burnside may at the last moment assume a defensive position, and give up the attempt to advance against Richmond. He has now abandoned the Warrenton and Gordonsville line of operation, moved to Aquia Creek, and at the last accounts had demanded the surrender of Fredericksburg. General Sumner notified the Mayor that if the city was not surrendered in sixteen hours he would shell it. The municipality rejoined that the city would not be surrendered, and justly complained of the short time allowed for the removal of the women and children. It is reported that General Longstreet was encamped outside Fredericksburg, and was prepared to defend the city. If this is so, it will be the first time the Federals have anticipated the intention of their enemy.

The South is prepared for the advance of Burnside, and in some quarters it is expected. The Richmond Dispatch says:—

Once more the Yankee nation is evidently essaying an "On to Richmond" march. McClellan, who had seen the elephant on that "journey of death," was unwilling to go about it with the haste the Abolitionists now deem indispensable to mend their fortunes and modify their fate from utter ruin. He was ordered to go ahead; but for reasons which he has not yet made public he would not. Abolitionism determined at once upon his disgrace, and he was disgraced. He was not even permitted to follow Pope to the Northern Siberia and fight the Indians, but he was sent to the "Jarsies" to pine in inaction and impotency. McClellan having gone off, his successor at once proceeds, no doubt, to cut the capers Abolitionism demands of him. He has been moving about with a view, no doubt, to the indispensable advance. His plans are not yet fully developed to us here; but we take it for granted that the astute military chieftains who have heretofore foiled abler men have watched him with their eagle eyes, and know by this pretty well what he is after. The reported withdrawal from the Rappahannock front, and the advance upon Fredericksburg, resembles McClellan's spring campaign, and it is not improbable that the pending "on to Richmond" may be in a great degree an imitation of that, with the variation that there shall be a combined land and river attack upon our defences at Drewry's Bluff. Whatever be the plan of the new leader, who is the fourth to undertake the Herculean task, there can be little doubt that he means to endeavour to succeed, or lose his official head before Christmas. On our side the enemy cannot please us better than by going ahead with the war. It is the long and wearying hours of inaction in camp that wears out the health and spirits of the brave Confederate soldiers. Let the enemy come on with his invasion, and push his columns to the attack. He will be met, and, putting our trust in God and our good cause we will defeat him. We cannot but believe that the General who has lent himself to the Abolitionists of the North, and undertakes to pursue the war of rapine and barbarity in the spirit pleasing to them, is destined to discomfiture and disgrace, and to follow his predecessors to the Hades of lost reputations, and that event will be hastened just as he may choose to hasten his own movements.

The Federal army is on the north bank of the Rappahannock, the Confederates are on the left bank, prepared, it is said, to dispute the passage. If the Federals should take Fredericksburg, and cross the Rappahannock, they will still be sixty miles from Richmond, and will have to advance by roads that are represented to be in an almost impassable condition from the heavy rains that have fallen.

The movements of General "Stonewall" Jackson are still mysterious. He is supposed to be in Burnside's rear, and it is considered possible that he may find his way into Maryland, so that whilst the Army of the Potomac is moving towards Richmond, he may invade Pennsylvania. The change of the base of operations does not inspire much confidence in New York. The Herald hints that whilst trying to capture Richmond, Washington ought to be protected from the Confederates. It is quite possible that the Confederate army may get nearer to Washington than the Federal army will to Richmond.

The reported occupation of the gaps in the Blue Ridge Mountain is now supposed to be unfounded, though the publication thereof was authorized by the War Department.

General Fitz-John Porter has been replaced in the command of the 5th Army Corps by General Hooker.

The Federals made an attack on St. Mary's, Georgia. Being unable to land, they destroyed the town by the aid of their gunboats. If this system of destroying Southern towns is continued it will call for reprisals. Such acts of brutality do not further the operations of war.

Some of General McClellan's staff officers were arrested, upon the pretext of their absence from duty without leave; but they have since been released, the Government probably finding that it was not quite strong enough to carry out its hostility to the Democratic party with too high a hand.

General McClellan has been enthusiastically received in New York. He was serenaded at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and addressed a great concourse of people. His speech is said to have been unimportant.

It is reported that "a brisk engagement has occurred above Brashear City, up the River Teche, in Louisiana, between Federal gunboats and Confederate gunboats, assisted by batteries on shore. Both combatants received considerable damage." When the North admits damage on both sides it generally means a Confederate victory.

The Federal fleet lately in the Gulf of Mexico has returned to the Mississippi.

It is stated in the Republican journals that Mr. Lincoln, in his forthcoming Message to Congress, will reiterate and reargue his Emancipation policy, both as regards slavery in the Border States and the liberation of the slaves in all States that may be in rebellion on the 1st of January. He will not convert many people to the opinion that to attempt a servile war in the South is profitable and expedient as a military measure. It is reported in Washington that President Davis intends to meet the proclamation with severe reprisals, and the report is, no doubt, thoroughly correct.

Police Superintendent Kennedy is being tried in New York for his illegal imprisonment of Mrs. Brinsmade. We elsewhere give the correspondence that has been published in reference to this disgraceful affair.

The hatred to England is not allowed to cool in the North. The New York Times says: "The time will come when America will enforce reparation from England for the Alabama's depredations. The most effectual cure for sectional heartburnings will be a foreign war for a year or two. England has done all she can to break down America in her day of agony, and America will hate England for it till the last American now living goes to his grave." We need no assurances of Northern ill-will, for that is a point on which there is no doubt.

Mr. Lincoln has issued an order enjoining the observance of the Sabbath in the army and navy. Would it not be as well if this was followed by an order against the brutality of such men as Butler and McNeil?

General Butler has issued the following orders:—

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf, New Orleans, Nov. 1.

General Orders, No. 87.—1. No pass to go beyond the lines of this army, in any direction, will be respected by any officer or soldier, unless it bear the personal signature of the Commanding General of this department.

2. All persons of the age of sixteen and upwards, coming within the lines will be held as spies, unless they take the oath of allegiance to the United States, or show that they are neutral aliens; and all persons whatsoever thus coming will immediately report themselves at the office of the Provost Marshal.

By command of Major-General BUTLER.

George C. Strong, A. A. General.

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf, New Orleans, Nov. 1.

General Orders, No. 88.—1. No person will be arrested as slave by any policeman or other person, and put in confinement for safe keeping, unless the person arresting knows that such person is owned by a loyal citizen of the United States.

2. The Inspector and Superintendent of Prisons is authorized to discharge from confinement all slaves not known to be the slaves of loyal owners.

By command of Major-General BUTLER.

George C. Strong, A. A. General.

By the first, all persons, male or female, above the age of 16, are virtually threatened with death, unless they commit perjury by taking the oath of allegiance to the United States; and by the second, the slaves of "disloyal" owners are to be free to do as they like—they are not to be arrested or kept in confinement.

The strikes for higher wages in the North are becoming more general. In most cases the demands of the workpeople are conceded.

In another part of our impression we have reproduced the memorial of the New York merchants and firms to Congress, in reference to Mr. Chase's financial system; and we have discussed this document in our leader columns.

The Alabama continues to terrify New York, and much disgust is expressed that she is not captured. The Federal Secretary of the Navy does not find it an easy task to effect the capture, but from time to time expresses his conviction that the Alabama will be taken "in a few days."

The Confederate Governor of North Carolina has declined to hold any conference with the Federal Governor; at the same time declaring that North Carolina would fight to the last drop of her blood. He very properly referred the Federal Governor to the Confederate authorities at Richmond.

France and Spain have made demands for reparation. A Washington despatch says:—

The French Government has demanded full and immediate indemnity for all injuries inflicted upon French citizens by General Butler, the immense armament now nearly ready at Marseilles being pointed to as the commentary on the diplomatic request. Our State Department, therefore, in announcing that there will be no difficulties leading to a rupture of relations, merely informs the French Minister in advance that it is ready to back down to any extent from General Butler's acts; and that no defence of that officer's conduct, and no adequate examination of the French complaints, will be made as a bar to this further effort to conciliate.

The Spanish Minister has addressed to our Government a demand for an apology for the burning of a vessel in Spanish waters by one of the ships of Admiral Farragut's fleet. This, act, it is complained, was made more heinous by insults to a Cuban magistrate, who remonstrated against this wrong done in a neutral port. Spain evidently thinks herself strong enough, and the United States weak enough, to justify her threats in case apology and reparation be not granted. The Spanish squadron now cruising in the Gulf might undoubtedly give trouble to the large fleet of our transport vessels which will soon, from all indications, be obliged to navigate that region. Looking at the course of France and Spain together, it would seem possible that the entente cordiale, broken by General Prim in Mexico, may be renewed in a more Northern latitude.

There is not the slightest doubt that the Federal Government will concede what is demanded, as it has hitherto done.

ENGLAND.

The chief subject of domestic interest during the last week has been the conviction of a number of garrotte robbers before the Central Criminal Court which has sentenced them to terms of penal servitude, varying from four years to life. Public feeling goes with the sentences, and strong indignation is expressed when it is hinted that the Home Secretary is likely to interpose the Royal prerogative of mercy in favour of these detested criminals. No one thinks Sir George Grey a very prudent Minister; but he is hardly supposed to be capable of an act so criminal and so outrageously silly. At all events, he will not venture on it at present; and before the time comes when he might dare to do it, he will probably have lost his power. These garrotte robberies are far worse than those which were formerly the terror of travellers on the highways. The old-fashioned robber demanded your money or your life, but never threatened the latter if the purse and watch were readily given up; the modern street-robber knocks you down or throttles you, breaks your jaw or your head, and then plunders you at his leisure. It has become positively unsafe to traverse any but the most constantly frequented thoroughfares after dark, and ladies have been assaulted and robbed even in the day-time. Not a day passes without two or three such robberies. If the sentences of the convicted scoundrels do not deter their comrades, Parliament will probably take up the subject. A strong feeling exists in favour of corporal punishment in such cases; and if maudlin philanthropy prevents its infliction by the law, we shall probably find men taking the matter into their own hands, and carrying arms in self-defence. And this would do much to put a stop to the garrotte robberies. If two or three villains are shot dead in the act, the practice will be more effectually checked than even by the wholesome process of flogging the garotters when convicted. For, at present, the chances of escaping identification and conviction are very great; but a pistol bullet finds no difficulty in apprehending its man, besides serving most effectually to identify him, if he should escape at the moment.

The distress in Lancashire is still on the increase. There are more paupers than last week by 12,000, the additional number being distributed as follows:—

Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	1,030	Oldham	2,170
Blackburn	770	Preston	610
Bolton	610	Rochdale	760
Bury	250	Salford	620
Chorley	300	Stockport	330
Chorlton	790	Todmorden	460
Glossop	50	Warrington	120
Haslingden	350	Wigan	90
Liverpool	460
Macclesfield	100	Total	12,240
Manchester	2,370

The whole number of out-door paupers is now over 265,000—above one-eighth of the population of the distressed districts. It may be said fairly that at least one-fourth of that population is dependent on alms, and that another fourth is almost destitute. The sufferers are somewhat more liberally treated now, the Relief Committees having exerted themselves vigorously to raise the scale to 2s. a head in the case of families, and 2s. 6d. a head for individuals. Rents are almost universally unpaid; and this bears hard on a very deserving class of men—saving mechanics or overlookers, who have built cottages, and perhaps mortgaged them for a part of the cost of building, and who now can get no rent, and yet must pay the interest on the mortgage, or sacrifice the property.

The Mansion-house Committee is doing its best. It has distributed within the last fortnight £70,000. Its total receipts have been about £220,000, and its total disbursements £160,000, irrespective of the large quantities of clothing which it has received, assorted, and sent out. The accumulation has lately been so great as to overwhelm their powers of dealing with it, and new arrangements for assortment and distribution have been required and carried out.

Some busybodies, animated by the spirit which inspires Mr. Kingsley, and those who labour with him to discourage public charity by abusing the millowners of Lancashire, have accused the Committee of investing the moneys received in the Funds, instead of distributing them at once. The truth is, that the Committee having—as it must have—a certain balance in hand, has employed this balance at seven days' call, instead of allowing it to be idle in the bank; thereby realizing a certain additional sum for its benevolent purposes, without diminishing or delaying the relief extended to the sufferers.

At the weekly meeting of the Central Executive Committee, on Monday, it appeared that up to the present time their whole receipts, actual or promised, amount to £370,000. It may be said, we believe, that the whole sum subscribed for the relief of the distress in Lancashire (exclusive of what has been privately done by individuals) does not fall far short of a million sterling, raised within less than twelve months, and the most of it within the last three months; and subscriptions still flow in. The following is Mr. Farnall's report:—

Manchester, Dec. 1.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report for the week ending the 22nd ult., on the 27 unions in the cotton manufacturing district, will show you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the numbers so relieved in the previous week, of 10,621 persons. There were, on the 22d ult., 259,385 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 53,206 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 206,179 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 387.5 per cent. The total weekly cost of out-door relief on the 22d ult. was £17,681 7s. 8d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2,604 16s. 1d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £15,076 11s. 7d., or 578 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions on the 22d ult. was 13.1; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.7. The average amount of out-door relief, both in kind and in money, per head per week in these unions, on the 22d ult., was 1s. 5d.½; the lowest was 1s. 0d.½, and the highest was 1s. 10d.½, at Glossop. Of the 259,385 persons receiving parochial relief on the 22d ult., 36,815 were old or infirm, 97,796 were able-bodied adults, and 124,774 were under 16 years of age. The following table gives the amount in the pound on the net rateable value (after deducting 25 per cent. for irrecoverable rates, empty property, &c.) which each union named in it would require to meet the cost of relief alone during one year, the calculations being based on the expenditure for the week ended the 22d ult.:—Ashton-under-Lyne, 11s. 4½d.; Blackburn, 7s. 7½d.; Burnley, 5s. 4½d.; Bury, 4s. 6d.; Glossop, 12s. 8½d.; Haslingden, 9s. 3½d.; Manchester (township), 5s. 8½d.; Oldham, 8s. 2½d.; Preston, 8s. 2d.; Rochdale, 6s. 5½d.; Stockport, 6s. 8½d.; Tormorden, 6s. 4½d.

The provisions, therefore, of Mr. Villiers' Act—the Union Relief Aid Act—will become, at Christmas next, a great and certain relief of an inexpensive and ready character to the ratepayers of the above unions, and probably also to the ratepayers of certain other unions, to which I need not further refer. I have received returns from the 78 local committees formed for the distribution of charitable aid in the cotton manufacturing districts, and I am enabled to state that these local committees are relieving weekly 172,010 persons who are not also receiving parochial relief from the guardians of the poor, and that the expenditure of the 78 local committees was last week £15,863 14s. The total number of persons, therefore, included in this report, who are either receiving parochial relief or are aided only by the charitable committees is 431,395, or 21.7 per cent. on the population of the unions adverted to in this report. The present total weekly expenditure by the guardians in out-relief and by the committees of charity is £33,545 1s. 8d., or 1s. 7½d. per week to each recipient.

I am, my Lords and Gentlemen, your obedient servant,
H. B. FARNALL, Special Commissioner.

Lord Vernon, who owns the whole parish of Poynton, has taken the relief of its population upon himself, for the present at least; and the local committee have therefore returned a grant received from the Mansion-house. Lord Vernon does well. The landowners of Lancashire have benefited enormously by its trade and industry, and they suffer less than any other class by the present calamity. It therefore behoves them to do all they can for its relief.

The Chairman of the Marsden Relief Committee (Mr. Farrer Ecroyd, from whose letter to the Times we last week gave the most salient passages), has also returned a grant of £200, saying that "while deeply sensible of the kind solicitude of the Mansion-house Committee, he does not at this moment think it right to retain the sum in question while grants from local resources are not yet exhausted, and may not be for some time to come. The assurance of your ever-ready aid enables us, however, to meet with confidence from week to week all cases of distress which the guardians of the poor cannot relieve. Though the distress here is not comparable to that in large and closely-packed towns, such as Blackburn and Stockport, it is great and disastrous enough, and had it not been for the high-minded manner in which the unemployed have exhausted their savings and their credit, before becoming willing to accept relief, for the aid tendered by private benevolence, and last, and noblest, for the help that was given by the poor to their still poorer neighbours, the demands upon us would have been many times larger."

A great county meeting, called by the Lord Lieutenant of Lancashire, filled the Manchester Town-Hall on Tuesday. The leading men of the county, and the leading merchants of Manchester and Liverpool, were present, and £50,000 was subscribed before the meeting broke up. Among the donors were—

The Earl of Derby spoke with his usual eloquence and felicity. Whether it be his duty to address a political or a social gathering, to crush a Parliamentary antagonist, or to inaugurate a ragged school, He began by dwelling with much force and pathos on the sufferings of the working-classes. He pointed to the sacrifices that had been demanded of them; how they had been compelled to expend the savings that had been the foundation of their hopes for themselves or for their children; then to part with their furniture, then with their clothing; and how, at last, when advised to apply for public or private alms, they would say, in their homely dialect, "Nay, but we'll clem first." [Starve.] He pointed out what had been the demands on the rate-payers; how rapidly the rates had risen, and how large was now their amount; ranging from the usual average of 1s. in the pound up to 7s., 9s., or 12s. per annum; and he reminded his hearers that these rates were levied on occupiers who could but just keep themselves above pauperism. He pointed out what Lancashire had done for herself; that the subscriptions within the county had realized already £400,000, and that many who did not subscribe were doing more than those who did. He gave a few instances, derived from private information, of what was being done by the much maligned millowners.

1. Nearly 3000 operatives out of work. Most of them are the hands of Messrs. —, and Mr. —, at his own cost, employs 555 girls in sewing five days a week, paying them 8d. per day; sends 76 youths, from 13 to 15, and 332 adults above 15, five days a week to school, paying them from 4d. to 8d. a day, according to age. He also pays the school pence of all the children. Mr. — has hitherto paid his people two days' wages a week; but he is now preparing a scheme like Mr. — to a great extent. I should add that in addition to wages Mr. — gives bread, soup, socks, and clogs.

2. Mr. — has, at his own expense, caused 50 or 60 dinners to be provided for sick persons every day.

3. Messrs. — are giving to their hands three days' wages, about £500 a week. Mr. — and Mr. — are giving their 130 hands, and Mr. — his 230 hands, two days' wages a week. I may mention that Messrs. — are providing for all their 1700 hands—(Cheers).

4. A great deal of private charity exists, one firm having spent £1400 in money, exclusive of weekly doles of bread.

5. Messrs. — are providing all their old hands with sufficient clothing and bedding to supply every want, so that their subscription is merely nominal.

6. The ladies of the village visit and relieve privately with money, food, and clothing, or all if needed urgently. In a few cases distress has been threatened, but generally the poor are living rent free.

7. Payment of rent is almost unknown. The agent for several landlords assures me that he could not from his receipts pay the property tax, but no distraints are made.

8. The bulk of the rents are not collected and distraints are unknown.

9. The millowners are chiefly cottage owners, and are asking for no rents, and sacrificing a large amount of income they had a right to count upon.

He acknowledged frankly and gratefully the liberality of all classes in England, from the Queen down to the "Shoeblack brigade," and concluded by expressing an earnest hope that no recourse to the national Exchequer would be necessary. Sir R. Gerard (the representative of one of the old Lancashire families) supported Lord Derby, and said that "poverty or no poverty, our well-behaved and deserving operatives must be supported with a liberal, kind, and merciful hand." Mr. Abel Heywood (formerly a Chartist agitator, now Mayor of Manchester) followed, remarking that Manchester alone had given nearly £100,000 towards the relief of the distress. Mr. Hutchinson said that Liverpool had subscribed nearly £62,000. Lord Stanley concurred with his father in deprecating recourse to the Exchequer, but remarked that much remained to be done by rates and voluntary subscriptions. No one attempted to estimate, or even conjecture the duration of the present distress; some high commercial authorities were inclined to think that we had not yet reached the worst. There was a vast accumulation of goods on hand. Every week that accumulation tended to diminish; every week, therefore, the demand tended to increase; and if he was right in saying what he believed, that it was not so much the actual absence of cotton as the impossibility of working the raw material with a profit, or without great loss at present prices, that caused a cessation of employment, then the consideration he had mentioned was not without its importance. He learnt from India that the people there were fully alive to their own interests, and prepared to profit by the state of things in this country. He had seen something of Americans, representing both the Northern and the Southern States, and from all he could learn he had not the slightest expectation or hope that there would be an early cessation of the quarrel. If that was so, surely the supply of cotton from other sources might be utilized; and, even if there was some risk, he thought, considering the motive and the object, that might be justified as a legitimate operation which in other times and other circumstances would be a hazardous speculation. But, whatever might be the mitigation, the pressure for the next three or four months must in any case be severe. Though reluctance was felt to accept State aid, except in the last extremity, we were bound to see that we did not gratify local pride, natural and justifiable as it was, at the expense of those who would be the chief sufferers by the refusal. In conclusion, the noble lord expressed his gratification at seeing a degree of good feeling and good understanding now springing up between employers and employed, which perhaps had not been witnessed before in this or any other country.

At a meeting held in St. James's Vestry Hall, Piccadilly, Lord Stanley delivered an opportune speech on the condition of Lancashire, and the conduct of the millowners. He said that no party or class in this country could be fairly held accountable for the present distress. It was said that the millowners ought to have foreseen the American crisis, and procured cotton elsewhere. But what could they do? If any millowner had insisted on using Indian or other cotton instead of American, he would have found himself in the Gazette. Those who might really be said to have contributed to the present calamity by their mismanagement were those who were responsible for the development of the resources and communications of India. The uncertainty of the future aggravated the mischief. We should be better off if we had a guarantee that for a given period no American cotton should reach us; the possibility that the Southern crop might be let loose frightened merchants and producers from buying or growing it elsewhere. He pointed out what Lancashire was really doing—that the present expenditure was such as must involve a poor-rate of 10s. in the pound, and that the millowners who relieved their own hands gave much more money than they would be expected to give to a committee, and did more good than a committee could do. He reminded his hearers that 1 per cent. on all incomes above £100 would produce over £3,000,000, and that even if one-third of the income-taxed exempted itself from contributing on the plea of poverty, a contribution of 1 per cent. would still realize £2,200,000, or twice as much as has ever yet been raised by a national subscription. He expressed a hope that we should soon have seen the worst. That depends on when the American war shall terminate. If it last another year, we have not by any means seen the worst; should it last five years, the ruin of Lancashire will be irretrievable.

Liverpool contributes for the month of December £12,000 to the Central Relief Fund. Well it may; for Liverpool merchants have grown rich by speculation, while the rest of Lancashire has starved through enforced idleness. Of their winnings, fairly won though they be, some part, at least, is due to those whose loss has been their gain.

The Bishop of London has delivered a long and thoughtful charge to his clergy; vindicating the right and duty of free but reverential study of theological truth, and counselling tolerance and conciliation.

In reply to a communication addressed to Earl Russell by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, the secretary of the Chamber received the following reply from the Foreign-office, which was read at a council meeting yesterday:—

Sir,—I am directed by Earl Russell to reply to your letter of the 6th inst., respecting the destruction by the Confederate steamer Alabama of British property, embarked in American vessels, captured or burned by that steamer. Earl Russell desires me to state to you, that British property on board a vessel belonging to one of the belligerents must be subject to all the risks and contingencies of war, so far as the capture of the vessel is concerned. The owners of any British property not contraband of war on board a Federal vessel, captured and destroyed by a Confederate vessel of war, may claim in a Confederate prize court compensation for the destruction of such property.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The Greek question continues to occupy the public mind of Paris. The language of the newspapers is becoming more hostile to England; and the Constitutionnel, which last week treated the election of Prince Alfred as admissible, now declares itself adverse, and indicates with great clearness the objections on grounds of European policy which render most undesirable the occupation of the throne of Greece by a king chosen from the Royal family of Great Britain. La France is bitterly opposed to the election of Prince Alfred.

ITALY.—Father Passaglia, whose pamphlet against the temporal power of the Papacy, written from the stand-point of a Catholic priest and Italian patriot, made so much noise a few months ago, has been prevented from preaching in Milan. A parish priest lent him his pulpit, and the Father preached, unannounced; but the news of his presence spread, and the church was crammed almost to suffocation. Before the next occasion on which he was to hold forth, the diocesan bishop ad interim interfered. The parish priest held his ground against the bishop, but quailed before the threats of a Papist riot. He appealed to the Prefect, who in the meantime had been trying to dissuade Passaglia from his purpose. Passaglia came to Milan and waited on the Prefect, who promised to do his duty; but when on the morning appointed the friend who had lent his pulpit waited on the Prefect to claim the promised protection, the official had disappeared. The priest took fright, and Passaglia was not allowed to preach.

The debate in the Chambers continued on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday: Ratazzi, Durando, and Depretis speaking in vindication of the Ministry. Durando declared that the Government did not yet despair of obtaining from France the abandonment of Rome. He was heard with great attention and respect, for his personal character and known sincerity and patriotism command the regard of all Italians. But he failed to save the Ministry. The hostility of the Chamber was so manifest that Ratazzi found it expedient to resign without waiting for a vote of condemnation. The Marquis Torrens, who belongs, we believe, to a princely Neapolitan family, was asked to form an Administration, but has not succeeded. There are rumours that a Cabinet of non-entities will be brought into power—Ricasoli being excluded by the King's hostility, and the other leading men of the various parties by motives which are not so well understood.

DENMARK.—Lord Russell has addressed a second despatch to the Danish Government, supporting the German claim to interfere with the affairs of Sleswig.

GERMANY.—The Elector of Hesse-Cassel has yielded to Prussian menaces, and the Government which has suspended the exercise of constitutional rights in its own dominions has the credit of restoring to its neighbours the liberty denied to its subjects. Severe measures of repression have been adopted towards the Prussian press. The strictest censorship is maintained. Every newspaper is obliged to furnish the censor with a copy some time before its issue; any obnoxious passage is suppressed, and, if necessary, measures are taken to seize the whole edition. Even if this ordeal is successfully passed, a journal is still liable to persecution for any expression which may chance to offend the authorities. An article in the semi-official Star imputed to some members of the Diplomatic corps intrigues with the Opposition press. The Dutch Minister, as senior of that corps, demanded explanations, which were refused.

GREECE.—Prince Alfred has not been elected King—as yet the National Assembly has not met—but he has been proclaimed at Athens, and elsewhere, by the tumultuous acclamation of the people. Russia is evidently angry and uneasy. She acquiesces not very graciously in the rejection or exclusion of the Duke of Leuchtenberg, the son of the Viceroy Eugene Beauharnais, and of a Russian Archduchess; but she will not tolerate that an English prince should, by ascending the throne of Greece, neutralize all her schemes of aggrandizement in that direction.

THE EAST.

TAPAU.—Detailed accounts of the murder reported in our issue of the 20th ult. have now reached this country. It appears that a party of Europeans, among whom was a Mr. Borodail, had ridden out from Yokohama for exercise. About four miles from Kanagawa they were met by the retinue of the father of Prince Satsuma. They were motioned to draw to one side, and did so; and then they were attacked. The lady was slightly hurt; two of her companions were severely wounded; the third was cut down from his horse, and afterwards deliberately butchered. The lady escaped to Yokohama, and gave the alarm; her wounded companions made their way to the American Consulate at Kanagawa. A party of Europeans collected at Yokohama, and, proceeding to Kanagawa, were joined by the British Consul, Captain Vyse, with the mounted guard of the Embassy, and went in search of the murdered man, of whose fate they were ignorant. The British Minister (Colonel Neale) attempted to recall the guard, and if the accounts received are correct, behaved with a signal want of spirit, dignity, and courage. But it would be unfair at present to condemn him, as his defence is not made public. It is difficult to see where these things can end. England has almost as little idea of annexing Japan as of quitting it.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, December 3, 1862.

During the past week our market has undergone considerable fluctuations, at first declining rapidly, again recovering with equal rapidity, and now closing, after an excited day's business, at a large advance from the extreme point of depression.

On Thursday the dullness, on which our last report closed, increased in intensity, and on Friday morning some holders became anxious to realize, and several sales took place on the basis of 14d. for Fair Dhollerahs. In the afternoon of that day a slight improvement in tone was apparent, and on Saturday, with sales of 3000 bales, Fair Dhollerahs recovered to 14½d., and Middling Orleans to 22½d. per lb. The Scotia's news to hand in the morning tended to strengthen the position of holders. Cotton in New York had advanced very rapidly, and closed at 70 cents. for Middling Uplands; the reason for this great rise was the falling off in the supplies—5000 bales only having arrived in the first three weeks in November and the large amount taken from that port by the trade, leaving a very small stock on hand, variously estimated from 10,000 to 15,000 bales. At the prices ruling here when the news arrived, shipments from this port to New York would leave a profit of about 1d. per lb. to the shipper, and as it was generally believed that the New England manufacturers had large orders from government for army clothing and tents and could afford to pay even more than 70 cents for their cotton. Considerable purchases of American, Symmas, and Surats have been made for that market.

On Monday a good business was again done at higher prices the sales reaching 5000 bales. On Tuesday the market opened very strong, and as Manchester news came to hand reporting a good business going on there at a slight advance on the previous weeks, and a general disposition, both on the part of the home trade, and exporters to enter the market. Prices here rapidly advanced, and business was protracted to a late hour; the sales reached 8000 to 10,000 bales.

To-day the market has been very excited: the trade have attended in large numbers, and have bought very freely, taking 7000 bales out of a total of 15,000, and cotton is generally ½d. per lb. dearer; Middling Bowes are worth 22d, Mobiles 23d. and Orleans 22½ to 24d, and Fair Dhollerahs and Omrawuttees are well worth 15½d.

The great change that has taken place in the tone of our market is mainly attributable to the action of the trade. Encouraged by the more confident feeling in Manchester, where the smallness of the production and the diminished stock have at length given confidence to holders, and induced bona fide operators to buy to a moderate extent, they have already considerably increased their consumption; and many spinners who have closed their machinery for months are now recommencing short time, and those who were working three or four days a week find they can now run full time without loss, and in some cases to a fair profit. Our market thus is in a healthier position than for many months past; the consumption of cotton which was estimated as low as 10,000 bales per week a month ago, is now 2000 or 3000 more, and likely to reach 15,000 or over, before long, unless checked by a great rise here. It is to be feared, however, that if this excitement continues, and a further considerable advance takes place in the next few days, spinners may again, for a time, be forced out of the market. Yet the feeling now is general that we have seen the worst, and that Fair Dhollerahs will not again this year be quoted 14d., and probably not even 13d.

The news from America still forbids the hope of an early termination of the war. The Federal gunboats were in readiness once more to attempt the re-opening of the Mississippi, and an attack on Charleston was imminent. At Fredericksburg a portion of Burnside's forces were face to face with the main Confederate army, but it is hardly probable that a general engagement would there take place, or that Burnside would be so reckless as to attempt to force his way by that route to Richmond in face of such a formidable foe, at this inclement season, and with "Stonewall" Jackson in his rear. Those here, who believed that anarchy and confusion would ensue on the success of the Democrats, and that

Lincoln's Government would speedily be overthrown, will see little in the late accounts to confirm their views; on the contrary, they breathe a warlike uncompromising spirit, and indicate a determination on the part of the Northern people generally to support the President in a vigorous prosecution of the war, according to the principles of the extreme party he represents.

PRIVATE LETTER.

New Orleans, October 19.

My dear Friend,—I received your letter, dated Sept. 7; this being Sunday, I take the opportunity of spending my morning replying to it. I have no doubt you will think that I might be better employed than writing, even to yourself, but alas! we Episcopalians have no longer a church; we were turned out by the order of our tyrant on last Sunday. I cannot attempt, in so short a space, to give you more than a hasty description of the disgraceful proceedings. Because we do not pray for his Majesty "Abraham L." Major-General Strong entered the church, and while we were on our knees, ordered us out, and as we did not go immediately, had a guard of 200 soldiers drawn up in front of the church. I hope to send you a printed account of the whole transaction. Mr. Goodrich, the minister, was arrested, but has not received his sentence yet. If this were the only act of which we have to complain, we might try to be content; but, my dear friend, I do not believe that even the Reign of Terror under Robespierre equalled what we are undergoing; we just want the guillotine, and I expect to see it every day; men are arrested on no charge whatsoever; Mr. Hamilton W— is working on Ship Island, with a ball and chain round his leg. Mrs. Zacharie was turned out of her house with her children, Mrs. Net is safe, her husband being a foreign consul. Mrs. Doctor Campbell has notice to quit immediately—in fact, we do not know whose turn comes next. I shall try to mention some of the houses they have already taken; Doctor Kennedy's, on Julia Street; Mr. Brother's, on Camp Street; Mrs. Marquize's, Daniel Adams', General Twigg's, and the one next, Mr. Tarnbull's, Dr. Palmer's, Mr. Griot's, Shepherd Brown's, Mr. J. P. Harrison's, Mrs. Tilton's, Mr. Norton's, and so many on Canal Street that I cannot pretend to name them all; whenever they see a house that suits them, they take it, and the lady dare not move even a towel; they have also possession of Mr. G. M. Pinckard's, Colissenm place. We dare not speak, being surrounded by spies; our negroes say what they please, for you dare not reply; if they complain, you have to hush or go to prison. The officers live publicly with the mulatto women, and parade Canal Street with them in open daylight. I suppose you saw the celebrated letter compelling every one to take the oath, or "register as an enemy." I did the latter, though thousands took the oath, hoping thereby to obtain protection; but what a mistake! they are treated worse than those who stood up for the Confederacy. The old "Satan" calls them perjurers, liars, and says that "Hell" is made up of just such stuff. Mrs. Zacharie took the oath; notwithstanding, she was the next day driven into the street! Tell Mr. — (your husband) I "swallowed the cat, tail and all," and expect to fare no worse than the "Union" people. You must not think that I am exaggerating the horrors of our position; it is the plain unvarnished truth. My negroes are still with me, and I do not believe any more will leave on the 1st of January than have left already, as there is no business doing, and they do not exactly care to starve; this being the case with most of those who ran away from their owners, as the Yankees are tired of feeding any but the soldiers. Do not mind the accounts you read in Northern papers of the misery in the Confederacy, most of it being untrue; out of New Orleans and its environs everything is tolerable; our troops being well fed, well clothed, and flushed with victories. I know how your sister is; she belongs to the desponding kind; but you must cheer up, there is a bright star in the distance, and not so distant neither. This gives me strength to bear the yoke of our tyrants, extremely galling as it is, and when I think of our poor soldiers, I try to wait patiently, knowing that we will and must succeed. I wish they had bombarded this place, the people would then have been delivered of their oppressors. But I fear we are to continue "prisoners," no passport being granted except for plenty of money, which can achieve everything. If a person owes you money, you dare not present a bill, for if discovered, you, as a Secessionist, are sent to prison. You may imagine how economically we have to live; every house in the city and on the river has been taken; that fine equipage, which you so often sat in, has been sent away for safe-keeping; only our rulers and their minions ride. Taking a house, all the male clothing is confiscated for the officers, and if too much ladies' apparel be found (whereof they are the judges) they give it to the "negroes." The health of the city has been excellent, but the loss among their troops dreadful. I wish they all had been swept off! Every one, who could, has left, there being no prospect of any business. Provisions are reasonable, i.e., groceries, but meat is bad and high; mutton 50c., beef 40c. They have stolen all the cattle from the plantations, mules and chickens, and no cattle is coming from Texas; still, we manage to keep body and soul together.

I am glad to hear that you are enjoying yourselves though you cannot be happy when you think of us. I wish I could tell you the names of all the true men who refuse the oath. Mr. Musson, Mr. Watt, Doctor Mercer, Doctor Campbell, and all the cotton factors and brokers, are among the number; you know we are. Love to Mr. — and the children.

The subjoined letters, coming from reliable sources, contain some facts in relation to the campaign in Maryland and Northern Virginia which have not before appeared in print:—

Baltimore, November 8.

When the Confederates crossed the Potomac into Maryland, you may imagine what a state of excitement the people were in—the Unionists were frightened terribly, while the Southern sympathizers were in exultant spirits—but the short stay of Lee's army was a great disappointment to them, and prevented many from joining him who were making their preparations to do so. He, however, obtained four or five thousand recruits, and among them two companies of cavalry, mounted, armed, and equipped, from York county, Pennsylvania. The battle of South Mountain was fought by the rear-guard of Lee's army against great odds, and they held the pass until Lee's army were in position near Sharpsburg. McClellan attacked Lee's army there in vastly superior force, and was repulsed at all points, the Confederate loss being between six and seven thousand, and that of the Federals, including 11,500 prisoners, captured by Jackson at Harper's Ferry, being not less than 40,000. Lee offered battle twice to McClellan the following day, but he declined the invitation, and Lee then retired beyond the Potomac without molestation. After crossing, Jackson stationed 200 men, with two pieces of artillery, on the south bank, with orders to retire in confusion, through a ravine making down to the river, so soon as the Federals returned their fire, he having stationed a strong force in ambush on each side of the ravine. When the Federals made their appearance on the north bank, the 200 fired several rounds, which was returned by the Federals, when, pursuant to orders, they broke and fled in disorder up the ravine. The Federals at once threw over the river a force of nearly 10,000 men, the Corn Exchange Regiment of Philadelphia among them, who pursued the retreating 200, and when they had penetrated the ravine some distance from the river, Jackson closed in upon them on both flanks, and inflicted upon them a slaughter more terrible than any which has taken place since the beginning of the war, only 800 having escaped. The Confederates followed them into the river, and bayoneted them in the water, while batteries on the bank mowed them down by scores at every discharge. Then followed Stuart's raid into Pennsylvania, which carried terror, not only to the Unionists in this State, but to the whole population of Pennsylvania as far north as Harrisburg. He captured large supplies and a large number of horses, and took them all safely over the Potomac, near Poolesville, having made the complete circuit of the Federal army. The Union army has now crossed the Potomac, and is advancing in great force; the Confederates slowly falling back before them. That part of the army which advanced from Harper's Ferry towards Winchester was met last Sunday (2nd of November) and driven back to the Potomac; this is not published in the newspapers, but it is nevertheless so, and I heard the guns during the time the battle was in progress.

A friend of mine, whom you know, —, distinguished himself in one of the battles before Richmond, having volunteered to take despatches a mile and a-half through the fire of both armies at the hottest of the fight, and succeeded in passing safely, and was cheered from one end of the line to the other as he went; a gentleman who was present said that his escaping unhurt was a miracle, and that — was "a perfect hero." When Jackson got into Pope's rear, at Manassas, —, who is now a lieutenant of artillery, captured the telegraph operator there, and being in want of artillery harness, he made him telegraph to Washington for it, and they sent up two ear loads, which he secured.

The elections in the Northern States, resulting in a defeat of the Republican party, have been a tremendous blow to the Administration, and I think will do more to bring the war to a speedy close than a dozen victories gained by the Confederates. Lincoln will hold to his policy, and the Democrats will refuse to furnish men or means while he does. It is true that the same Congress which was in session last winter will be in session this winter, but the moral effect of these elections will be very great; rebuking, as they do, the Administration and evidencing a condemnation of its policy. The men to fight the battles are furnished through the agency of the Governors and Legislatures of the different States, and none will be furnished by the Democratic States while Lincoln pursues his present policy—that is, they will make that an excuse for refusing to do what they have no inclination to do; notwithstanding, they talk of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the "Union as it was, and the Constitution as it is," or did talk so before the election. Several leaders of the Old Plug Ugly party in Baltimore were found by General Wool circulating a petition for signatures for his removal from his command in Baltimore, when he at once arrested them, and sent them to Fort Delaware. He, however, released them in a few days, but their arrest aroused the indignation of the whole Plug Ugly and Yankee party, with the Governor at their head, and I am very much afraid they will succeed in having him removed. I shall regret it, for he is a gallant old soldier and a gentleman, and cannot be made use of or controlled by the rascals who have control of the State and City Governments, and I think he is disposed to act fairly and justly. The draft caused great excitement here for some time. In Baltimore county adjoining this city, 978 men were drawn, about 300 of this number have furnished substitutes, and about 40 have reported in person, and the balance, some 630, have yet to be found and taken to camp. It is said a company of cavalry will be sent out to hunt up the missing. Many have gone to Dixie, and will be hard to find. Eighty-one went in one body to Dixie from one of the counties the night of the draft, 46 on another night, besides others in smaller parties. About one-half of the substitutes furnished from Baltimore county have deserted, after receiving from their principals $250 to $350 each. It is very strange that the Union men who have been urging people to volunteer and approved of the draft, now that they or their friends have been drawn, are utterly disgusted with drafting and as violently opposed to it as they were before in favour of it—so much for their principles and patriotism.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 13, 1862.

The self-sacrifice and devotion of the people of Maryland to the Confederates is almost without a parallel in history. You will be surprised to learn that over $45,000 have been expended in this city alone (and principally contributed by its citizens) for the relief of the Confederate sick and wounded prisoners since the battles in Maryland. A large number of wounded were brought down to the city after the battle of Antietam, and cared for in their own houses and the hospitals by our devoted women, who are untiring night and day; in almost every house one or more of its inmates are at work for the sick soldier, and many a fair hand among us, who previous to this war did not know what labour was, now plies her needle night and day, and is willing cheerfully to endure any privation for the cause. In collecting money it is painful to us to take money from those who cannot afford to give, but we must do it, or wound their feelings. Such is the spirit of the people of Maryland. Out of our resources we sent considerable sums to the Confederate prisoners in the West, and from all quarters are we called on. We have now but little chance to make money here, nearly every avenue of trade is cut off from us; we cannot send a package of the value of $5 to any place out of the city without taking the oath. Many of our small dealers, whose families are dependent on them, must take this oath or let their families starve, those who can live on for awhile longer prefer to do no business than take it.

With reference to the Confederate invasion of Maryland, I would say that it was only a move to take Harper's Ferry, and nothing more. When Marylanders offered themselves to General Lee to fight their cause on their own soil, he said to them, "Remain quiet for the present, your time has not yet come." It was not expected by the Confederates to fight the battle of Antietam, but the delay in taking Harper's Ferry rendered it a necessity, and nobly was it done. General Lee's army in that battle did not exceed 45,000 men, that of McClellan was fully 120,000; had Jackson's army arrived in time, and the ammunition of the Confederates held out, McClellan would have been defeated, Washington fallen, and the war probably ended.

I spend a good deal of time in New York, and I can assure you that the war spirit of the North is dead. You note the rapid strides of Democracy; well, the Democratic party means peace, and this is well understood by the Lincolnites. Heavy demonstrations will be made shortly in the ports of Mobile, Savannah, and Charleston; but, from what we can learn, the Confederates are well prepared, and we do not fear for the result.

The Confederate army now in the Valley of the Shenandoah is in fine spirits and splendidly equipped for a winter campaign. President Davis reviewed at Winchester, some two months since, 80,000 of his army, all newly clad and in fine spirits.

The depredations of the "Pest of the Ocean," otherwise the Alabama, have had a terrible effect on Yankee commerce, and the dread of new depredations causes many sleepless nights to the loyal merchants of New York.

We have news that the Confederates got in the rear of the Federal army at Ashby's Gap; took their trains, &c., 500 Federal wounded were carried into Harper's Ferry. The Federal sutlers are here who lost their supplies. Nothing is now allowed to be published by the War Department but the most infamous falsehoods; believe nothing you see now in the Northern papers, they are worse than ever.

NEW YORK, November 22.

The Treasury notes bearing 7.30ths interest, and falling due on the 1st of October, 1864, have been taken at about 3 per cent. premium, payable in "Green backs." The whole amount only $13,000,000 could have been disposed of in the market at 4 per cent. without any parade, as people might be supposed to be glad to get something that promises to yield an income in specie over an inconvertible and unredeemable non interest-paying currency. It is remarkable, however, that not a single bid was made by an individual for investment; all the applications came from brokers and speculators who expect to make "a turn." Besides these Treasury notes only $68,000,000 of Government bonds have been sold, notwithstanding Mr. Chase has had agents in every large city endeavouring to palm them off upon the innocent public. Surprise is manifested that he has been enabled to carry through the Government up to the present time, but he is pretty near "the end of his rope," and so will be all the members of the Administration if they persist in carrying out the emancipation scheme. But it is supposed that Mr. Lincoln, who is as disingenuous as he is fanatical, is merely playing with the Radicals, until Congress meets, when he will assume the Greeley side in such a strong manner that the representatives of the country will be forced to oppose him, provoking a collision of sentiment, and thereby end the war. The movement of Burnside is as much to gain time as anything else, in order to keep up a show of activity. The war spirit is completely broken, and cannot be revived under any pretence.

PARIS, December 2.

The apprehensions of a rupture between England and France have been very materially diminished by the conviction that though the Greeks might elect Prince Alfred, the British Government would not, in any case, consent to the acceptance of a throne beset by so many dangers. In spite of official and semi-official assurances, it was generally felt here that the transformation of Greece into an English dependency must inevitably—not immediately, perhaps, but still inevitably—lead to a rupture and possibly to an European war. The public are, therefore, glad to suppose that one cause of the disturbance of peace is removed. The general feeling throughout the public (who are not profound politicians) is, that England would be very glad to gratify the wishes of the Greeks, but that the attitude of France and Russia has deterred her from complying with them.

The London Ministerial prints have been very indignantly denying the charge brought against the Ministry, of putting forward the young Prince. Such an imputation against the virtue of Downing Street! It is supposed, however, in Paris that the whole affair was managed between General Kalergis and an unofficial agent of the British Government. Whichever way it may end, this little electioneering campaign has by no means improved the relations between the two Governments.

The debates in the Italian Parliament have led to the result which unbiassed minds had foreseen from the day when M. Ratazzi gave the ill-advised order to shoot down Garibaldi. The Ministry has given in its resignation. Italy, during their tenure of office, has suffered loss of prestige, and a still heavier loss—that of the feeling of mutual reliance which existed between the King and the Revolutionary party. When M. Ratazzi resorted to a low backstairs intrigue to displace Baron Ricasoli, France and England were both eager to show their friendship to the new kingdom; the "party of action" was under control—Garibaldi and his influence were kept back as a powerful reserve. M. Ratazzi has undone everything. His subserviency has not conciliated France; his hunting down Garibaldi has disgusted England; the party of action are ready to rise at the first opportunity; anarchy prevails throughout the kingdom; the Roman question is as far from a settlement as ever; and Garibaldi is, physically and morally, a complete wreck. Ratazzi has anticipated a vote of censure by laying down office. He should have done so long before.

Clerical influence continues to prevail in exalted quarters, but symptoms are not wanting to show that the tide is beginning to turn. Among these symptoms not the least significant is the pamphlet of Prince Napoleon. It is not easy to believe that so long and powerful a series of indictments against the Papacy would have appeared if the Emperor was really disposed to trust himself to the embraces of the clerical party. I have heard it surmised that the object of His Majesty is simply to allow the parti pretre a sufficiency of rope, and provoke the Liberals to a great manifestation of opinion. Qu'en savez-vous?

Next Sunday will be a great day for all Parisian sight-seers. Flat or no flat, the new Boulevard will be formally opened by the Emperor. There is to be a great display of troops—the National Guard, dit on, will take no part in the ceremony. There will be immense crowds astrir—guns will be fired, the mob will cheer, the Prefect of the Seine will make a speech, and the Archbishop of Paris will deliver a prayer. Whether the Emperor will reply at any length to the addresses of the municipal functionaries is at present a matter for speculation. Beyond giving employment to the labouring classes, there is not much to be said for the new Boulevard, which was not in the least required, and the only advantage of which is, that it forms a short cut between the barracks of the Prince Eugene and the fortress of Vincennes, and isolates the revolutionary Faubourg St. Antoine in a triangle of good military roads, where barricades are impracticable.

Several of your contemporaries have grossly overrated the importance of a slight disturbance at the School of Medicine. Dr. Roger, a second-rate man, having been appointed Dean of the Faculty over the head of Baron Dubois, who occupied the post, was vigorously hissed, and a couple of policemen were bonneted. Only two students were arrested, and released on the payment of a small fine. The disturbance had nothing political about it, and was altogether a very foolish and not over creditable affair; and I may add that even in the Quartier Latin it has produced not the slightest sensation.

The lion of the week has been Mille Patti, whose success at the Italian Opera reminds us of the good old days—cheu fugaces—when Sontag, Grisi, and Persiani were in their prime. The public are perfectly in love with the young prima donna—with her voice, with her musical instincts, with her pretty child-like ways, and her simplicity. None of the critics ventured to do more than hint that great natural gifts may be improved by study. The public seem to think her perfect as she is, and are not far wrong in considering her utter want of any artifice as her principal charm.

Last night a comedy by Emile Augier was brought out at the Français, and was eminently successful. It is called Les Fils de Giboyer, and is professedly a satire mainly social, but with a tendency to hover about politics. To any one not familiar with French society the plot would be unintelligible; and, besides, you are so moral, so virtuous on your side of the Channel; bribery and corruption are so utterly unknown, that you could not possibly take an interest in the wicked people M. Augier puts upon the stage. Prince Napoleon and Princess Clotilde were present throughout the performance.

THE MERCHANTS AND FINANCIERS OF NEW YORK ON FEDERAL FINANCE.

The following memorial of the merchants and financiers of New York on the finances of the nation, and proposing a new plan of public credit and currency, has been published:—

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Your memorialists respectfully represent that the financial affairs of our Government require to be so systematized as to command the confidence of the country in the administration of the business of the Treasury Department. That the system pursued by the head of the Treasury of issuing irredeemable demand notes, certificates of indebtedness, seven-thirty bonds, and certificates of deposits for short loans, is accumulating an enormous demand debt that will soon create an uncontrollable alarm among business men, if it does not totally destroy the national credit. It appears from statements made by the chief of the Treasury that only sixty-eight millions of our public debt have been funded in 20-year bonds since the rebellion commenced, and that the Treasury depends upon temporary loans to supply all the funds required for the expenses of the Government beyond the income from revenue and taxes. It is not possible to invent a more hazardous plan of finance to provide money to pay the current indebtedness of a great country involved in an expensive and protracted war. Against this extraordinary practice your memorialists respectfully but earnestly protest. It is a custom among business men as well as Governments to make short loans when money is dear, and long loans when money is cheap; but the Treasury reverses this common practice, for while money has been cheap beyond all precedent during the last eight months the Treasury has made few 20-year loans, and has restricted its borrowing to loans of an extremely temporary character. The only reason we have heard assigned for this plan of national financing is that this war must be of very short duration, and that when it ends our 20-year bonds will bring a great premium. Your memorialists are not able to fix the time when peace will be restored to our country, but they do say that it is a matter of mathematical certainty that if peace is restored within a few years a demand for money will spring up in all departments of trade, manufactures, and commerce, to so great an extent that the price of money will rule higher than at any former period of our commercial history; and, when money is thus in demand, can the Treasury expect the capitalists of our country to divert their funds from these natural channels of business to invest in 6 per cent. bonds? The time when the Treasury could have funded 6 per cent. bonds at par to the extent of five hundred millions has now passed away, not soon to return. The paralysis of trade, which destroyed business and the demand for money, and threw it back upon banks and capitalists, is disappearing, and speculation, trade, commerce, and manufactures are gradually creating the same demand for capital that existed before the rebellion. Thus it becomes necessary to resort to some other means of obtaining money to carry on this war and meet the wants of the country. It should be remembered that our condition as a people is different from any other. It is a well-known fact that we have no large capitalists who can absorb any considerable amount of new securities. Our capitalists have their money invested in bonds and mortgages, real estate, State bonds, bank, insurance, and other local stocks. It would be extremely injurious to the interests of all classes of our people were these securities and properties forced upon the market to raise money to invest in Government bonds at any time; but especially would it be so at a time when trade, commerce, and manufactures shall, after the peace, again ask for the facilities which can alone be obtained in an easy money-market. It is also an important fact that the greater portion of the available capital of this country is employed in trade and business, and is thus used for the profit it will earn, instead of an annual interest upon revenue securities. This condition of our country is known to us all, and is the practical demonstration and evidence of the intelligence, enterprise, and thrift of our people; and hence we esteem those evidences of debt most valuable that possess the most convertible character, while they contain the intrinsic merit of certain value. In consequence of these facts and conclusions, your memorialists desire to present to you a system of American finance which will conform to the condition and genius of our people, and which will make the burden of a heavy debt bear as lightly as possible upon all interests by adjusting it to the shoulders of traders, bankers, and capitalists. In our country "money" is that article which the Federal Government should declare to be a legal tender, and the public will take this money so long as trade and business may demand it. Trade will employ money so long as the use of it will produce a profit greater than the amount of interest paid for its use. When we wish to float more money than can be profitably employed in trade, we must make it bear an interest, or it will depreciate in current value. It is not the quantity of bonds bearing interest that creates inflation or over issues, but the large quantity of irredeemable bills forced upon the public as currency that bear no interest. The principle we now propose to embrace in our national finances we trust may be the one that will preserve the credit and life of the nation, and alleviate the fears of those who consider a national debt an unmitigated evil. Your memorialists, therefore, respectfully request you to authorize and direct the Treasury Department to issue coupon bonds, having twenty years to run, of the denomination of $20, $50, $100, $500, $1000, and $5000 each, bearing an interest of 4½ per cent., and to make such bonds a legal tender. Your memorialists represent that these bonds will be taken and held by all classes of people, and especially by merchants, traders, and manufacturers, to a very large extent, and that the introduction of these bonds will induce business men to use more capital and less personal credit in their business, because surplus capital invested in these interest-paying bonds will still be money in the hands of the holder. We propose 4½ per cent. interest, because we find, by a careful estimate of current values, that 4 per cent. would be too low, and 5 per cent. too high, and that 4½ per cent., with the legal tender clause, making the bonds money, will make a merchantable as well as legal par value. This will cause them to be freely used in the general business of the country in place of bills of exchange, bank credits, and individual acceptances. Another important advantage will flow from this system of finance. This rate of interest on Government bonds will not so seriously depreciate mortgage securities or the current value of real estate as the rate of 6 and 7 per cent. now being paid by the Treasury upon its issued bonds; and, again, these bonds, being money bearing interest, will soon take the place of as well as absorb the irredeemable demand note, because these bonds will possess all the characteristics of money and bear interest. By adopting this system the Treasury will not be compelled to ask another loan; for, as these bonds will be a legal tender, the Treasury may use them as other money in payment to public creditors. Thus will the national credit be protected against dishonour, to which it is now exposed by the plan of demand notes and call or short loans. It is probable that these bonds may be absorbed in the business of the country, without materially affecting values, to the extent of more than one thousand millions within six months, and, by allowing a short time to bring about a proper appreciation of the value of this new money bearing interest, and gradually placing the bonds into the hands of the public, it is not unlikely that two hundred millions may be profitably taken in our country. By issuing these bonds that will take the place of the irredeemable demand note, the Treasury will be enabled to resume specie payments within ninety days from the time these bonds shall be offered to the public. If the public shall require the Government to continue the issue of demand notes of denominations less than $20, then provision should be made to redeem such notes in specie at the Sub-Treasury. This plan will keep such issues within proper limits, and will not in any degree affect bank issues, because those institutions, like individuals, may use the bonds and notes of the Government in place of specie. If Congress should adopt this system, and thus make all its funded promises a legal tender, it will be placing the credit of the Government where it should be—above all other credits in our country. These propositions bring the obligations of the Government down to two kinds—one being a time promise, having twenty years to run and bearing interest; the other bearing no interest, and payable on demand in specie, both being a legal tender. This system of credit will make as simple and perfect a plan of American finance as any statesman can desire to see established. Two thousand millions of Four-and-a-Half per Cent. Bonds will require $90,000,000 to pay the annual interest thereon, whereas the present rates paid on the bonds of Government of 6 and 7 per cent will demand $120,000,000. Thus, to all the other advantages hereinbefore stated, is added a saving of $30,000,000 per annum of interest on the debt of $2,000,000,000.

LORD RUSSELL'S SPIRITED DESPATCH TO DENMARK.

Foreign Office, Nov. 20.

Sir,—Since my conversation with M. de Bille, related in my despatch of the 11th ult., that Minister has placed in my hands the copy of a despatch addressed to him by M. Hall of the date of the 15th ult.

I am sorry to see by that despatch (of which I enclose a copy), that the Danish Government show a strong repugnance to the adoption of the counsels given them by Her Majesty's Government. I am persuaded that the Danish Government have not sufficiently reflected on the evils of their present position, and have exaggerated to themselves the consequences which they think would follow their consent to the plan of arrangement sketched out by Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, are desirous, with a view to the maintenance of the Danish Monarchy, and not to its dismemberment or its subversion, to point out more fully the obligations of the King of Denmark and the means of fulfilling them.

It will not be denied that the King of Denmark holds the Duchy of Holstein, as Duke of Holstein, and Lauenburg as Duke of Lauenburg, and that in both capacities he is a member of the German Confederation, bound by its laws, and amenable to the authorities constituted by the Federal Act.

Neither can it be denied, as that Duke of Schleswig, the King of Denmark is bound to Austria and Prussia, and to the German Confederation collectively, as sovereign States of Europe, by certain promises made in 1811, and which (as M. Hall reminds me) I have always stated His Danish Majesty is bound in honour to fulfil.

Such being the position and such the obligation of the King of Denmark, I feel sure that M. Hall will agree with me when I say that no argument ab inconvenienti can be allowed to prevail against these positive stipulations and honourable engagements. It will not be enough to say that by the arrangement which has been proposed the march of the Danish Government will be retarded; and that it is difficult to obtain the sanction of Holstein to measures which the Danish Ministers think expedient. Considerations of this kind must yield to the demands of justice, and to the good faith due from a Prince towards those with whom he has contracted engagements.

Taking, then, these obligations in this order, I must remind M. Hall that Her Majesty's Government have always declined to give an opinion upon matters belonging to the competence of the German Confederation. Speaking very generally, Her Majesty's Government see nothing unreasonable in a demand that no taxes should be imposed and no laws should be binding on Holstein which have not obtained the consent of the people of that Duchy, represented in the States thereof.

But, on the other hand, when M. Hall declares that the Danish Government are ready to accede to the demands of the Diet in regard to Holstein, "whatever dangers to the integrity of the Monarchy that concession may involve, if this eventual position of Holstein can be defined in such a manner that the rest of the Monarchy should not be reduced to a constant dependence on Germany, and if by this sacrifice our relations with the Confederation might be re-established on a permanent basis, the principle thus stated has the cordial assent and approbation of Her Majesty's Government.

Before I go further I must ask you to state to M. Hall that it is with great satisfaction I find that, as regards Holstein and Lauenburg, no difference of principle will prevent the adoption of the views set forth in my despatch of the 24th of September. The differences, if any, will rather be on questions of detail.

We come, next, to the question of Schleswig, the real obstacle to a final and solid arrangement.

Upon this subject, also, there is little difference between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Denmark as to general principles. M. Hall does not disavow the two principal Articles of the Declarations made by the King of Denmark, by which, in substance, he assured his people of the Duchy of Schleswig that that Duchy should not be incorporated with Denmark, and that his Schleswig subjects of German origin should be placed on an equality with those of Danish origin. M. Hall, I say, does not deny either the existence or the validity of these premises, but he maintains that they have been fulfilled.

M. Hall's words are:—"The intentions with respect to this Duchy—namely, Schleswig—which the King had spontaneously expressed at the time—the engagement of honour, to use the term employed by Lord Russell, which the King had taken—were immediately and conscientiously fulfilled by him."

The question is thus converted into one of fact. The Cabinet of Berlin and the Germans generally have maintained that these engagements have not been fulfilled.

Some time ago a British agent, acquainted with the country and with the language, was sent into Schleswig to ascertain on which side the truth lay.

His report, which was very detailed, and appeared very trustworthy, was to the effect that the inhabitants of Schleswig did not wish to change masters, that they were loyal to the Crown of Denmark, but that in many places the German inhabitants complained that they were obliged to attend church services in Danish, to send their children to schools where the teaching is in Danish, and that before their children could receive the right of confirmation they are obliged to undergo an examination in the Danish language.

When I reported these complaints, the Danish Government replied that the parents might employ private tutors, and that their children might receive the rite of confirmation in German, although the examination must be in Danish. These replies appeared to Her Majesty's Government to be insufficient and illusory.

Among other instances, I reported, from information I had received, that the inhabitants of Schleswig were not allowed to sign more than three names to one petition, and that the liberty of the press, which exists to the fullest extent in Denmark, is not allowed in Schleswig. When these restrictions were mentioned to the Danish Minister in London he did not deny the truth of these allegations, but justified them by urging the necessity of counteracting German aggressive agitation.

It has been my duty repeatedly to advise the Danish Government to remedy the grievances of Schleswig, to fulfil completely all the promises of the King on this matter, and thus to take away all pretext for German intervention.

In these representations Her Majesty's Government have acted in concert with the Governments of France and Russia; but these three powerful and friendly Governments have seen their advice neglected, and the oppressions and inequalities complained of but little abated. It has become necessary, therefore, to consider and to select some other course.

Such being the case, there are various courses to pursue:—

1. To allow the present state of uneasiness and danger to continue till it ends in some violent explosion.
2. To adopt a common Constitution, in which the German element would have more weight than mere numbers would give it.
3. To divide Schleswig into two parts, of which one to be German, and closely connected with Holstein; and the other to be Danish, and to be incorporated with Denmark.
4. To adopt a plan framed upon the basis which I have suggested.

The last of these courses appears to Her Majesty's Government the most favourable to the integrity and independence of Denmark, and therefore most in accordance with the treaty of London.

M. Hall does Her Majesty's Government justice when he says that he does not believe I intend to renounce or put myself in contradiction with the sentiments of sympathy and sincere interest which I have always expressed for Denmark.

Her Majesty's Government, however, are bound to weigh the position of Denmark uninfluenced by those passions which in the course of a long controversy may have gained an ascendancy among all parties in the controversy. Nor does Her Majesty's Government stand alone in its view of these matters, for Russia partakes the views of Great Britain, and France thinks them deserving of the gravest consideration. Her Majesty's Government can only, therefore, express a hope that the voice of impartial friends may be listened to, even amid the storms of controversy; and that this long and bitter dispute may at last be terminated in such a manner as may be consistent with the honour and conducive to the interests of all parties concerned.

Her Majesty's Government trust that the cessation of this long strife may increase the stability and strengthen the independence of Denmark.

I request you to read and give a copy of this despatch to M. Hall.

I am, &c.,

RUSSELL.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1862.

The New Base of Operations.

Again Virginia is the selected battle-field, again the Northern foe is in her borders, and again all other operations of the war are of secondary interest, and the general attention is fixed on the course of events in the Old Dominion. Will there be a great battle? Do the Federals intend once more to threaten the Confederate capital? It is difficult to answer these questions. The movements of the Federal army may only be a pretence to satisfy the clamour of the Republicans. The present activity may be a parade preceding the retirement into winter quarters. On the other side, it is quite possible that General Burnside is going "on to Richmond," if he can, and that he means to eclipse his predecessor, or to let his army perish in the attempt. The movements of the Federals betray so much uncertainty, the changes of bases are so frequent, their plans are so often frustrated and disconcerted by a single move of the Confederates, that we are in the position of a looker-on at a game of chess in which one of the players is forcing the attack without calculating a single move in advance, and is consequently obliged, by every move of his antagonist, to act on the defensive. And we have the further difficulty of not being quite sure as to what are the Federal movements. The Southern generals and the people of Richmond know them, but the people of the North and we in Europe are uncertain about them. Audacious deception is the undisguised policy of the Lincoln Cabinet. It was announced in Washington that the Army of the Potomac had occupied the gaps in the Blue Ridge Mountains, and now we are coolly informed that these reports "are believed to have been unfounded, though their publication was authorized by the War Department." The only points on which there is no doubt are, the extraordinary ignorance of the Federals, not only as to the probable designs, but also with respect to the whereabouts, of the Confederates; and that the movements of General "Stonewall" Jackson are still a profound and harassing mystery. We may likewise conclude that for political reasons General Burnside will not be allowed to retire into winter quarters, except as a last resource, and, therefore, there is some ground for the prevalent opinion that the rival armies are to be engaged in the attack and defence of Richmond. What are the prospects of the Federal commander? Are his resources greater than those which were placed at the disposal of General McClellan? Do his plans evince any improvement or even any marked change in strategy?

The Northern papers are rather reserved as to the number of troops in Virginia; and their reserve is discreet. From a cursory glance at the state of the Federal forces, we may gather that they are not so numerous as they were last spring. The call for 600,000 recruits has not been responded to, and neither immense bounties nor the partial enforcement of the draft have enabled Mr. Lincoln to get the 300,000 men which were necessary to replace the losses sustained by the disastrous campaigns of the spring and summer. The War Office muster-roll is a very deceptive document. The high bounties have made desertion the rule and not the exception. Some regiments have been considerably thinned, and others so much diminished by desertion as to be no longer effective. The true stories that have been told of the thousands who have died from pestilence, the thousands that have been killed in battle, and the thousands that have been wounded and maimed, have given the Northern mercenaries such a thorough dislike for campaigning in the South as makes them prefer the small risk of desertion to the great risk of going southward. Further, we are told that 100,000 Federal soldiers are on the sick list. If, then, McClellan had 150,000 men under his command, we may be tolerably sure Burnside has a less number, and even that is being decreased by death and sickness at the rate of a hundred a day.

We should not attach very much importance to Burnside's army being smaller, if he were as well supported by contingent armies as was McClellan. The Confederate Generals may now direct almost their entire force against the Army of the Potomac; formerly they had other Federal armies in Virginia to watch and contend against. Another important matter is the equipment of the Northern army. When McClellan invaded Virginia his troops were the best-equipped in the world, and the Confederate army was badly equipped; now the Federal army is badly equipped, and the Confederate army is well provided with the materiel of war. Lastly, the present Army of the Potomac is not so well drilled—that is, it has a larger proportion of raw recruits in its ranks than formerly.

With regard to strategy, it appears that General Burnside is glad to follow the example of General McClellan, who intended to make Acquia Creek the base of his operations. Acquia Creek has some advantages, if the Federal commander is thinking more of defence than aggression. It is on the Potomac, by which he can, by defending the south bank of that river, obtain his supplies without molestation. To some extent it covers Washington on the south side, and from Acquia Creek the Federal army could be withdrawn, with comparative ease and safety, to the immediate neighbourhood of the capital. But if Richmond is to be attacked, Acquia Creek cannot be the base of operations. It is about seventy miles from Richmond, and therefore too remote. Between that place and Richmond are the Rappahannock, Pamunkey, and Chickahominy Rivers, and the intervening ground, at this season, is very unfavourable for military movements. Besides these natural impediments to the advance of an enemy, Richmond is strongly fortified on the northern side. If Burnside succeeds in crossing the Rappahannock, he will only be at the commencement of a march which would be an arduous undertaking if there were not an enemy to dispute his advance.

But will the Federal commander advance with a portion of his army only? Must he not take the main body of his army with him? If so, what is to protect Acquia Creek? The Confederates will be able to move against it; and the only protection for it will be the Federal gunboats. But Fredericksburg is on the way to Richmond, and sixty miles distant from that city. To keep open his communication with Acquia Creek Burnside must hold Fredericksburg. How? Not by the aid of gunboats, and if by a sufficient land force, then not without weakening his army. With a heavy column like that of General "Stonewall" Jackson, or a force like that of General Stuart, always threatening his flank and rear, General Burnside will find it all but impossible to keep open and protect a communication more than sixty miles long. If, as suggested by the North, Acquia Creek is only a temporary base of operations, to be abandoned as soon as Burnside has opened his communications with the James River, whither the Monitor is said to be gone to co-operate with his army, Burnside might as well have proceeded to the James River by water transport, and saved his army the losses that must result from a march through a swampy country, in the face of a numerous and well-equipped enemy. And granting that he reaches the James River, where is the force to prevent the Southerners entering Maryland and carrying the war into Pennsylvania? It may need the whole Northern army to besiege and attack Richmond, but it does not require the whole Southern army to defend that city. When the last mail left New York it was thought possible that General "Stonewall" Jackson was in the Federal rear, and it is certain the nearer General Burnside gets to Richmond the easier will it be for the Confederates to operate in his rear.

The assurances of the advance to Richmond are so positive, and the political extremity of the Administration make such an advance so desirable, that we will not venture altogether to discredit it. But we are far from being convinced that Acquia Creek is to be the base of operations against Richmond, and that Burnside intends to keep open a communication of about sixty miles. We are not at all convinced that he means to leave the borders of Pennsylvania via Maryland to be dealt with as Generals "Stonewall" Jackson and Stuart shall please. It is, we will not say possible, but certainly very probable, that the Federal commander has no intention of menacing the Confederate capital, and that he only echoes the cry of "On to Richmond!" in obedience to the requirement of the Lincoln Government.

The Memorial of the New York Merchants and Financiers.

There are many roads to financial ruin. Among the short-cuts from fortune to bankruptcy are a partiality for the demi-monde, a taste for book-making at Tattersall's, dabbling in bricks and mortar, assuming the lesseeship of a theatre, or operating on the Stock Exchange. But though the roads to ruin are so numerous, the gradations are in all cases well defined and similar. The estate which took a lifetime to gain is soon spent. Then comes the credit, which is soon exhausted. Then come the promises to pay, which are soon worthless. Then come promissory notes and bills, which soon become a drug in the market. At length nothing remains but a confession of insolvency. Through some of these stages the United States has already passed. The Federal Government has spent all its ready money, and exhausted its immediate credit, and now the merchants and financiers of New York recommend Mr. Chase to adopt the bill system. These gentlemen seem to be under the pleasing illusion that bricks can be made without straw, and that if debts are postponed they will, in some way or other, pay themselves. It is very singular that men so wise in their counting-houses, and so far-seeing in the conduct of their mercantile transactions, should fall into such absurd blunders with regard to national finance. But that they have done so is beyond question, as any one may see by reading the memorial they have addressed to the Federal Congress, with regard to the financial position and prospects of the United States.

We agree with the financial luminaries of New York in their condemnation of Mr. Chase's policy; for it certainly is pregnant with national insolvency; but neither Mr. Chase nor any other Minister can adopt sound financial measures if he has to provide for an enormous expenditure on the one hand, and on the other hand, is to do so without hurting the sensibilities of the people by the imposition of additional taxes. The Federal Secretary had his choice of two courses. If he avoided Charybdis, he could not help wrecking his unwieldy bark on Scylla. He had to provide for the carrying on of war on a gigantic scale. If, at the outset, he had asked for a revenue from taxation equal to the payment of the interest of the expenditure, and if he had imitated the example of European financiers, and instead of allowing the whole cost of the war to be bequeathed as a legacy to posterity, he had insisted upon the present generation bearing its share of the burden, he and the Government of which he is a member would have been unpopular, and the war would have come to an end long ere this. Mr. Chase, under these circumstances, was obliged to get into debt, and he did so by the easy means of substituting paper for a specie currency. On this side of the Atlantic the expedient was unequivocally condemned, but in New York, Mr. Chase was lauded for the issue of greenbacks, and was regarded as a genius of the highest order, and spoken of as though he was the first to hit upon the device of meeting a pressing emergency by the issue of irredeemable paper; whilst European criticisms were treated with supreme contempt, and were said to be prompted by envy at the El Dorado which Mr. Chase had created by the erection of his printing presses. At present, Mr. Chase, like his greenbacks, is at a considerable discount. The Lincoln Cabinet has found it impossible to cultivate such a taste for Federal paper money as to make foreign merchants, or indeed the people of the United States, look upon it as equal to the gold or silver it professes to represent, and now he who wants $100 in specie must pay for it $132 in Federal Treasury notes. This depreciation in the value of Mr. Chase's paper is an awkward fact that Mr. Lincoln cannot get rid of by a proclamation, and that will not be modified by the ingenious despatches of Mr. Seward, or by the compliant and patriotic brokers of Wall-street abstaining from publishing, as heretofore, the price of gold. Mr. Lincoln need not blush that he has been foolish enough to attempt, and signally to fail, in making commerce subservient to his will, for potentates as illustrious for their ability as he is remarkable for the lack of ability have tried the same thing, and equally failed.

We are rather inclined to think that the financial operations of the Lincolnites have shown more talent than their diplomacy or conduct of the war; but, to be sure, it is not exceedingly difficult to keep up appearances, and delude a people whose merchants and financiers know so little about the rudiments of finance as do the 'gentlemen of New York, who are good enough to teach Congress a new way to pay old debts, and how to replenish the national Exchequer without authorizing the tax-collector to put his hand into the national pocket. We do not mean to say that these gentlemen propose to do away with taxation, but the evil wrought by Mr. Chase getting into debt without providing for his indebtedness they propose to remedy, not by providing means, but by postponing the day of payment.

It is more convenient, to have a large funded than a large floating debt. In the one case, if the interest is regularly paid in specie or convertible paper, the stock gets a normal value, dependent, of course, upon the public feeling as to the stability of the Government, or rather as to the solvency of the nation; but whether that normal price be high or low, and though at certain crises it may be subject to violent fluctuations, national savings are invested in it, and it possesses an intrinsic value. But a large uncovered floating debt is in itself a sham, for so long as it exists the Government promises to pay on demand, or at a short notice, sums of money which it has no means of raising, and the national credit is in constant jeopardy, because, in a moment of panic, the Government may be called upon to redeem its promises; whereas with a funded debt the only effect of a panic is to send down the price of the stock.

If, then, the merchants and financiers of New York had simply proposed the funding of the debt their advice might have been impracticable, but it would have been theoretically sound; they do, in fact, first condemn a floating debt, then repudiate a funded debt, and finally propose a plan which has nearly all the disadvantages of the first, without having the advantages of the second.

They point out the shock to public credit that results from a practically unrestricted issue of irredeemable paper. In this respect we altogether agree with them. Next they dilate on the prosperity that ensues from the whole capital of a country being invested in productive industry and trade. But this happy state of affairs is incompatible with a war expenditure that cannot be met by current means. All the money that this war has cost the North—whether it is paid in twenty years or whether it remains as a national trophy of national folly—is so much taken from the capital of the country, and the only questions to be decided are these—Are the resources of the United States sufficient to pay the debt in a few years? Supposing they are, is it advisable to cramp the resources of the country by the immediate redemption of the national debt, or is it better to pay the interest upon it from year to year, and leave it a perpetual charge on the national revenue? Whether the Northerners admit it or not, they now have a national debt that has attained gigantic proportions in two years, that is increasing at a ratio without precedent, and that is, however secure with respect to principal, at present unprovided for with respect to interest. The North has eaten its cake. In 1860 it was free from the burden of debt, for what it owed then was a trifle hardly sufficient to remind the 'debt-encumbered world that there was one nation that had not to labour on account of liabilities of past generations. The North cannot resume that position, not even if she resorts to repudiation, for repudiation, even when it gets rid of debt, involves the loss of confidence and credit, which are at the very foundation of social prosperity; for without them industry languishes and commerce dies.

And the curious part of the affair is, that the merchants and financiers of New York propose in effect the establishment of a funded debt; their plan is for the Government to issue coupon bonds for sums of \$20, or if needs be, less than that, to sums of \$5000, these bonds to have twenty years to run and to bear an interest of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. They say two thousand million dollars worth of these bonds may be floated by the Government. For the moment let us grant it. What then? The memorialists write not a word about providing for the payment of these bonds at maturity, and they do not contemplate their payment. In twenty years \$2000,000 cannot be paid, for even the payment of the interest will be a heavy drain on the country. The proposed bonds would be a species of funded debt renewable every twenty years. We now come to the grand part of this scheme—these coupon bonds are to be made a legal tender.

Mr. Chase issues irredeemable greenbacks nominally payable on demand, or Treasury notes at short dates. His censors propose the issue of irredeemable bonds nominally payable in twenty years. Is it possible that men of business, sharp traders—men who have carried on a vast commerce with brilliant success—can be so self-deluded as not to perceive the rottenness of this scheme? The document is before us, and we must believe the merchants and financiers of New York are blind leaders of the blind, or that some of them, in the name of the rest, have propounded this scheme to deceive the public, and bolster up the shaken credit of the Lincoln Administration.

Let us glance at the difficulty of an interest-bearing currency. The twenty-dollar note or bond would continually be changing its value. The tradesman could afford to sell his wares for less the day before the interest became due, and he would require more the day after the interest was paid. The very essence of a currency is, whether it be metallic or paper representing the precious metals, that it should in itself express a certain defined, unchanging value—that is, it should be the standard of value. It is irresistibly droll to contemplate the inconvenience, the utter confusion, that would follow the adoption of an interest-bearing currency. In every bill of exchange the time of its falling due would have to be considered in regard to the currency. If, for instance, a bill for \$1000 is to be paid the day before the interest on the currency is due, the payee will gain \$22 $\frac{1}{2}$ unless the payer stipulates for an allowance, and this allowance must be calculated for the interest on the currency according to the time when the payment falls due. We venture to say no youth fresh from school, and big with plans for paying the national debt and making everybody rich and happy, ever thought of such a puerile scheme as an interest-bearing currency.

But the practical inconvenience is not the only absurdity. The value of the bonds would still depend upon the credit of the Government or country.

They would only fetch what they were worth, as is the case with greenbacks. The memorial says: "The introduction of these bonds will induce business men to use more capital and less credit in their business, because surplus capital invested in these interest-paying bonds will still be money in the hands of the holder." Now, supposing these bonds to become equal to gold in value, how are business men to get them? Are they to be furnished gratuitously by the Government to encourage trade? No; they are to be purchased with capital. But if men of business exchange their capital for these bonds we do not see how they will have more capital in their business and less need of credit. It seems to us that capital, before being invested in these precious bonds, is "money in the hands of the holder." Therefore we do not understand how changing capital for bonds increases the stock of money. Take it all in all, the memorial of the merchants and financiers of New York is the most comic interlude of the war, though we protest it is sorry work to jest upon so grave a subject. Sooner or later the Northerners will have to admit the existence of a national debt, and they will have to fund it; but we do not believe they are likely to try the experiment of an interest-bearing currency. The United States is fast coming to the point when her customers must be compounded with by the funding of the floating debt, and the industry of unborn generations must be pledged to pay the interest on the debt that has been contracted.

The War Debt of North and South.

Some months ago we informed our readers that the expenditure of the Confederate Government, since the commencement of hostilities, had been at the rate of $25,000,000, while that of the Northern Power was $100,000,000 per month; the statement in reference to the former was confirmed by the publication of the official report of the Southern Secretary of the Treasury a few weeks since, and that in relation to the latter has just been verified by the New York merchants in a memorial to the Federal Congress. In other words, the respective indebtedness of the two American Governments will be, on the 1st of January, 1863, $500,000,000 and $2000,000,000.

We, however, disagree with the Wall-street financiers, in the assertion that there can be any new "system of American finance, which will conform to the condition and genius of the people," for monetary affairs in that country must be, to ensure success, conducted on precisely the same principle as in other parts of the civilized world, where commerce is carried on in an extensive manner; we, therefore, desire to point out a few of the false reasonings of these Trans-atlantic economists.

It is true that only $68,000,000 of the Federal debt have been funded in bonds having twenty years to mature; but this is no fault of Mr. Chase, who has had agents in every large city for more than a year endeavouring to dispose of such securities, and even descending to the use of displayed sensation advertisements to pass them upon the people. In addition to this amount there have been sold, principally by cajoling the banks and threatening the extermination of their circulation, $150,000,000 of 7.30-100ths Treasury notes, which, with $62,000,000 of debt prior to the war, makes the whole amount of actual loan $280,000,000. The Treasury notes are due in 1864, and $53,500,000 of the old issue of bonds are payable in 1863, 1865, 1867, 1868, 1871, and 1874. Exclusive of these sums there is a deficit of $1700,000,000, which has been met by the emission of $350,000,000 of irredeemable and inconvertible notes, and $650,000,000 of "certificates of indebtedness" and call deposits, the former at twelve months date; leaving about $700,000,000 unsettled for in any manner. The assertion, then, is false, to say that there was a period when the Treasury could have funded $500,000,000 in 6 per cent. bonds at par; the truth is, that the solid men of the North have never had their hearts in the conflict, as the recent elections prove, and that it has been conducted by the politicians and contractors, the system of credit adopted in the North having thus far facilitated their operations. The loss of the Southern trade paralyzed commerce to such an extent that the business paper, which usually floated to about $800,000,000 or $900,000,000, has been reduced to between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000; contractors' notes, with Government scrip, filling up the space; the displacement of specie and country bank-notes making another void, which "greenbacks" have filled into. But so soon as these channels of credit and currency are completely monopolized by Mr. Chase, the paper house must fall to pieces. It is also true that the "capitalists have their money invested in bonds and mortgages, real estate, State bonds, bank, insurance, and other local stocks," and it may be added that most of the stock and bonds of the Northern and Western railways are owned, some of them exclusively, in Europe. How, then, by any "system" of finance, is Mr. Chase to meet his payments without the aid of a foreign loan, which is entirely impracticable, when trade, commerce, and manufactures shall, after the peace, again ask for the facilities which alone can be obtained in an "easy money market?" The suggestion to create bonds for $20 and upwards bearing 4½ per cent. interest, to the extent of $2,000,000,000, to be used as a legal tender, will turn out to be fruitless; such "new money" cannot be "floated," and will depreciate as rapidly as other kinds of Government issues when placed in competition with gold and silver; and cannot be "absorbed in the business of the country without materially affecting values."

The fact is, there is very little uninvested capital in the Federal States; even that of the banks is, in a great measure, locked up in State bonds, pledged as security for the redemption of their circulation. The whole machinery of commerce is carried on by credit, the mercantile and banking indebtedness to Europe being estimated at $200,000,000, and with the cessation of shipments of breadstuffs this vast sum, now hidden in the various ramifications of trade, will begin to be apparent.

The South is in a different condition; she owes nothing to Europe of a commercial character, and her State and railway bonds and stocks are held principally by her own people. Her vast stores of produce awaiting shipment will speedily place her in a comfortable financial position. At the present time she possesses a larger amount of precious metals per head than her Northern neighbours. Like all agricultural countries, her transactions have been based upon a metallic currency, and hence there has never been a large circulation of bank notes within her borders.

"Supported by Voluntary Contributions."

A distinguished French statesman once said that the sight in all London which most impressed him was that of the above inscription on the façade of our hospitals. His admiration, no doubt, had a political reference: he thought of the absence of State interference, as well as of that public generosity which more than supplied the place of that interference which the public temper will not tolerate. Foreigners are seldom so observant; and Englishmen are, for the most part, too familiar with the special instances of private liberality which fall under their own notice to inquire into the general subject, and ascertain how many useful institutions throughout the country are, like the hospitals, "supported by voluntary contributions." We have, it is true, magnificent endowments bequeathed to us by the charity of generations long since passed away. We have hospitals like Guy's and St. Thomas's; we have schools like Rugby, founded by one Lawrence Sheriff, a citizen of London in the sixteenth century; the Charterhouse, and Christ's Hospital; we have the numerous and wealthy colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, founded by the pious liberality of princes, prelates, noblemen, and even physicians; but the work of to-day is done chiefly by the wealth of to-day, and the wants of each year are met by the contributions which flow in from year to year. Every considerable town has its infirmary, some have two or three, where its sick poor are tended at the charge of their more fortunate fellow-townsmen—tended, says Miss Nightingale, generally much better than those who pay for them are tended in their own hour of need. The poor man who is maimed or injured by the fall of a scaffold or the breaking of a wheelstrap is taken at once to the nearest hospital; and there, admitted without question, here receives without delay all the aid that the highest surgical skill can render him, as promptly and as carefully given as it would be given to the richest of the benefactors who have built and support the hospital; and he is so nursed that the best of nurses has often wished that she could send her wealthy patients to share the benefits of the same care, order, and discipline that are applied to save the life of the peasant, the artisan, or the outcast. Nine-tenths of this good work is paid for by annual subscriptions and donations. Again, the education of the people is provided for in a similar way. Government gives a little aid in money, and a good deal of aid in organization; but even where its aid is received, it is only supplementary to private exertions, and it is only given to a minority of our primary schools. Even when, as in the case of the factory operatives, Parliament takes upon itself to enact that a certain class of children shall be educated, it does not pretend to provide them with education. It is left to masters or parents, to the Church, or to the people, to make such a provision; and the provision is made. The children are taught—well taught, for the most part—and not at the parents' expense. The schools of England are "supported by voluntary contributions." We have missions, doing much good and a little mischief, among the Mahomedans, the heathens, the embroiled savages who cannot even be called heathens, in every quarter of the globe; we have missions to the Jews, which accomplish nothing, and missions to the Catholics, which breed endless feuds, ill-will, and mischief; better than all, we have missionaries working in our back streets, our noisome courts, and pestilential alleys, among the savage heathendom that infests the heart of our civilization, and amid the squalid poverty that gathers round the great centres of our wealth; the Home Missions, the missions to the poor; and all these are "supported by voluntary contributions." Churches are built and endowed, reformatories are maintained for the criminal youth, ragged schools for the infant vagrancy, refuges for the fallen womanhood of the population, "by voluntary contributions." The whole system of Dissenting worship, from the building of chapels and the payment of ministers, down to the smallest expenses of each congregation, is in the main supported by "voluntary contributions." In the country, where every local work is well known in its own neighbourhood, and where men are not estranged from one another by their very aggregation, you will hardly find a family of respectable position that does not set aside a certain sum for local subscriptions, exactly as it sets aside a sum for taxes or for poor-rates. If the amount annually raised for various purposes by voluntary subscriptions could ever be ascertained, we suspect that it would not appear insignificant, even by the side of that enormous taxation which provokes so much comment and complaint. It may be, or it may not be, that England is the most heavily taxed country in the world. That distinction is reasonably disputed by France; and if America should ever think of paying her debts, she may probably have to boast of heavier burdens than those of France; but England is certainly the country whose people tax themselves most heavily in the form of voluntary contributions. And yet, with all their expenditure in doing good, they think they have done too little; and spend large sums in doing pure and unmixed harm by what is known as indiscriminate alms-giving. Catholic teaching, the absence of a poor-law, a national indulgence to the national vice of laziness, rather than a really charitable feeling, may account for the prevalence of mendicancy in Southern countries. But in Protestant England—where, if anywhere, the virtue of mere alms-giving is not unduly exalted, where the reproach of idleness is scarcely less severe than that of cowardice, where the maxim "that if a man will not work, neither shall he eat," is in every mouth, and where the law provides work for all who can work, and food and shelter for those who cannot—the fact that the beggar's trade is a lucrative one speaks volumes for the strength, if not for the soundness, of the charitable instinct of the nation.

It is possible that these instincts have been greatly strengthened and fostered by the traditional ideas of the relation between rich and poor, which still have a powerful hold on the national mind. Except as between employers on a larger scale, trading capitalists, manufacturers, and those whom they employ, this relation is not supposed—at least, it is not felt on either side—to be entirely a matter of bargain. If it were, whence the feeling which dictates respectful demeanour to the man who renders a service, and liberality to him who pays for it? The habitual overpayment of domestic servants, the gratuities to servants at hotels, to railway employés, and so forth, all are relics of the old feudal idea, that liberality is one of the duties of a gentleman. If equality between class and class were really recognized by society as by the law, there would be no reason for any of these things—no cause why we should think it shabby to give a cabman sixpence for driving 1759 yards, or why we should pay a servant higher wages in proportion to the length of time he or she has been in our service. Between equals, overpayment is neither offered nor accepted, and liberality, beyond a certain point, would be mere impertinence. The principle of the Poor Law, too, that the people who live on the land have a claim on the land for subsistence—a principle not strictly in accordance with economical laws, but of almost immemorial antiquity in the law of England, has no doubt done a good deal to teach, in a practical fashion, the doctrine that charity is the duty of wealth. In the face of that law, and of the social usages of England, no landowner can fancy that he has an absolute moral right to do as he will with his own. At the same time, we must admit that where feudal traditions have least influence, and where the higher classes, in the name of political economy, theoretically repudiate the duty of maintaining the poor, English liberality is as conspicuous as anywhere else. The merchants and manufacturers of Lancashire have always been liberal subscribers to every local and national object; and we could point to many and many a country place where a millowner, worth perhaps £100,000, has done as much for his people as would any landowner with an estate of four times that value; to dozens of cases in which the same class are spending on the relief of those whom they once employed many thousands a year out of an income of much less than nothing.

One reason which may have something to do with English generosity should be briefly noticed—the honour in which trade and industry are held. There are countries in which men enter into trade only in order to get out of it as soon as possible; in which firms of fifty years' standing are almost unknown; each man retiring as early as he can, and making money only in order to retire. This is not the case in England. Business concerns descend from father to son for many generations; men live and die in harness, not from necessity, but from choice; they are not saving in order to have done with their calling, for they respect it and enjoy it; and therefore they can afford to bestow on the poor a part of that constant increase in their wealth which they never intend to interrupt by withdrawing from business.

Such is the ordinary course of charity in England. We are now witnessing one of its extraordinary exertions. Men still young have seen several such. The Irish famine drew from the national purse of England a nominal loan and real gift of eight millions. The sufferings of our soldiers in the Crimean war called forth from the nation not merely passionate expressions of anger against the Government, but lavish gifts for their relief; and, to provide for the widows and orphans of those who fell in that war, a fund was raised which, if we mistake not, reached the sum of one million sterling. Immense subscriptions were raised for the benefit of those who fell victims to the treachery of the Bengal soldiery in 1857; and not long afterwards a very large sum was collected for the relief of a portion of our Indian provinces which were afflicted by famine. Already very little, if at all, less than a million has been raised for the relief of the operatives who are deprived of bread by the American war; and this in despite of the diligent efforts of the leading journal to discourage national charity by accusing the wealthy men of Lancashire of neglecting their duty in the matter. England has behaved nobly towards the sufferers; but it is impossible to overrate the generosity of the class most maligned—a class who, be it remembered, are themselves suffering ruinous losses by the cotton famine. Men whose mills are a dead loss to them are spending the money which they fairly earned in prosperous years to support the hands to whom they paid in those years the full value of their labour; men who are sustaining a dead loss of from £2000 to £10,000 a year are spending twice as much in this kind of charity; and we are told of one firm which has sacrificed £50,000 rather than let its workpeople starve, while the Times' correspondent was reviling it for not giving to the Relief Fund. It is not merely in the patience of the poor that England may be proud of Lancashire. Nor has she cause to be ashamed of herself. In what other country would the attempt be made to do what she is now doing? where in the world could be found half a million and upwards of human beings wholly or chiefly "supported by voluntary contributions"?

Carl Russell's Danish Despatch.

Lord Russell has completely vindicated himself from the charge of timidity, by writing and publishing a diplomatic despatch which is so bold and so outspoken as to be almost insolent and insulting; but our courteous Foreign Secretary knows that on great occasions there is merit in disregarding the niceties of official etiquette, and the exacting politeness with which it is usual for one Government to treat another, even when the two Governments are hostile. This despatch of Lord Russell's, which we elsewhere reproduce, may well excite the envy of Mr. Seward, for it is impossible that that gentleman, or any other United States' Minister, will be able under any circumstances whatever to assume a haughtier tone towards a foreign Power; and to reply to Lord Russell's despatch by defiance and a declaration of war would be but poor revenge; for no rejoinder, be it ever so indignant, can equal the high-handed character of our Foreign Secretary's expostulation. Henceforth, whatever Lord Russell's enemies may say of him, they cannot accuse him of a want of pluck—that quality so greatly esteemed among Englishmen. His famous Durham letter, in which he defied the thunders of the Vatican and recalled the daring of the martyrs of the Reformation, was a mild dove-like epistle compared to that brave despatch which the London Gazette of Tuesday last gave to the world. We have on several occasions felt it our duty to hint, and even plainly to declare, that in our opinion the conduct of the noble lord was sometimes tinged with pusillanimity. We have thought, and we have said, that Lord Russell has betrayed a want of spirit in his dealings with the Federal Government; it is, therefore, but an act of justice on our part to direct particular attention to the manner in which this charge has been rebutted:

Lord Russell instructs our representative to inform the Government to which he is accredited that he is persuaded it "has not sufficiently reflected on the evils of its present position," and that "Her Majesty's Government are desirous, with a view to the maintenance of the United States, and not to its dismemberment or its subversion, to point out more fully the obligations of the Federal Government and the means of fulfilling them." He reminds Mr. Seward "that no argument, ab inconvenienti, can be allowed to prevail against positive stipulations and honourable engagements," and "considerations of this kind must yield to the demands of justice and to the good faith due from a Government towards those with whom it has contracted engagements." Thus our bold, not to say audacious, Foreign Secretary, in a plain and unvarnished manner, charges the Federal Government with dishonourable shuffling. Further on, in the same undaunted style, he notifies to Mr. Seward that he (Lord Russell) did not choose to place implicit, or indeed any, faith in the assertions of the Federal Government, and that "some time ago a British agent was sent into the South to ascertain on which side the truth lay;" and he goes on to state that the British agent pointed out certain grievances, which Her Majesty's Government reported to the Federal Government, and that the replies to his remonstrance "appeared to Her Majesty's Government to be insufficient and illusory." Surely, than this stronger language could not be employed. In private life such observations, even from a superior to an inferior, would be considered ill-bred and impertinent; but the position of our noble Foreign Secretary prevents any such epithets being applied to his despatch, calculated as it is to assure Europe that the diplomacy of England, under the direction of Lord Russell, instead of being feeble and subdued, is, on the contrary, singularly lofty and daring. Towards the conclusion of the brilliant State document before us, the noble lord lectures the Federal Government upon being influenced by passions excited by a long controversy; and hopes "that the long and bitter dispute may at last be terminated in such a manner as may be consistent with the honour and conducive to the interests of all parties concerned." But in order to effect this he suggests the only possible means is "to adopt a plan framed upon the basis which I have suggested."

What reply will be made to this remarkable despatch? This time last year we were preparing for war on account of the Trent outrage; may we not still more anticipate the outbreak of hostilities on account of the defiant conduct of our undaunted Foreign Secretary? Not at all. A fortunate mistake saves us from the danger. Lord Russell has not insulted the Federal Government; the bold despatch is not addressed to the Foreign Secretary of the United States, though evidently intended for that Power—which is the bugbear of Lord Russell—but it is addressed to M. Hall, the Foreign Secretary of the little kingdom of Denmark, which may be lectured, insolently lectured with impunity, because she has no means of resenting the insolence of a great Power. The British agent was not sent to the South, but to the little Duchy of Sleswig. It is clear Lord Russell prepared the draft of the despatch, and his Secretary not duly allowing for the daring of his chief, thought it was intended for Denmark, and so sent it to Mr. Paget instead of to Lord Lyons.

But does this detract from Lord Russell's claim to be considered the boldest of bold Ministers? We ought rather to rejoice that by a clerical error his boldness has not led us into difficulty, or for an instant assuming that Lord Russell intended the despatch for the court to which it is addressed, should we not rather admire the ingenuity with which he shows what big words he can use, without in the slightest degree compromising the security of English commerce, or incurring the slightest danger of involving England in war? People have said Lord Russell was afraid to intervene in the American contest, even so much as to join with France in the proposal of an armistice. Well, is it not possible to be brave and prudent? Did not the gallant Sir John Falstaff gain a reputation for heroism without encountering the slightest personal risk? We know the disposition of our countrymen, and it is not impossible that they may feel somewhat indignant at Lord Russell's spirited intermeddling in the domestic concerns of a small but gallant and independent nation, which has always been highly esteemed by England, not only on account of its present worth, but by reason of past associations—a nation from which the future King of England has selected his Royal bride, much to the gratification of the people of this country. But Englishmen, if they will not adopt our theory of the clerical error, must not allow their chivalry to make them forget that Lord Russell could not treat an independent Government insolently without danger of retaliation, unless he selected a Government too weak to retaliate. What more can we desire than such an union of unsurpassed boldness, combined with the most statesman-like prudence?

Butler's war on women, Turchin's infamy at Athens, the savage inhumanity of McNeil, the often-repeated insults to the British flag are the things that justify our prudent Foreign Secretary in presenting a spirited, even insulting remonstrance to the Federal Government; but because the Danish Government in its own Duchy of Sleswig insists—we do not say rightfully or wrongfully, for we are not entering into the merits of the dispute—upon the children of its subjects who speak the German language passing an examination in Danish before they can receive the rite of confirmation, and because in Sleswig there is not perfect liberty of the press, Lord Russell would not think of lecturing the Danish Government in a style that a Belgravian menial would not tolerate from his master. We grant Lord Russell's conduct is not courteous, but we repeat again and again, that it is not mean-spirited, because the despatch which found its way to Copenhagen was intended for Washington.

Most of our readers will recollect an anecdote told about George III. and the British envoy upon whom devolved the unpleasant duty of communicating to the Danish Prince the demand of the English Government for the surrender of the Danish fleet. His Majesty asked the envoy whether his Danish cousin had received the communication on the ground floor of his palace, and upon receiving an affirmative reply, remarked, "that was fortunate, for I know something of his spirit, and if your interview had been upon the first floor, you might probably have been kicked down-stairs." Perhaps our bold but very prudent Foreign Secretary, if he did intend the despatch for Denmark, accompanied it with a private note to Mr. Paget, in which he cautioned that gentleman against reading the despatch to M. Hall at any inconvenient altitude from terra firma. If the Danish Minister had so far forgotten good manners as to assault our representative, we should of course have been highly indignant, and our Government would forthwith, and very properly, have bombarded the undefended city of Copenhagen; but for all that there are thousands and thousands of Englishmen who would have thought the insulting despatch something like a justification of M. Hall's violence. But here again we have an instance of Lord Russell's good fortune. If the despatch had been addressed to some small Powers, it might have led to retaliatory insults which we could not avenge without a loss of dignity; but no provocation can make the Danish Government forget its self-respect, and although M. Hall may reply to the despatch with becoming spirit, he will do so with such courtesy as not to offend the sensitiveness of the English Government or of the people of whom Lord Russell is the representative to foreign courts.

Garotting in London.

Amongst the sensation items in a late New York telegram was one to the effect that Richmond was in a fearful condition of lawlessness, in consequence of the presence of garotters. This intelligence is taken from a paper which is not celebrated for toning down unpleasant facts, but all that we could gather from the paragraph in question was, that there are some thieves in Richmond who ply their vocation in the streets after sunset. We could not discover anything in such an announcement to account for the rejoicing manifested by the amiable and Christian friends of the North. It does not seem to us that there is any more prospect of the Southern population being exterminated by garotters than there is of the Federal armies conquering the South. No one has asserted that there is not a criminal population in the South, though statistical returns show that it is less numerous, and comprises a less percentage of the entire population than it does in the North. In Richmond, as in Boston, there are persons who prefer to steal rather than to work, though we admit that in Boston religion is used as a cloak for villany; whilst in the Confederate capital scoundrels make no pretence to sanctity. But the absurdity of assuming the demoralization of the South because there are some garotters in Richmond is still more palpable when we consider the present condition of London. Just now our city is panic-stricken, and strong men feel a little nervous when they are out after dusk, and anxious wives are distracted if their husbands are five minutes later than usual in returning home. The tradesmen have suffered from a panic which is, indeed, anything but groundless. There have been a number of cases of garotting in public thoroughfares, calculated to terrify the timid, and to make the brave somewhat nervous. If, allowing for the difference in population, 5 per cent of the late London garotting has taken place in Richmond, we can quite understand that it has caused a great deal of alarm and indignation. But we do not conclude that London is a lawless city, even when such things take place in a time of profound peace; although we may think that the executive, or the system of repression, is to blame.

Garotting is the term now popularly applied to street robberies with violence. No doubt the violence is partly due to the savagery of the garotters, and partly to a hope of intimidating the public. They will not believe that honesty is the best policy, but they might learn from experience that brutal violence is very bad policy. In the good old times, when highwaymen were mounted, and stopped carriages in melodramatic style, they offered their victims the option of life or money; but with garotters it is not "Your money or your life;" but first they make an attack, inflicting bodily injury and endangering life, and afterwards steal money and jewellery. And, in some cases, if they get the plunder easily, they inflict the violence afterwards; so it is no use submitting to the loss of property, but it is better to offer strenuous resistance. The truth is, however, that individuals can do little or nothing to protect themselves against such violence, and they must rely upon the authorities for their safety.

We suppose no one, except Sir Joshua Jebb and Sir George Grey, has any doubt that the present panic is due to the ticket-of-leave system, which turns our convicts loose as soon as they have been long enough in prison to recruit their health and strength. In fact, the hard labour to which our burglars are assigned is only part of their sanitary training; and we venture to say they do not go through half the exertion or endure half the privations of a prize-fighter whilst he is in training. We only repeat what is true when we assert that, so far as care and comfort are concerned, it is better in this country to be a convict than a pauper, and that whilst the former leaves the prison in the enjoyment of robust health, the latter leaves the workhouse dispirited and debilitated. We do not advocate a harsh treatment of our criminals, but we consider the discipline ought to be felt as a punishment, so that when the convict's term expires he should be anxious to avoid another conviction. What we most dislike is granting tickets of leave. It is both inexpedient and unjust. The duration of the punishment is left to the discretion of the judge, so that he may be able to apportion it according to the enormity of the offence and the previous character of the offender. Now, what right has Sir Joshua Jebb, or the Home Secretary, or any other person, to interfere with the discretion of the judge and the punishment of the convict? If our judges cannot be trusted why trouble them to pass sentence? Why not leave the degree and duration of punishment to Sir Joshua Jebb? The argument about the hope of getting their freedom inducing good behaviour is not worth much. If a man truly repents he does so from a higher motive than the hope of escaping deserved punishment; and if a convict does not behave himself well he ought to have some punishment in addition to that for the offence for which he is imprisoned. It seems to us a moral contradiction to say to a convict, "You have been sentenced to ten years' penal servitude for burglary with violence, and you deserve the punishment; but conduct yourself well in prison, and you shall not be punished more than so-and-so who is convicted for four years for a much less offence. If you behave yourself badly, you shall remain your full time in prison." Our criminals are sharp enough to appreciate the natural results of such unjust proceedings. They know that it does not matter whether the judge sentences them to four or ten years' penal servitude; with a little hypocrisy they can get out at the end of four years, and consequently, if they determine to commit a crime, they may as well commit a great crime, since the punishment is no greater. Small offenders have no mercy shown them, it is only atrocious criminals whose sentences are modified by our benevolent authorities.

The so-called garotting and ticket-of-leave systems, though new in England, are well known in those of our colonies which formerly received our convicts. In one case in Australia two convicts had robbed in a few days no less than eighteen backwoods' travellers. But the Australian is more merciful than the London garotter. He first bids his victim throw up his hands, and if his mandate is obeyed no personal violence is offered; but if there is resistance the garotter shoots his victim, generally through the leg, and after robbing him ties him up to a tree in the bush. These deeds of violence becoming very numerous, the ticket-of-leave men were placed under a rigid supervision, and if caught in any act of violence were summarily and effectively disposed of by Lynch law, and a convict is easily distinguished by the peculiar halt in his walk, which results from his having a heavy weight attached to his right leg. We ought, at least, so far to follow the colonial plan that if a convict is a second time found guilty of a serious offence against the laws he ought not to be allowed another chance of making war upon society; or we might compel the released convict to report himself from time to time to the police authorities, and if he cannot show that he is earning an honest livelihood let him be forthwith remitted to prison; for if a man cannot live by fair means he will inevitably resort to robbery. Surveillance is necessary even when the convict has served his full term; with a ticket-of-leave man, something more than surveillance is needed. We hope that an increase in the police, the severe sentences of the judges, and a modification, if not the abolition, of the ticket-of-leave system, will put an end to garotting in London. If not, we must try other means. Ruffians are arrant cowards, as may be seen from their attacking in gangs, and from their hasty flight if any resistance is offered. If all other efforts of repression fail, it has been suggested by some of our contemporaries that those concerned in garotte robberies should be publicly whipped and then imprisoned for life, and we have no doubt that such a regulation would have the desired effect. Better still is the proposal of Mr. Justice Byles—to return to the punishment of transportation. It is the punishment the convict peculiarly dreads, yet it is the most merciful that can be inflicted on him. Away from his old associations, and with the means of earning his bread honestly, he has every chance and encouragement to forsake his evil ways; and we know that in Australia convicts have become useful members of society. We have a colony willing to take our convicts, and the expenses of transportation is not worth consideration.

Reviews.

GREECE AND THE GREEKS.*

Notwithstanding the attractiveness of the struggle that now convulses the New World, the little and hitherto bloodless revolution in Greece is, from association and from the possible political complications involved in the change of dynasty or form of government, an event which men regard with interest and anxiety. The publication of Miss Bremer's travels at such a juncture will induce many persons to read them for the purpose of gleanings something new about the political and social condition of the Greeks. Nor will they be altogether disappointed, though the most valuable part of the work is that which describes the place rather than the people. Miss Bremer is an enthusiast, but not a visionary. She admires the beauty of the scenery and the climate; and every rock, name, and ruin recalls to her mind some incident in Greek history or Greek mythology; but she does not forget the peculiar charms of a Swedish winter, or the faults of the Greek heroes, or that Greek philosophy, wonderful in its way, is not to be compared to the Divine philosophy of Christianity. "For I know something still higher, O Hellas, than thy sacred temples—something nobler than thy wine." In these days of literary pantheism it is pleasant to meet with an author who can admire without worshipping, and who does not regard everything above mediocrity as a divinity. Since, "it is not every one that can go to Corinth," Miss Bremer's account of the country is a valuable book, because it is not only didactically truthful, but feelingly truthful. It is not the kind of information we get from a hand-book or a gazetteer—it is not a map, but a panorama. If we were inclined to be censorious, we might complain of such digressions as that in which we have a slight sketch of the life and eloquence of Demosthenes; but where there is general excellence we do not think it necessary or gracious to note minor imperfections; and, moreover, Miss Bremer's digressive passages are not put in here and there for the sake of filling up the two volumes, but are always appropriate, and never so spun out as to be wearisome.

Our author is not free from the common prejudice that the present inhabitants of Greece are the lineal representatives of the ancient Greeks, and we know it would be useless to adduce arguments to prove to a Philhellenic that there is less old Greek blood in Greece than there is old Roman blood in Rome. The actors appear on an old stage, wear an antique costume, and speak a language that bears some affinity to the old language, and it is therefore assumed that they are of the same race as the old actors. We have not the slightest desire to disparage the Greeks, but it is absurd to reverence them as the offspring of the men who made little Greece so great and imperial in the empire of mind and government. In vain do enthusiasts like Byron and Constantin Rhigas exhort the people, by the memory of a past with which they are unconnected, to emulate the deeds of that past. It is not the country that makes the people, but the people make the country. In every clime the Anglo-Saxon race manifests commanding energy, and the brave Swiss would not be the tools of a tyrant, though sunny Naples became their abode. The present Greeks have a mission, but it is not that of conquest. Let them do well with the few talents now committed to them, and hereafter their dominion may be extended. Miss Bremer remarks that the Industrial Exhibition consisted of two departments—the one devoted to products of agriculture and home manufacture, and the other to works of art—and that "the products of industry seem to be less worthy of observation, and are said not to show any marked advance within the last thirty years." Now, in these times commerce is the only and the sure road to national power, and if the modern Greeks desire to become nationally great they must develop to the utmost the resources of their country. We do not denounce the sword as a last resort, but it is riches that make the appeal to the sword possible. No one doubts the pluck of modern Greeks, and it is equally certain that they have a genius for trading. In our own community Greek firms are noted for the extent of their dealings and their prosperity; and it is the same in Constantinople and in other places. Greek merchants do not devote the whole of their energies to trade. Politics and literature claim no inconsiderable share of their attention. Some excellently written and even profound scientific works have lately been published by Greek merchants who are well known "on Change." This proof of capacity and vigour gives us better hope of the progress of Greece than any of the dreams of Philhellenes. The Greeks would not be so prone to national castle-bulding, if it were not for the encouragement of their foreign friends.

The political incidents noted by Miss Bremer have just now an exceptional claim on our notice, because the revolution that sent King Otho and his Queen into exile, though now a very little cloud, may soon darken the whole political horizon of Europe. It is a difficulty that the election of Prince Alfred to the vacant throne, whether he accepts the crown or not, will increase; and as diplomatists do not seem prepared with any plan for settling the difficulty, it is not impossible, though we hope improbable, that the sword may be called into requisition to cut the Gordian knot.

Unfortunately for Greece, she owes her existence entirely to European assistance, as is very clearly set forth in our author's succinct history of the War of Independence. The Greeks were unable to cope with the power of Turkey, and though the nations of Europe sympathized with their gallant struggle for freedom, the Governments would not intervene until they were prostrated, and then the Great Powers imposed their law upon Turkey. By this course both Turkey and Greece were weakened, a result which did not advance the Eastern interests of the Western Powers. Greece, then, is to some extent in bonds to the great Powers, or her right to elect a prince to her throne would not have been so openly canvassed and so stoutly denied as it has been. It is a farce to talk of Greece being independent if her people are limited in the choice of a Sovereign by a protocol signed by foreign Powers. The failure of the Government of King Otho, or rather of Queen Amalia, was owing to the commonplace cause of having a written Constitution opposed to the de facto system of government. A sham Constitution is worse than no Constitution at all. The Chambers were filled with creatures of the Government: and the people became disgusted with the mockery of constitutionalism.

But if King Otho had been as constitutional in his rule as Queen Victoria, it is not at all certain that at this moment he would have been seated on the throne of Greece.

Young Greece considers the time to be come for the great catastrophe in the East, and is all on fire to arm and hold itself in readiness, either to-morrow or the day after to-morrow, to take possession of Constantinople. It has neither eyes, ears, nor thought for any other object than this, which is one with the political extension of Greece.

One of the most unjustifiable demands made by the Greeks on their monarch is that he should place himself at the head of the Greek martial force, and go to war with Turkey. "At the same moment," say these fiery heads, "the Greek population in all the Turkish provinces—in Thessaly, Albania, Macedonia, Syria, and on the islands—should rise, and make common cause with Greece, and then the whole of Greece would be united into one free, great, and powerful kingdom."

Thus no king will be popular who does not defy the whole power of Europe, and embark the fortunes of his people in a hopeless enterprise. Do the Greeks think in this respect Prince Alfred would suit them better than King Otho? We can assure them that the whole influence of England would be exerted to stop such a ruinous proceeding, and if the scheme was persevered in it would be forcibly opposed by England, notwithstanding the election of an English prince. Constitutional King Alfred would have to tell his subjects that it is the duty of a Government not only to do justice at home, but to act fairly abroad, and that whatever may be the destiny of Greece she must wait the course of events, and meanwhile observe treaties; and it is likely that the English prince would be more unpopular than the Bavarian, because more in this respect is expected of him. We are a loyal people, but we have not much regard for dynastic ties, and we should not think of injuring England for the sake of benefitting a member of the Royal house, or rather a country that selected a ruler from our Royal family. If other nations want our princes they must take them without the dowry of our possessions or our political influence.

* Greece and the Greeks. The Narrative of a Winter Residence and Summer Travel in Greece and its Islands. By Frederika Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt. (London: Hurst and Blackett.)

Miss Bremer reminds us that the Greeks are only united on particular occasions, as that in 1823.

The same Greek demon which, in the most ancient times, split up Greece by intestine feuds, which caused the Peloponnesian war, and later led to the calling in of foreign Powers to decide the internal warfare of parties, or to give a preponderance to some of them—the demon which opened the way for the Romans to Greece, for Frank domination, and afterwards for the Turks—the demon of individual ambition and selfishness again came forth on the theatre of action in the hour of the regeneration of Greece, and threatened to nullify all the victories it had won, and to hurl it anew into disunion and anarchy.

Indeed, it is the spirit of faction that prevents the Greeks choosing a native prince for king, and it is certain to make a foreign ruler sooner or later unpopular. Let him be ever so impartial, he will not escape the charge of favouritism.

Still more important is the religious question. The members of the Liberation Society may be right or wrong in their views as to the evils of an alliance between the Church and State; but they will not, we presume, deny the evil of a king professing a different religion to that of his subjects. Miss Bremer dwells on the peculiar position of the Hellenic branch of the Greek Church. It has a tendency to approximate to the doctrines of the Protestant Church—as against the Romish Church, it has always been Protestant.

The Greek Church has stood like a firm wall as well against Mahomedanism as against the encroachments of Roman Catholicism. It has never been a persecuting or bloody Church; it has not made but it has given martyrs for the Christian faith. It has shown a great ability to penetrate the national life, to become one with it.

We think the Hellenic Greek Church is likely to become a reformed Church, but the reformation must come from within her pale, and not from the labour of those without her communion; as has been the case with all Church reformations. A monarch who is an alien to the Greek faith cannot encourage, much less lead, a reformation without a grave suspicion of an intention to force his own faith upon his subjects; yet if he remain quiescent and impartial he is hindering a momentous work, and a work which, if undertaken, is sure to enlist the warmest sympathies of his people. The throne of Greece is by no means a bed of roses, and the prospects of the prince who receives the crown are not particularly brilliant. We do not the less wish Greece well because we see the dangers that beset her future career. There is no reason for despair, but every reason for anxious care—a single false step might make the regeneration of Greece a thing of the past.

As a specimen of the lively passages with which this excellent book abounds, we will extract an account of a royal ball, at which Prince Alfred was the “observed of all observers.”

England's young Prince Alfred makes, in the meantime, sunshine at Athens. Yesterday a great ball was given for him at the Palace. I also was amongst the guests, in consequence of an invitation from Her Majesty. I had already seen the young Prince in Malta, but I was very willing to see a royal ball at Athens; and at eight in the evening I accordingly went to the Palace. The Prince had grown since I saw him last—now a year since—but had still the same charming characteristic, the unpretending boy united to the gentleman in bearing and fine tact. It was beautiful to see the graceful, simple lad, out of uniform and without the slightest distinguishing ornament, leading in the polonaise, which always here opens the ball, the Queen of Greece, resplendent with jewels and good humour, a real Semiramis, a queenly figure, captivating all eyes. This evening, however, perhaps the greater number were captivated by the unpretending son of Queen Victoria. During the polonaise their Majesties gave their hands to one and another person present, belonging to the diplomatic corps or other notabilities, and led them a turn round the hall. After that the dancing became general, and people danced as in other European capitals, francaises and waltzes. You might have fancied yourself in any one of these ball-rooms, had not some old-Greek costumes reminded you that you were in Athens. Amongst the young ladies wearing the Greek costume, the prettiest were two of the Queen's maids of honour, Aspasia Karbonny and Marie Grivas, whose gold-embroidered spencers—kontougonies—and red fezzes, with long tassels of dark-blue silk and gold, were extremely becoming to their slender figures and beautiful heads. A couple of Smyrniote fezzes, worn also by very pretty heads, seemed to me overloaded with gold embroidery. The Hydriote head-dress is not particularly becoming in a ball-room however richly embroidered its silk kerchiefs may be; still it gives to the head and the figure a peculiarly modest grace, especially when, as was the case here, the young dancing ladies who wore them were distinguished by an expression of goodness and gentleness, which I have so often seen amongst the ladies of the islands. The dresses were of heavy, costly materials, but they who wore them were not therefore the less light and graceful in the dance. Most of the dancing ladies wore wreaths, gauze, and crinolines—tout comme chez nous. No gentlemen wore the Greek costume, excepting officers and the King's adjutants, in most cases heavy with gold embroidery. Around the dancing circle stood or sat from three to four hundred spectators, amongst whom I observed twenty or thirty old-fashioned costumes and countenances on the men's side, and about the same number on that of the ladies, for here the two are separated as if in church. More than one elderly lady, whose daughter was dancing in the modern costume, sat herself in the royal ball-room in her fur-bordered kaftan, and with her Athenian kerchief carelessly rolled round her head, unlaced and unembarrassed, and as much at her ease as if she were sitting in her own “sal” or “aula.” Amongst the men I became acquainted with some Palicars from the time of the War of Independence, who were here, it was said, merely to see the young English Prince.

Did the Palicars foresee the revolution of 1862, and think of the young Prince as their future Sovereign? We suppose not; but we may be sure that the young Prince, if not the Queen, would have laughed heartily if any one had intimated to them the possibility of what has now occurred—that in so short a time she should be in exile, and that her partner, “the graceful, simple lad,” would be chosen by the Greeks to fill the throne left vacant by the revolutionary dethronement of her husband.

SHORT NOTICES.

A Treatise on the Continued Fevers of Great Britain. By Dr. MURCHISON. (London: Parker, Son, and Bourn).

If the public benevolence in reference to the distress in Lancashire needed stimulating, this work would have the desired result. We have heard very much about the average mortality of the cotton famine districts, but we must remember that if the approach of death is slow, it is not less sure. As we remarked some months since, if few of the operatives die from the immediate effects of destitution, many die from the effects of the famine when the rich have forgotten the sufferings of the poor in the return of plenty. Fever, especially typhus, is brought about by destitution, and this Dr. Murchison proves by authorities and by statistics. He recommends prevention by the immediate alleviation of want; and he also directs attention to the sanitary regulations, which are useful adjuncts to the supply of food and clothing. His advice would be of great practical value to those who are superintending the relief in Lancashire.

Campaigning with General Pope. The “Cornhill Magazine” for December. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)

If General Pope had known what a chiel for taking notes the writer of this article is, he would not have allowed him to accompany his expedition. The vulgar, boastful manner, and the character of the general who did great wonders on paper, and was so quickly extinguished in Virginia, are faithfully and graphically portrayed. The battle of Cedar Mountain is described with considerable power, as the narrator does not attempt to give a professional account of the engagement, but details what he saw, and the impressions produced on his mind by the conflict and the after survey of the battlefield. Unlike most eye-witnesses of battles, he does not pretend to ubiquity, or to understand the plan of the fight better than the general himself.

ENGLAND, THE AMERICAN UNION, AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—There are not at present two opinions concerning the imbecility and blindness of the poor creatures who, seventy or eighty years ago, governed the British Empire under George III. Yet they were at that time considered statesmen. Fashion, general opinion, literature, party, united in accepting them in that quality. The French Emisary reported, on his return from America, that he had been astonished at the fervent loyalty of the Americans; that they were ready to grant any money to George III. if he would only ask it through their State Legislatures, and not seek to extort it by acts of the British Legislature. This gentleman had no difficulty in seeing and recognizing the real state of things in America. The statesmen of George III. did not, and could not, and would not see it, and the fashion of the day, the Houses of Lords and Commons, maintained them in their blindness. “In vain did Burke warn, and Chatham exclaim, ‘This is the paltry scheme of a miserable financier, bringing a peppercorn into the Exchequer at the cost of millions to the country.’”

The tale is old, but what a lesson does it give! Men in power, when a great political question is beginning to arise, seem almost always to be surprised in its origin into some superficial view of its nature. They are accepted as the authorities; and they see nothing in it—nothing to be alarmed at; thereafter their self-love leads them to go on with their first hasty views and impressions, which thus become gradually fixed opinions: to go back upon these, to re-examine them, would look like confessing themselves mistaken. Hence they are insensibly led, in subsequent stages, to dispute the character of plain facts, and frequently to shut their eyes to them altogether. Their growing prejudices are generally strengthened by what they learn from their subordinates, who are, not unnaturally or intentionally, led to view everything in the light which harmonizes best with the ideas of their superiors. Thus there forms around them a sort of public opinion which encourages them in a career more or less disastrous, according as the subject to which it relates is more or less important to the welfare of the country and mankind.

To tell the Norths, the Butes, the Wedderburns, of the present day, that, previous to the year 1839, the sovereign States of the South had unalterably resolved—on the specific ground of the violation of the Federal Constitution by the tariff of spoliation which the New England States had imposed upon them—to secede from the Union; to tell them that in that year the leader of the South urged an English gentleman, to whom he had fully explained the position of the South, and the intolerable tyranny which the North inflicted upon it, to be the bearer of credentials from the chief persons of the South, in order to invite the attention of the British Government to the coming event; that on his death-bed he called around him his political friends (one of whom is now in England)—warned them that in no event could the Union survive the Presidential election of 1860, though it might possibly break up before that; urged them to be prepared; leaving with his dying words the sacred cause of Southern secession a solemn legacy in their hands—to have told this to Norths and Dartmouths of the present day, with more and even stronger evidence of the coming event, in November 1860, would have been like speaking to the stones of the street. In November 1860, they were thoroughly ignorant of all the momentous antecedents of Secession—of their nature, their character, their bearing, import, and consequences.

So when this mighty event took place, one of them—and he not the least among them—expressed himself as thinking that the secession of the South was the most unwarrantable, unprovoked, uncalled for political act he had ever known or heard of, and that it must soon come to nothing. He was thoroughly ignorant of the grounds of it. Had he been at all aware of them—perhaps had he even suspected them merely—he would have seen the reasons why the war, if once begun, could never come to an end in reality but by the armed interference of England and France; he would have seen this, because he would have felt and known that the South was fighting to defend itself against the continuance of a spoliation which at last amounted to the confiscation of one-half of its annual production; and the North to secure the continued possession of the only market it can hope to have for commodities in the production of which it has invested millions upon millions of capital. That capital, by Southern secession, becomes entirely valueless as far as it is invested in manufacturing plants, and almost entirely valueless as far as it is invested in shipping. Men will fight hard enough to preserve a natural market, but monopolists—as history, if read aright, evinces, and as our experience of the action of Trades' Unions confirms—will shrink from no crimes and sacrifices to preserve a market unjustly and artificially created. These two antagonistic motives—resistance to spoliation on one side, and lust for it on the other—are all powerful in human affairs; their potency has now placed arms in the hands of the South and the North; and the North, which has held the South in fee so long, desperate and frantic at the revolt of its vassal, will fight for ever to regain its lucrative ascendancy, and now, since that is impossible, to exterminate, as they openly avow, the people of the South. And, on the other hand, the South, it is very clear, prefers, and nobly prefers, extermination to submission. In this frightful contest there is no possibility of compromise. Mediation, arbitration, are wholly inapplicable to the real nature of the case. They cannot even touch its foundation. “We do not want you; we will have nothing whatever to do with you; you shall not rob us any longer; we loathe and abhor you,” says the South. “We will, in despite of you, be your factors, merchants, manufacturers, and carriers,” says the North; “and if we find we can rob you no longer we will certainly exterminate you.”

This is the real and true condition of things in this contest—let the Times and the Westminster and Edinburgh Reviews say what they like; it will not be altered in any respect by any success of the Democratic party in the late elections; and how long it is to be permitted to continue, to the scandal, not merely of civilization, but of human nature itself, depends upon England and France. It will continue until one or other, or both, of these Powers shall blockade the coast from Portland down to the Chesapeake, and then it will terminate in two or three months. Even if the North and West should come to blows between themselves, as probably they will before long, and if the finance of the North should blow up, as it certainly will, this frightful contest will drag on; for New York, New England, and Pennsylvania must continue in it, or consent to fall from the pinnacle of profit and power on which they have hitherto stood. The Emperor of the French—honour be to him for it—seems to think that there is no other issue to it than intervention. Nor is there.

In our English ideas about foreign politics there are notions and opinions which have the semblance of facts, that pass current from mouth to mouth, which become accepted as facts and acted upon as such without any examination into their real existence. Among these is the general belief in the naval and military power of the Northern States. "To maintain all our operatives on turtle soup and champagne would be cheaper," says Mr. Cobden, as quoted and approved of by the Times, "than a war with America." In the year 1841 the late Sir William Napier sent in two plans, for subduing the Union, to the War Office; in the first of which the South was to be treated as an enemy; in the second, as a friend and ally. I was much consulted by him as to the second plan, and was referred to by name in it, and he showed me the acknowledgment of this in Lord Fitzroy Somerset's letter of reply. This plan fully provided for the contingency of an invasion of Canada, and its application would, in eighteen or twenty months, have reduced the North to a much more impotent condition than it exhibits at present. At this very moment the most difficult portion of that plan has been perfectly accomplished by the South itself; and the North, in accordance with Sir William Napier's expectations, now lies helpless before England, and at our absolute mercy. Nor is there any doubt of this, and if Lord Palmerston is not aware of it, Mr. Seward certainly is. We have nothing remaining to do but to stretch out our arm, in the way Sir William Napier proposed, and the Northern Power—Power as we ignorantly call it—must come to an end. Sir William knew and well estimated the elements of which that quasi-power consisted; and he knew how to apply the substantive power of England to dissolve it. In the best interests of humanity, I venture to say that it is the duty of England now to apply this power without further delay—its duty to itself, to its starving operatives, to France, to Europe, and to humanity. And in the discharge of this great duty to the world at large there will not even be the dignity of sacrifice or danger. For the quasi-power of the North now, at any rate, Primo nutat casura sub Euro.

I pass to another topic. The South—as it seems to me—has mismanaged its case on the point of its recognition by England. Georgia, the two Carolinas, and Virginia, are severally recognized, each by its own proper name, as "free, sovereign, and independent States," in the first article of the Treaty of Peace in 1783, and George III. solemnly declares in it that "He treats with them as such," and as so being. These sovereign States, then, had merely to notify to England that they had dissolved confederation with the Union to which they belonged in 1783, and with that other Union which they formed subsequently, in 1788-89, and, sending each of them their respective Ministers, with the treaty of 1783 in his hand, to call upon England not to violate it. They should now send a Minister to protest against the flagrant breach of that treaty of which England has been guilty towards them, by accepting and treating with the agents and Ministers of the United States' Government, assuming to be agents and Ministers of, inter alia, Georgia, the Carolinas, and Virginia, which England has acknowledged to be severally "free, sovereign, and independent States." They should denounce the proceeding of England as a breach of the treaty of 1783, and declare before the world that she is responsible for affording a precedent by which the faith and trust in English treaties must be for ever shaken. The right of England to accept Mr. Adams, assuming to be Minister and agent of, inter alia, the sovereign State of Virginia only, is far less defensible than would be that of accepting such a personage as M. de la Roche Jacquelin—if appointed by Henry V.—as Minister of France, because Lords Palmerston and Russell know that by "the Act of the sovereign State of Virginia, adopting the Federal Constitution, passed the 25th of June, 1788," that so-titled State reserved to itself the right of retiring from the Union at pleasure; that she has exercised that right; and that competent authority on international law has declared that this exercise of her right by Virginia "drew with it a dissolution of the Union of the United States as existing in 1861—that the remaining sovereign States might, if they should so choose, continue united, and even retain the same title, but by so doing they would not retain all its rights, nor could they be called upon to fulfil all its obligations."

If the sovereign States just named will take up their ground I have just indicated, they will find their position impregnable, legally as well as morally. They may then demand to know by what right England has thought fit, in the face of the treaty of 1783, and of the secession of Virginia in 1861, drawing with it a dissolution of the Union, to recognize as legal a blockade of their territories instituted by an Union which England knows to be legally defunct and dissolved, and which, moreover, flagrantly usurps a right and claims a title to act on behalf of those very sovereignties that have legitimately dissolved it, and renounced all connection with it, and all constituent parts of it, and which blockade is directed against them whom England has recognized as "free, sovereign, and independent," and whose freedom, sovereignty, and independence, she thus becomes an accomplice in infringing.

Such a line of action teems with consequences and advantages all-important to the South, too obvious to need indication, and it will place our actual Wedderburns, Norths, and Dartmouths in a well-deserved dilemma. But should these States—as I fervently hope they will—adopt it, I venture, with the utmost humility, to suggest that they should carefully distinguish between the Ministers of England and the people of England. The latter is perfectly well meaning and honest in the whole of this matter to both North and South—it is ignorant of the real merits of the case—it is a long time in coming to an understanding of them—it has been shamefully misled, but it desires to act rightly and justly to both parties. Its sympathies are almost entirely with the brave and noble South, but it fears, in ignorance of the right, to give practical effect to them. Let the South, therefore, think charitably and tenderly of the people of England. But I should indeed blush to put in a plea for its Ministers. They have consciously acted, as regards the South, with a mean pusillanimity for which I can conceive no excuse, and for which they deserve no mercy. The States I have named now hold them at the strongest moral and legal disadvantage, and will, I hope, avail themselves of their own advantage of position to the utmost extent that is consistent with their own dignity and self-respect. In dealing with such characters let them be confident that they will gain nothing by temporizing and forbearance. Let those States arraign them at once before the world as treaty-breakers, and then, indeed, the nation itself, should it allow them to continue in their present course, will become an accessory after the fact, and will assuredly hear, to its cost—and deservedly hear—of such a delinquency at a future day.

CONSTITUTIONAL LIBERTY.

(From the Richmond Whig.)

"Let no one," says Machiavelli, "who begins an innovation in a State expect that he shall stop it at his pleasure, or regulate it according to his intention." The sagacious Florentine spoke not merely from his profound insight into human nature and his comprehensive knowledge of the science of government, but from long and varied experience of revolutionary agitations. He had witnessed the fierce commotion of turbulent democracies and the restless changes from the dominion of the people to the rule of an oligarchy, and from that to despotism. The mechanism that controlled the operation of those petty States of mediæval Italy whose eventful history bears such a parallel to that of the Grecian republics, had been laid bare to his scrutinizing gaze. He had seen the proscription of the great and the oppression of the humble, the vain effort to repress popular enthusiasm, and the exhaustion of unbridled passion. The throbbings of the national heart had been noted by him with the cool judgment of the scientific anatomist.

The universality of the truth he enunciates has been attested on many more important and extended stages of action. Reformers, who have placed themselves at the head of popular movements, in the hope of securing moderate changes and gradual abolition of abuses, have found themselves in the van of a raging mob, that aimed at nothing less than destruction of existing institutions, and their reconstruction on entirely new foundations. To halt in the advance was to be crushed by the impetuous mob. No alternative existed but to lead, or to become a victim. The cautious and the timorous essay prudent counsels, and are contemptuously cast aside; the bold and unscrupulous dash on in the race, trusting to opportunity, seconded by boldness, to direct the unchained energies, and, finally, to replace the broken barriers by others not less stringent. So may be traced the progress of many struggles for liberty, breaking from abject oppression into wild and lawless license, until the exhausted impetus has borne them into the refuge of despotism.

Now, if it be impossible to check the onward progress of a movement once fairly started, is it less so to confine its operation to the purposes which guided its commencement. Collateral questions, flowing in like branches to a main river, enlarge the volume and extend the surface of its influence. Disturbing causes—opposition more or less effectual, and co-operation, tinged with desires alien to the original question—cause it to deflect from its course, and even to retrace its march. Men, heated by the desire of success, or stung by resentment, are found battling against the very principles of which they had been the original standard-bearers.

There are not wanting signs which may give us just cause for apprehension that in the immensity of the struggle in which the South is now engaged, she may suffer from these inherent perils of revolution. A movement begun for the maintenance of our honour and our rights, resting upon the principle of State Rights, has ripened into a war of so malignant a character and such gigantic dimensions that the preservation of the common existence has become the paramount and almost the only consideration. In the discussion of the means necessary to accomplish the end, their expediency is almost the only point touched upon. Constitutional limits are not investigated with that minute nicety which has so often illustrated the acuteness of Southern statesmen. That the safety of the republic is the supreme law is proclaimed, and until that is secure all other questions must be adjourned.

Acting upon these principles, men may be found in Congress and out of it, avowing doctrines which under the old Union they would have been quick to protest against. The lines which separate State from Federal or Confederate authority are to a great extent ignored. The Conscription Bill has been voted for by gentlemen who intimate more than doubts as to its constitutionality, and other measures of similar character are treated as matters of course.

To any objection to these measures the answer is ready. The emergency is too critical to allow of delay or discussion. Let us save the country and regulate these matters afterwards. The reason is a valid one where the necessity is really so urgent. It is the tyrant's plea, and serves his purpose, because it is so good a one. Undoubtedly there may be occasions which will not only justify but demand an overstepping of the strict limitations of law. The wise and prudent course of English Ministers has always been, in such cases, to obtain an Act of Indemnity from Parliament. In reference to the purchase of Louisiana, Mr. Jefferson was held to be justifiable in adopting a similar course. The object to be obtained was of such vital importance, and time so valuable, that the greatest sticklers for law approved his conduct.

While, however, these departures from the strict letter of the Constitution are permitted, they should not be allowed to ripen into precedent. The ship may be driven from her course by the violence of the gale, but if the deviation be carefully noted, and good reckoning kept, it will be easy to bring her back. If it be clearly expressed that it is necessary to exceed the powers of the Executive or of Congress, or of both combined, let the ultimate decision of the case be remitted to the people. Their sanction will give indemnity for what has been done, while the discussion of the question and the acknowledgment of unconstitutionality will avert the danger of repetition, as undoubted right, of what was originally the assumption of prerogative.

It is not uncommon to hear all questions of constitutional rights treated as puerile trifling. There will be time enough for refined distinctions and legal discussion after the war is over. Those who hold this language seem to consider the means necessary to the preservation of constitutional liberty as worthy only of pedantic orators. They look on them as ingenious exercises of the mind, fit to occupy the quiet times of peace, but in time of war as senseless as the disputes of the Greek sophists, or criminal as the wranglings of the Athenians when the Macedonian was thundering at their gates.

Those who reason in this way commit the common mistake of giving to the means a greater importance than the end. This war was entered into for the preservation of the great principles of constitutional liberty. Let that be kept ever in view, and let not temporary exigency induce us to sacrifice undying principles. If urgent danger demand a temporary suspension of established laws, let the danger be clearly shown, and let the temporary nature of suspension be clearly expressed. Even a dictatorship, as in Rome, may be stripped of danger under strict and well-defined precautions. A considerable degree of power may be safely entrusted to Government so long as an exact accountability is required. A much smaller degree may become dangerous without this safeguard, for it may make gradual and unquestioned encroachments until it bids defiance to tardy resistance.

The danger in which the State may be, while it may require these occasional stretches of power, demands also that they be watched with jealous vigilance. Amid the din of war, and in the exultation of victory, have been ever found the fairest occasions for the subversion of liberty. Entire confidence in the patriotism and fidelity to the Constitution of those who are entrusted with the making and the execution of the laws should not prevent us from exercising this caution. Too great security is ever dangerous. To desire that no measure or policy should be subjected to discussion is to doubt both the ability of those who lead and the patriotism of those who follow. It evinces a distrust, not very flattering, of ability to cope with our enemy without abandoning the encumbrance of constitutional restraints.

To such straits we are not yet reduced, and everything concurs to assure us we shall not be. The skillful mariner does not throw overboard the most valuable part of his cargo until shipwreck is otherwise inevitable. If we pass unscathed through one of the severest ordeals to which a nation has ever been subjected, we may justly feel proud of the solidity of our liberties. The glory which the South will have won in so fearful a struggle, waged against such desperate odds, will be doubly enhanced if, when she emerges from the contest triumphant and independent, she can, as she takes her place at the council board of nations, point not merely to the well-won trophies of the battle-field, but to the maintenance, under such difficult circumstances, of well-ordered liberty and the preservation of constitutional guarantees.

CONFEDERATE RESOURCES AND CURRENCY.

The following, which has been published in the Southern papers, will be read with interest:—

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PRODUCE LOAN.

The object of Government in issuing the bonds having a long period to run is to postpone to that extent existing liabilities, absorb Treasury notes, and by keeping down the circulation maintain the reputation of these notes.

The first issue of bonds was taken up very promptly in the cities and towns, the planters alleging, with no lack of patriotism, their inability to respond, but declaring their willingness to do so, whenever their produce, of which the harvest promised abundantly, could command a market.

With full faith in the patriotism of this wealthy and influential interest, and taking it at its word, Government at once provided for the issue of one million of what are called "Produce Loan Bonds," drawing 8 per cent. interest, and protected the issue by a direct or war tax. Subscriptions thereupon came in generously and largely, but when the time fixed for payment arrived, it was ascertained that no demand existed for many of the articles pledged, except at a ruinous sacrifice. The interest of the Government, as well as of the subscriber, dictated delay, and this was publicly announced by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Thus matters stood, the contract itself being in no wise regarded dissolved or dissoluble, except by mutual consent, but simply suspended.

The pressure of the war, as it progressed, developed a new state of things. Capital in large amounts, the result of past or present earnings, hitherto seeking the greater and minor branches of commerce and other industry, finding itself without employment, began to be attracted to cotton, for which it entered in active competition, at prices regarded fair during the past few years, and in certain sections, supposed to be best protected from the enemy, very much above the average of those years.

Such a fact brought home to the knowledge of the Government justified a prompt calling in of the subscriptions, it being supposed that a more favourable state of things did not enter into the contemplation of parties, and that the subscriptions involved something of a patriotic offering, in which personal sacrifice was not excluded.

Meanwhile, too, representatives of the capital held abroad, approached in an informal manner the Government with propositions looking to favourable advances of foreign credits upon such of the commercial staples as it might control, and negotiations of this character, on a large scale, seeming to be practicable, Congress, by act approved the 21st of April last, authorized such staples to be taken, when subscribed, at a fair market value, should the subscriber prefer this course to that of selling and investing in the bonds as was at first contemplated. The Secretary of the Treasury is instructed by the act to make arrangements for the disposition and custody of the articles, to issue produce certificates covering them, and to hypothecate or dispose of the same as may best promote the public interest.

Thus you will perceive that the whole matter is reduced into a very narrow compass.

The gist and spirit of the contract being that the planter should invest in bonds the proceeds of a certain part of the whole of his crop, the place, time, and manner in doing so are mere accidents to be controlled, modified or abrogated by circumstances that may arise. The objection that a more favourable opportunity of selling may occur hereafter, under some supposed condition of things, could have been raised last spring had the ports been opened, with at least some, if not as good, show of reason. The ruling prices are about what would have been regarded fair then. Those of the future will be effected by diminished consumption as well as production, and the holders of cotton must regard as set off against the prospective advantages, heavily increased costs of transportation, taxation, the chances of the article being burnt and the delay which must result in that case in procuring settlement and the possibility by no means remote, since it is hinted in certain channels, whatever you or I may think of the policy, that the crop destroyed will be charged upon the crop saved, which it has directly benefitted.

It will be at least a source of gratification to the planter, that if any advantage has been lost to him in the transaction, it has conducted to the benefit of a government with whose fortunes in its hour of adversity or prosperity alike his all of prosperity, of honor, or of life are involved.

It is entirely consistent with the reasoning of this note that the subscriber may come forward if indisposed to part with the property, and liberate his crop by the payment of an amount which at present prices would cover the subscription.

The purpose in view being to convert the cotton into money or credit, it follows that new subscriptions to any extent will be received, but that the article must of necessity be in merchantable order, well baled, unencumbered with individual or State liens, well protected from the elements, not in quantities too small for judicious and economical administration; and not immediately exposed to the enemy.

It has been determined to restrict the quantity received on any one plantation to not less than twenty bales, and subscriptions of not less than that amount will be kept recorded unless released by sale and payment of the proceeds.

At the time of purchase by the Government the subscriber will sign the following, which will be furnished by duplicate.—

"In consideration of _____ dollars, paid me in bonds of the Confederate States, I, _____ of the country and State aforesaid, have sold to the Confederate States of America _____ bales of cotton, marked and numbered as in the margin, now deposited at _____ (naming location of plantation), and I hereby agree to take care of the said cotton while on my plantation, and to deliver the same, at my own expense, at _____ (naming the usual shipping point), in the State of _____, to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, or his agents, or his or their assigns."

The agreement must be endorsed by an agent, and such agencies are expected to be created by me at an early day in each of the counties of this State and of Louisiana, who will certify to the quality, quantity, weight and condition, and market value of the cotton, that it is under secure cover, and has been marked with the name of the planter and the initials of the Confederate States.

The bonds of the Confederate States drawing interest of 18 per cent. constitute one of the best securities and most advantageous investments that can be offered to capital, and those who have control of even the smallest sums cannot do better than to invest them in funds which are now believed to be everywhere in demand, and at par. The interest is payable semi-annually by the Treasury agent in each State, and, as has been explained, is secured by the war tax or an export duty on cotton. Considerations of patriotism and devotion to our glorious cause should alone, however, induce every good citizen to give his aid to his country by taking as large an amount as possible of these bonds.

J. D. B. DEBOW.

CONFEDERATE CURRENCY.

Our ancestors supported the war of the Revolution almost entirely by artificial credit. Up to 1779 they had issued 200,000,000 of paper dollars—had borrowed 85,000,000 on loan office certificates at home, and all they could in Europe, besides the monthly supplies received from the States, founded on paper issues also, amounting to 15,000,000 more. All this was done when Congress was but an assemblage of State Commissioners, without any form of Government-powers, except such as were derived from their discordant commissions. In 1780, however, the taxes and loans proposed failed, and the old emissions ceasing, Congress was under the necessity of scaling the old debt, to sink it, and of beginning anew, or of giving up the cause. It was wisely determined, however, to choose the former, and Congress was sustained by the very people who held the money, and who were to be losers by its depreciation. But if the Old Congress, of Continental creation, in the midst of a distressing war, without even the semblance of a regular Government, with nothing to tax, and, therefore, without resources, violated its faith, can we be justified in pursuing such a course, now or hereafter? We have an established Government, created by the will of the people of the several States—a Government with a permanent Constitution, and having power "to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, for revenue necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defence, and carry on the Government of the Confederate States," and with power, also, "to borrow money" on their credit.

The only question then to be considered is, have we subjects of taxation sufficient to enable us to raise a revenue for the payment of debts contracted by the Government? Every note issued by the Confederate Government contains on its face a promise to pay, and is just as much the bond of the government as your bond or mine is the individual obligation to pay whatever purports to be the amount for which it was given. In the one case the holder of your bond or mine has a right to look to our effects, to our houses, lands, and other estate for payment. But the holder of the government bond looks to the estate of every man in the community as furnishing security for the redemption of the pledge of his government. If we are to remain as we now are, separate from the rest of the world, and with no balance of trade to adjust with foreign nations, we make our own money in whatever form we may issue it, the standard of value which is to regulate exchanges between man and man. When our recognition by others as a nation shall have been duly published, and we take rank among the nations of the earth, then the standard of value as regulated by all civilized people, in the form of the precious metals, must induce us to look at home and abroad also for the development of our national resources, so as to cause this standard of the world to operate for our own benefit as a nation also. In other words, if we then sell more than we buy from abroad, gold and silver will have opened for a channel through which they may flow freely into the country, and our promises to pay may be soon redeemed. The obligations of the government will be quietly and silently discharged from the ability of the people to meet their respective portions of the national liabilities. Within six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States Government, our own Government will be found to redeem its promises to pay. But this must necessarily be as it was and has been with the old Government, by the issuing for the time of other notes, or by funding its floating debt by certificates of stock, bearing an interest of 1 per cent., to pay which, all the resources of the Government may be pledged until every dollar is paid off and discharged.

Now, as to our resources. The two great staples of the South, tobacco and cotton, alone will furnish the most ample basis, and give us, at all times, a balance of trade in our favour if we but practice economy, and make at home in our own families as we may do much of what we are accustomed to go abroad for, and this, too, without protection by the imposition of duties on imports to any great extent. Tobacco and cotton are necessary to the support of European governmental revenues, and to the employment and clothing of European subjects. They are compelled to resort to us, but we are not bound to go them for any but a few of the articles of our consumption. The value of the tobacco and cotton exported for the year 1859, amounted in the aggregate to $182,508,961. To this must be added other products of the South, such as sugar, rice, turpentine, wheat, flour, &c., amounting, altogether to $40,000,000 more, and making, with the two combined, $222,508,961; but it must be remembered, also, that the United States has become to us a foreign Government also, and they will consume, as they have heretofore done, as much, or more, of our raw material if permitted to do so. Now, these are but items in the grand aggregate of the wealth of the Confederate States, but, when looking for sources of revenue in time of need, we cannot pass by our lands, our slaves, our cattle, horses, hogs, sheep, &c. The Confederate States have an area of 600,000 square miles an area greater than England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Spain, and Portugal, all combined, and with taxable property estimated in the aggregate at twenty-two thousand millions of dollars!! They have all the sources of wealth, too, yet undeveloped in the richest mines and in the most inexhaustible supplies of coal, lead, iron, copper, salt, &c., &c., with a network of railroads nearly completed, besides the finest harbours in the world.

Let us hear no more, then, about the repudiation of Confederate notes—for if the notes of the Government are rendered worthless by any failure to maintain our position as an independent nation, the notes of the State Banks must be worthless—for as they are owned by loyal Southern men, and have furnished "aid to the rebels" they will be confiscated under the laws of the Lincoln Congress, as they have already gone forth.—But we mean to achieve our independence, and we shall, in due time, redeem every dollar of our debt necessarily created in the struggle to support the cause of Liberty, Truth, and Justice, down trodden as it is by wicked and corrupt rulers who have tyrannized over the people.

WM. L. GOGGIN.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF MRS. BRINSMADE.

The following correspondence between the counsel of Mrs. Brinsmade and Simeon Draper, Esq., Provost-Marshal General, is published by request of her friends:—

TO SIMEON DRAPER, ESQ.

Office of Bowdoin, Larocques, and Barlow, No. 45, William-street, New York, Nov. 8.

Dear Sir,—The friends of Mrs. Brinsmade, late of New Orleans, have requested me to ascertain the facts connected with her arrest and imprisonment. I believe they are substantially as follows:—

About two months since Mrs. Brinsmade, the wife of Dr. Brinsmade, a young lady about twenty years of age, having a pass from General Butler, arrived in this city from New Orleans, having been placed by her father, Mr. Theodore A. James, a highly respectable merchant of that city, in the charge of Dr. Phelps, one of the surgeons of the steamer upon which he had secured her passage.

She brought letters from her father to Messrs. J. D. Scott and Co. and other gentlemen of this city. Upon her arrival here she was accompanied to the Everett House by an invalid naval officer, who had been requested by Commodore Morris, at New Orleans, to protect and assist her.

Mrs. Brinsmade's object in visiting the North was to reside with her uncles, one of them in Washington, the other in Troy. She remained a few days in this city and Brooklyn, and then went to Washington, where, after remaining four days, she was arrested by Marshal Baker, who kept her a close prisoner for four days, carefully guarded.

Some ten days after she left this city for Washington a hackman called on one of her friends in New York, and said that a lady was brought on in the train of the previous night by a detective from Washington, and conveyed to the Forty-seventh-street Police Station, and that her name was Mrs. Brinsmade.

An immediate application was made to Mr. Kennedy for the cause of her arrest and for permission to see her. This was rudely refused by Mr. Kennedy, who threatened to lock up the applicant if the inquiry was repeated.

Another friend of Mrs. Brinsmade then saw a deputy-marshal, and was informed that she could only be seen by permission of Mr. Kennedy. He stated that she was a giddy, foolish, scotch woman, who had been singing scotch songs; that it was thought best to send her home to her father, at New Orleans, and that she would sail in a day or two, but that no one be allowed to see her.

With this assurance her friends were forced to content.

Thirty-five days afterwards a letter was received by one of her friends, stating that she was still a close prisoner in the Forty-seventh-street station-house.

Application was at once made to you. Her friends were informed that you knew nothing of her case, that you would at once address the proper authority at Washington for information, and if in your power would release her.

Pending this correspondence, two ladies, the wives of two of our most reputable merchants, who had been for many years the neighbours and friends of Mrs. Brinsmade, called upon Mr. Kennedy for permission to see her.

They asked, "What were the charges against her, and who were her accusers?"

Mr. Kennedy, in his usual manner, answered, "I, madam, am her accuser; she is a general spy; from the moment she set her foot in this city my presence overshadowed her. I did not leave her for a moment. She went to Brooklyn to visit her friends; I watched her, and when she returned to the Everett House I watched her there. She went to Washington, and when I got her in the right place I arrested her and brought her back here and put her where she is."

In reply to the inquiry if there was no more proper place for the confinement of this lady than a police-station, he said,—"No, that was the place for her. That her whole conduct on board ship indicated that she was a spy, and that she ought to be hung—that a thoughtless, giddy thing like her and the one who was arrested a few days since in Washington, who was making a waggon of herself, carrying quinine to the rebels, were the very ones to be employed as spies, and that they all ought to be hung."

In reply to the inquiry as to whether she was to be kept shut up where she then was and had been for five weeks, and her friends unable to see her or know where she was he replied,— "That is with the department."

Through your kind intervention, after this long confinement this lady on Monday was restored to her friends.

I learn that she was arrested without the authority of any one in Washington; that the fact of her arrest was never reported by Mr. Kennedy to any department of the Government; that no charges had ever been filed, and that even her name was unknown at the War Department; that as soon as you were enabled to learn the facts you obtained from Mr. Kennedy her release.

Will you be so kind as to examine the facts as I have related them, and inform me whether or not they are correctly stated, so far as they have come to your knowledge?

Yours very truly,

SAMUEL L. M. BARLOW.

TO SAMUEL L. M. BARLOW, ESQ., NEW YORK.

Office of the Provost-Marshal-General of the War Department, New York, Nov. 10.

Dear Sir,—In reply to yours of the 8th inst., I can only state that up to the 29th ult. I had no knowledge whatever with regard to Mrs. Brinsmade's case. On that day Mrs. Elliott called and informed me that she was under arrest, and inquired what was the cause.

I on the same day wrote to Washington, directing inquiry to be made of the Judge-Advocate-General.

On the 1st inst. I was informed that the Judge-Advocate-General knew nothing about the case.

Upon this I asked Mr. Kennedy by what authority he held her as a prisoner; he replied that she was arrested and held by order of Colonel Baker, the Provost-Marshal of Washington. This I forwarded to Washington, and on the 3rd inst. received from Colonel Baker and the Assistant Secretary of War information by telegraph to the effect that the arrest had been made by one of Mr. Kennedy's officers, and Mrs. Brinsmade was detained by him without authority from the War Department.

I then called upon Mr. Kennedy, received from him an order directing Mrs. Brinsmade's release, and went with it to the stationhouse, took her from it, and placed her in charge of her friends.

The foregoing is all the information that I can give bearing on the subject.

Your obedient servant,

S. DRAPER, Provost-Marshal-General.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only hide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might never "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your heavy co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

On the 21st of November, as we announced in our last issue, General Burnside demanded the surrender of Fredericksburg, and gave sixteen hours for the removal of the women and children. The municipality of the town complained of such a short time being allowed for the purpose, and the Federal commander postponed the bombardment until the 23rd, thus giving forty-eight hours, instead of sixteen. We might have congratulated General Burnside on his humane conduct, but the bombardment did not commence on the 23rd, nor had it commenced on the 27th; and on the 28th it was reported in New York and Washington that the bombardment had been postponed, some said for a few days, and others that the postponement was for an indefinite period. It is evident that General Burnside barked before he was in a position to bite, and that his generosity in regard to the women and children cost him nothing, because it was a matter of necessity.

The Northerners, if we may judge from the tone of the New York press, are somewhat surprised at this inactivity after such solemn promises of going on to Richmond without delay, and the Washington Government is doing its best to excuse the change of policy. The most plausible explanation given is that the change of base to Aquia Creek was only a stage of the movement of the Federal army to the James River; and that the threat of bombarding Fredericksburg was merely a feint to cover the transportation of the army from Aquia Creek to the peninsula; if so, the device was a very poor one, because, if the danger of Fredericksburg had any influence on the movements of the Southern army, it would be to attract it in a large force to that spot; and we must remember that Fredericksburg is inconveniently near to Aquia Creek. We should think General Burnside can have little hope of deceiving the Confederate generals. The Southern army is, or was at the latest advices, resting on the south bank of the Rappahannock, where it was ready to dispute the passage of the Federals, and where it could observe the movements of the enemy, so that it would be impossible for Burnside to embark any considerable part of his forces without the movement being known to the Confederates.

Either from the inveterate habit the Northerners have of divulging their plans of campaign, or for the purpose of giving a semblance of truth to the rumour of Burnside's change of base to the James River, it is reported, not only that a fleet of gun-boats has received orders to co-operate with the Army of the Potomac, but that the expedition under General Banks, which has been going everywhere, and until now has gone nowhere, is also to proceed to the James River.

Some persons whisper—for it is almost treason to give expression to such a thought—that Burnside has no intention “of going to Richmond,” either by Fredericksburg, or by the James River, or by any other route, and that, having shown how skillful he is in changing his base of operations, he intends going into winter quarters. This opinion is not generally entertained, for it is evident that the Republican party is determined to run any risk rather than remain inactive until the Democrats are actually in power. It is felt in some quarters that the very existence of the Lincoln Government depends upon something being done. Such are the views that we gather from New York letters and from the Northern newspapers.

The uneasiness about the movements of General “Stonewall” Jackson has been increased by a dash of sixty Confederate cavalry into Poolesville, Maryland, where they captured the telegraph operators, and—with that keen enjoyment of a joke for which it appears General Morgan's forces are not alone remarkable—they permitted their prisoners to telegraph their capture to Washington; it is a pity they could not see the look of blank astonishment with which the Federal authorities must have received the unexpected intelligence. The Northerners say, and it must be confessed with some show of reason, that if General “Stonewall” Jackson and General Stuart choose to enter Maryland, and to threaten Washington, or to cut off the railway communication between the North and the West, there will be no force to prevent them so doing, if the Federal troops are massed in the peninsula. Even those who are eager for another attempt to capture the Confederate capital do not deny the danger of making it, and call for a new army to protect Washington and the borders of Pennsylvania. Mr. Lincoln, of course, would not object to having another army placed at his disposal, but how is he to get the men? The draft is unpopular, and high bounties, even if the Treasury was not at a very low ebb, do not recruit the ranks. And if the men were forthcoming, where are their equipments, and how are they to be paid?

A document, too, has lately been published, which shows conclusively that the Marylanders only wait an opportunity for throwing off the Federal yoke. The document we refer to is the defence of Major-General Wool, which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer. Amongst the charges brought against General Wool was, that he refused to tender the oath of allegiance to the Baltimore Secessionists; and the reason he gives is, that he would not “send 20,000 men to swell the army of Jefferson Davis.” Such testimony to the Southern sympathies of the people of Maryland is very significant.

On the 27th of November, Mr. Lincoln had an interview with General Burnside at Belle Plain. The object of the visit has not transpired, but it is probable that Mr. Lincoln desired to impress upon his general the extreme urgency of doing something.

President Davis has demanded satisfaction for the Palmyra massacre, which, to the lasting disgrace of the North, has not been execrated by the press and people. The following is the order of the Confederate President:—

Executive Office, Richmond, Nov. 17.

General,—Enclosed you will find a slip from the Memphis Daily Appeal of the 3rd inst., containing an account, purporting to be derived from the Palmyra (Missouri) Courier, a Federal journal, of the murder of ten Confederate citizens of Missouri, by order of General McNeil, of the United States' army.

You will communicate by flag of truce with the Federal officer commanding that department, and ascertain if the facts are as stated. If they be so, you will demand the immediate surrender of General McNeil to the Confederate authorities, and if this demand is not complied with, you will inform said commanding officer that you are ordered to execute the first ten United States' officers who may be captured and fall into your hands. Very respectfully yours,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Lieut.-General T. J. Holmes, Commanding
Trans.-Mississippi Department.

The justice of this demand is, we think, unquestionable; and if the Federals refuse to give up the miscreant McNeil, the reprisals that President Davis orders are no more than justice and humanity demand, for if the South permitted the atrocious crime to pass unpunished it would be a direct encouragement for its repetition. President Davis will not punish the privates of the Federal army, who must obey the orders given by their commanders, but he directs the execution, if McNeil is not delivered up to justice, of the first ten officers captured; for if they did not prevent the horrible outrage, they at least can, if they choose, refuse to serve in an army disgraced by the presence of McNeil. We agree with the New York Times that President Davis will fulfil his threat to the letter, and if upon inquiry he finds the facts are as stated by the Northern press, he will hang McNeil or execute ten Federal officers. Such reprisals are terrible, but they are necessary, and so far from having the effect that some of our contemporaries dread, of inaugurating a war of extermination, we believe that the decision of the Confederate President will henceforth make Federal commanders fear to torture and murder their prisoners of war in cold blood. The New York press seems astounded at the order for reprisals, as though the North was to commit all kinds of barbarity with impunity. When McNeil butchered his prisoners the affair was not worth a passing notice; when President Davis issues an order for reprisals, we are told that if carried out “it will form the most frightful incident of the present war, demanding instant serious consideration of the people.” McNeil's crime was nothing, it is only the fear of its being punished that is terrible. So far as the Palmyra massacre is concerned, consideration comes too late, for it cannot disarm justice; but those who are gloating over the prospect of inciting a servile war in the South have yet time to consider the inevitable consequences of such attempts, and how they will be met, be they ever so futile.

The proposed mediation has been received in the United States in a manner that must surprise Earl Russell if he was sincere in saying that he thought the temper of the North would not brook the proposal of an armistice, and that any interference, however slight, lawful, and courteous, would stir up the flagging war-spirit of the North. There has not been an outcry of indignation. It is true France is accused of sinister motives in making the proposal, but it is not less true that England is accused of being prompted by still worse motives in refusing to accede to the proposition. The New York Herald says England “prefers her neutrality with the hope that the North and South will finally succeed in destroying themselves, when she can step in and gather up the pieces for her own aggrandizement and power.” The New York Times finds fault with the wording of Lord Russell's despatch, and although the following criticism is a little strained, it cannot be denied that our Foreign Secretary does adopt a style singularly incautious:—

The reply of Earl Russell to the circular of M. Drouyn de L'Huys discloses more than at first strikes one. He declines to join the French Government in the proposed mediation—first, because, as he avers, there are as yet no signs that it would be received by the United States' Government with favour; but secondly—and it seems to us mainly—because that, "up to the present time, the Russian Government had not agreed to co-operate, although it may support the endeavours of England and France."

We do not wish to suspect the English Government of malevolence towards us, verging to unfriendly demonstrations, but we do not like that phrase in regard to Russia. It is "moral suasion" only that England was contemplating, in what respect was the absence of the "active co-operation" of Russia a baulk to mediation, provided that Power "supported the (moral) endeavour" of France and England? Was there anything contemplated in the contingency of the utter rejection of mediation that rendered the "active co-operation" of Russia a desirable thing to have?

Both the Times and Herald regard the affair as an incentive for the continuation of the war with renewed vigour, which would not have been the case had the French offer been accepted by England. The first-named journal says:—

The divulgement at last of the consultations that have taken place between the Governments of France, England, and Russia, in regard to American affairs, will be beneficial to all parties concerned—and we suppose we, on this side of the water, are most deeply concerned of any. It will give a definiteness to American policy that will leave the Governments of Europe no room to doubt what will be the result when they shape and indicate their own course. Whatever is done or said hereafter will be done and said with a distinct understanding of the very grave interests involved.

There will be a long train of conjectures and speculations suggested by this exposure of European diplomacy. It was not without a reason it is given to the world. What the reason and purpose is we will not attempt here to discover, but earnestly hope the progress of the national arms will not give occasion to a revival of the consultation now temporarily dismissed, or suspended we had better say, by Earl Russell.

Thus mediation is looked upon as being postponed, and as being inevitable when another bloody campaign is over. The only severe thing said about the proposal of the Emperor of the French is an innocent sarcasm in the New York journals recommending the Federal Government to offer mediation between France and Mexico.

Mr. Lincoln will jest, even if it is at his own expense. He is again disposing of the lion's skin before he has caught the lion. The Confiscation Act was amusing, but not so absurd as President Lincoln instructing the Attorney-General to enforce the Act. The following is the order:—

Executive Mansion, November 13, 1862.

Ordered by the President of the United States, that the Attorney-General be charged with the superintendence and direction of all proceedings to be had under the Act of Congress of the 17th of July, 1862, entitled "An Act to Suppress Insurrection, Punish Treason and Rebellion, Seize and Confiscate the Property of Rebels, and for other purposes," in so far as may concern the seizure, prosecution, and condemnation of the estate, property, and effects of rebels and traitors, as mentioned and provided for in the 5th, 6th, and 7th sections of the said Act of Congress; and the Attorney-General is authorized and required to give to the attorneys and marshals of the United States such instructions and directions as he may find needful, touching all such seizures, prosecutions, and condemnations; and, moreover, to authorize all such attorneys and marshals, whenever there may be reasonable ground to fear any forcible resistance to the act in the discharge of their respective duties in this behalf, to call upon any military officer in command of the forces of the United States to give them such aid, protection, and support as may be necessary to enable them safely and efficiently to discharge their respective duties; and all such commanding officers are required promptly to obey such call, and to render the necessary service, as far as may be in their power, consistently with their other duties.

(Signed)

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President.

We should not be surprised to hear that there was a little resistance, and that the commanding officers do find it incompatible with their other duties to render prompt assistance. Perhaps Mr. Lincoln is not aware that his officers, without waiting for his commands, have, when they had the power, confiscated and appropriated Southern property.

A much more feasible and sensible business is the following order issued by the War Department for the release of prisoners arrested for political offences:—

War Department, Washington,
November 22, 1862.

Ordered.—First, That all persons in military custody, who have been arrested for discouraging volunteer enlistment, opposing the draft, or for otherwise giving aid and comfort to the enemy, in States where the draft has been made or the quota of volunteers and militia has been furnished, shall be discharged from further military restraint.

Second, That persons who, by authority of the military commander or governors in rebel States have been arrested, and sent from such States for disloyalty or hostility to the Government of the United States, and are now in military custody, may also be discharged upon giving their parole to do no act of hostility against the Government of the United States, nor render aid to its enemies; but such persons shall remain subject to military surveillance, and liable to arrest on breach of their parole; and if any such persons shall prefer to leave the loyal States on condition of their not returning again during the war, or until special leave for that purpose be obtained from the President, then such person shall, at his option, be released, and depart from the United States, or be conveyed beyond the military lines of the United States' forces.

This order shall not operate to discharge any person who has been in arms against the Government, or by force and arms has resisted or attempted to resist the draft, nor relieve any person from liability to trial and punishment by civil tribunals or by court martials or military commissions, who may be amenable to such tribunals for offences committed.

By order of the Secretary of War.

E. D. TOWNSEND.

Assistant Adjutant General.

Amongst those released is the Honourable Pierre Soulé.

Our Richmond correspondent informed us that the question of the constitutionality of the Confederate Conscription Act had been submitted to the judgment of a law court. The case was brought, on appeal, before the Supreme Court of Georgia, and on the 12th of November that Court unanimously decided that the Conscription Law of the Confederate States is constitutional.

The Legislature of Georgia has voted $500,000 for obstructions to be placed in all the navigable streams in Georgia.

General McClellan has refused a public reception in New York, observing that it would be distasteful to him whilst his comrades were engaged in warfare.

It is supposed in New York that some more legal tender money will be issued.

The New York Times gives us some news about New Orleans that will rather surprise our readers. It says:—

The morals and manners of no class of women in the world were ever so rapidly improved as have been those of the secession women of New Orleans, under the stern but admirable regime of General Butler. General Butler is beginning to be so greatly respected and liked by the citizens of the city for whom he has done so much, that when a rumour lately got currency that he was about to be removed, New Orleans was thrown into a panic.

The gratitude of the people of New Orleans is quite touching. No one would have suspected it, from General Butler's own accounts.

An expedition is being prepared in Kentucky by the Federal General McClelland, to open the Mississippi. The flotilla under Commodore Porter was to consist of ten gunboats, mounting 121 guns. Vicksburg was regarded as a formidable obstacle. The ditch that was to turn the course of the river has been refilled by the Confederates, and their new fortifications are extensive.

The Confederates are obtaining immense supplies of cattle from Texas by way of the Red River.

The Richmond Examiner, in commenting on the defence of Fredericksburg, remarks:—

No city of the Southern Confederacy that can possibly be defended from actual entry should ever be surrendered for fear of shells and cannon balls. Between Fredericksburg and the enemy there is a deep river, which the foe cannot pass without a struggle and great loss, and the suffering of no community, whether of Richmond, Fredericksburg, or of Vicksburg, can be taken into account in a war like this, when the least military advantage can be gained by endurance of bombardment.

Two Federal gunboats and a mortar boat have, according to the Southern papers, bombarded Fort M'Alister at Garnise's Point, on the Ogeechee River, without result.

The Confederates have driven in the Federal outposts at Newbern, North Carolina.

A Democratic meeting has been held at New York, at which resolutions were passed in favour of prosecuting the war "to re-establish the Constitution throughout the Union." Hopes were expressed that the reunion might be brought about in order to attack England. We are also informed that "Denunciations against England continue to be poured forth from the press and the pulpit, and by public speakers on all occasions, which seem to elicit popular approbation."

Admiral Wilkes is again insulting the British. The Nassau Guardian asserts that Admiral Wilkes had threatened to enter Nassau without the permission of the Governor, but that he afterwards bore away and lay at the distance of a marine league from the shore. The Guardian expresses fears that Admiral Wilkes's hasty conduct may embroil America and England in war. If our Government had not borne so many Federal insults patiently, we should think the contingency of embroilment highly probable.

The same journal likewise states that the captain of the Federal steamer Octovora had infringed the Queen's proclamation in capturing a schooner within the Abaco Reef, near Allen's Cay.

The trial of Kennedy for the imprisonment of Mrs. Brinsmade created considerable excitement. It was not over when the last mail left New York. An infamous attempt to disparage the character of Mrs. Brinsmade was unsuccessful.

ENGLAND.

The increase of pauperism this week in Lancashire is not so great as it has been for some time past; chiefly, we fear, because the number of those operatives who are not paupers is so small. The addition to the long muster-roll of Mr. Lincoln's victims is under 9000; a diminution of about 350 in certain unions having to be set against the following increase:—

	Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	630	Manchester	2,220
Blackburn	800	Preston	650
Bury	220	Rochdale	170
Chorley	200	Salford	560
Chorlton	1,920	Stockport	220
Glossop	130	Warrington	180
Haslingden	60	Wigan	160
Liverpool	860
Macclesfield	30	Total	9,010

Manchester has been hitherto less severely affected than its neighbours, because it had fewer mills in proportion to its population, and many of those mills belong to the class which suffers least from the failure of American cotton, because it uses chiefly the Egyptian and other finest sorts, and because it consumes less material per head than any other. But Manchester is now suffering severely. Chorlton and Salford are parts of that city, as Southwark and Lambeth are parts of London; and the total increase of pauperism in the town during the last week has therefore been 4700, or over one-half of the total increase.

One feature of the distress, to which we have ere now incidentally referred, is now becoming painfully prominent; we mean the poverty and difficulty of keeping above water entailed on the lower portion of the middle-classes by the destitution of the operatives. Formerly the latter spent among the small shopkeepers something above half-a-million a month, which is now withdrawn. And not only this, but the shopkeepers have trusted them often to the full extent of their means, and have no available capital left whereon to fall back—sometimes are heavily in debt. At such a time, of course, creditors are lenient; the tradesmen cannot press the destitute operatives, and the wholesale houses cannot press the retail dealers for a payment which it is utterly out of their power to make. But of course this does not prevent the "small men" from suffering severely. They can but just subsist; and if demands are made on them for heavy rates they cannot pay them. The poor shopkeepers of Blackburn have protested against the imposition of such rates as are required, and their petition seems by no means unwarranted.

At the guardians' meeting held on Saturday, a deputation of small tradesmen and cottage owners attended to ask the Board, "in conjunction with other authorities of the town, to join us in applying for a loan of £50,000 from the Consolidated Fund, the repayment to be spread over a number of years." The memorial, which the deputation presented to the Board, sets forth that "many of the small tradesmen and cottage owners are in that financial strait that they know not how to obtain food. Some of them have paid rates and extended aid in goods to their unemployed customers until their own credit and stocks are exhausted; while those among them who, after a life of struggling, had succeeded in obtaining an interest in a few cottages, in hopes of preventing dependence on charity when old, find that the value of their little properties is almost consumed through the loss of rents, claims for mortgage interests, and the payment of excessive rates." The deputation intimated that they had seen the Mayor, and that he was willing to co-operate with them, with the view of having a town's meeting on the subject. The memorial was signed by nearly 900 persons, and a considerably larger number could have been obtained had they desired Government to make them a grant from the Treasury. This they did not wish; they merely asked that they might be allowed time—say one or two years—after the distress times had terminated. They had no wish to shirk any liability, but as they could not get rents they could not be expected to be in a position to pay rates, and they begged that the guardians would not levy any additional rates for a few months.

The condition of this town, which is a fair instance of the general state of the manufacturing districts, is well described in a letter from Mr. Fielden, the Secretary of the Local Relief Committee. We call especial attention to the passages which refer to the misfortune of the smaller manufacturers. Mr. Fielden says:—

Blackburn is entirely dependent on one trade—viz., cotton manufacture, and three-fourths of the machinery is employed for one market; and any merchant can testify that the trade in East India cotton fabrics has been most unprofitable for the past two years.

Out of a population of 63,125, no less than 24,845 earn their livelihood and the means to support those at home in our cotton mills and sheds.

It scarcely needs remarking that the value of property, the profits and loss of shopkeepers and all the various trades that are necessary to supply the requirements of cotton and its workers, are regulated and governed by the prosperity or adversity of our staple trade.

The present state of employment, including mechanics and other artisans, is 5713 full time, 4769 short time, and 16791 entirely unemployed. The present weekly loss in wages is fully £13,500, and the total deficiency since the crisis commenced averages £19 to every worker, or the enormous sum of £451,800. This amount is equal to 3½ times the whole assessment of the town, and, taking 10 per cent. as an average profit, it represents a loss of £100 from this cause alone to every shopkeeper in Blackburn.

From the above items it is easy to conclude that great losses must have been sustained from idle and unproductive machinery and buildings.

There were 73 firms in the cotton business, 18 of whom have suspended payment, compounded with their creditors, or have been made bankrupts. The rateable value of sixty-three firms is £42,541 on which during this year a 6s. poor-rate and 2s. 5d. for improvement rates have been levied and paid, making an average of £284 to each firm, or a total sum of £17,902. Twenty of these firms are rated at £32,469 and the remaining forty-three at £10,072, thus showing that two-thirds of these consist of men in a small way of business, and refuting the idea that has been pressed upon the public, especially in the south of England, that they are, as a rule, men of fabulous wealth.

The subscription list contains the sum of £6,940 from our local manufacturers, and this is no real criterion of what they have done. Many of them are supporters of sewing and educational classes; several other funds for special purposes they have given liberally to; and, together with what has been done in such movements, it is not too much to estimate their subscriptions at £13,000.

Without going into details, I may state that the Blackburn overseers of the poor are more than £10,000 in debt, and there is exceedingly little of the old rate that can be collected.

The present weekly relief by the guardians is twelve times the amount expended in ordinary times; and were it not for the Relief Committee and the private efforts made in the town, a 30s. rate would not meet the case, assuming the distress to continue as at present for the next twelve months. If it is considered a desirable thing that small property owners, small manufacturers, and small shopkeepers, composed chiefly of and regularly recruited from the most thrifty, intelligent, and industrious operatives—I say if it is desirable that this class should be reduced to the condition of receiving relief, then the most effectual way to do this would be to levy a 5s. poor-rate. I know that manufacturers who have been ruined in this crisis are now receiving flour and meal from the Relief Committee.

I unhesitatingly say that the great bulk of the property in the town is unproductive, and that no more rates in Blackburn will be quietly submitted to by a large body of struggling tradesmen until better times shall again bring cheerfulness to this at present gloomy Lancashire.

The Mansion-House Committee held a meeting on Friday. Altogether they have received about a quarter of a million, and distributed about £175,000. The receipts last week were £32,000, and the grants £15,000. A debate, commenced by Mr. Alderman Cubitt, late Lord Mayor, as to the propriety of handing over the distribution of their funds to the Central Relief Committee at Manchester, occupied the chief attention of the meeting. There are many good and strong reasons why this should be done; but several of the gentlemen on the Committee are very reluctant to lose the power and importance they enjoy as the distributors of so large a sum of money; and they find support from the local Committees in a good many places, for the simple reason that the Mansion-House Committee does not and cannot distribute its grants with the same knowledge and the same strictness of rule that guide the action of the Manchester Executive. The latter will not give where there are deficient local efforts or mal-administration; the Mansion-House Committee gives indiscriminately. Certain members of the Committee, and others, disgraced themselves by very unfounded abuse of the Manchester Committee, to which they imputed unfairness, party and sectional motives, and so forth, without the smallest warrant, and, of course, utterly without truth.

The Central Executive Committee held its usual weekly meeting on Monday; Lord Derby taking the chair, as he has regularly done. About £25,000 was distributed. Mr. Farnall read the following very important report:—

TO THE CENTRAL EXECUTIVE RELIEF COMMITTEE.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report for the week ending the 29th ult., on 27 unions in the cotton manufacturing districts will show you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of 5584 persons. There were on the 29th ult. 268,969 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 56,442 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 212,527 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 376.5 per cent. The total weekly cost of out-door relief on the 29th ult. was £18,544 7s. 4d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2767 8s. 5d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £15,776 18s. 11d., or 570.2 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions on the 29th ult. was 13.6; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.8. The average amount of out-door relief per head per week, both in kind and in money, in these unions on the 29th ult., was 1s. 5½d.; the lowest was 1s. 1d., and the highest 1s. 11½d., at Stockport. Of the 268,969 persons receiving parochial relief on the 29th ult., 12,579 were in-door paupers. During the last eight weeks, the average weekly balance in the hands of the treasurers of the 27 unions adverted to was £60,366 4s. 6d., and the average weekly expenditure in out relief alone for the same period was £13,734 2s. 4d. In my report, dated the 1st inst., I showed you the amount in the pound, on the net rateable value (after deducting 25 per cent.) of 12 of the most distressed unions which would be required to meet the cost of out-door relief and in maintenance for a year, based on their weekly expenditure. It has been suggested to me that it might perhaps be of service to show you also the amount in the pound on the net rateable value of the same unions (without deducting 25 per cent.) required for the same purposes and time, and based on the expenditure of the corresponding week in 1861. I told you that the amount in the pound now required in—

I have received returns from eighty-one local committees, formed for the distribution of charitable aid in the cotton manufacturing districts, and I am enabled to state that they are now aiding 188,405 persons, who are not receiving parochial relief from the guardians of the poor, and that the weekly expenditure of the eighty-one committees is £19,157 6s. 4d. The total number of persons, therefore, included in this report, who are either receiving parochial relief or are aided by the local committees of charity, is 475,374, or 23.0 per cent. on the population of the unions adverted to in this report. The present total weekly expenditure by the guardians in out relief and by the eighty-one local committees of charity is £37,701 13s. 8d., or 1s. 8½d. per cent. to each recipient.

This disposes completely of the absurd accusations brought against the ratepayers of Lancashire, of keeping the rates lower than in those parts of England which are subscribing for the relief of Lancashire distress. Besides the immense amount given in private charity, Lancashire has subscribed at least half-a-million of money, and is giving £15,000 a week through the Poor-Law Guardians. We believe that before the end of next summer, should the distress endure so long, she will have given a million in subscriptions and half-a-million in poor-rates.

The Conservative party have gained a victory of which they are very proud; the Radical borough of Southampton having elected their candidate, the Lord Mayor of London. The real history of the election is a curious one. Southampton is under the influence of three great commercial companies—the Peninsular and Oriental, the West Indian Mail, and the Southampton Railway. Captain Mangles, the Liberal candidate, was Chairman of the last, and had great influence with the second. The first had had the late member (Mr. Wilcox), and did not wish that their rivals should now take possession of the vacant seat; so they supported the Lord Mayor. The South-Western Company having opposed the entrance of the Great Western Railway into the town had thereby incurred a good deal of unpopularity; the sitting radical member, Mr. Digby Seymour, is not considered a credit to his constituency, and Radical principles are just now at a discount. So the Conservatives triumphed, by a majority of 68, in nearly 3400 votes.

Considerable indignation has been excited by the result of the Totness election. In that little borough the Duke of Somerset, First Lord of the Admiralty, is chief proprietor, and wields a most powerful influence. Finding that the Conservative candidate, Mr. Dent, was almost sure of his election, the Duke took measures to have his tenants threatened, one and all, with ejection if they dared to vote against his party. Learning this, in compassion to the consciences of those who had to choose between ruin and submission, Mr. Dent withdrew. The Duke will probably hear of the matter when Parliament meets.

A frightful calamity has occurred in a colliery near Barnsley. At a time when about 250 men were in the pit, an explosion took place. As many as could made their escape, but a great many were cut off, and about fifty who still remain in the pit must have perished miserably, or will perish before assistance can reach them.

Mr. Leatham, brother-in-law of Mr. Bright (who narrowly escaped being unseated and prosecuted for bribery) addressed his constituents on Tuesday upon the American war passionately supporting the northern cause.

It is expected that the remains of his late Royal Highness the Prince Consort will be removed from the Royal vault in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, before the 14th inst. to their last resting-place, which has been prepared in the new Royal mausoleum now in the course of erection in Frogmore-gardens. This beautiful building is gradually advancing towards completion.

An action has been brought against a doctor for certifying the insanity of a tradesman, and thereby causing him to be imprisoned for some time in a lunatic asylum, without any probable or reasonable cause. The man's wife wished to get rid of him, and the doctor complied with her wishes without investigation, and indeed took her part in so decided a manner as to give rise to suspicions of something worse than carelessness. Great attention has been directed to the case; for under the English law the imprisonment of a sane man under medical certificate of insanity is a very easy matter, only two signatures being required. The jury have given a verdict for £150 against the offender; and much regret is felt that the case was not such as to afford much hope of success in a criminal prosecution.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The great event of the week has been the opening of the Boulevard Prince Eugene—named after one of the best, bravest, and most loyal of the adherents of the first Napoleon. The boulevards serve two purposes—they beautify Paris, and they ensure that the mob of the capital shall not again dictate terms to France, and arrogate to itself the right of choosing and cashiering the Government of the country.

The Emperor is killed almost as often as a Confederate general. There have been two or three reports of attempts to assassinate him lately, for which no foundation whatever can be discovered.

GERMANY.—The King of Prussia remains stolidly indifferent to the complaints of the Opposition. The following expressions, occurring in a speech addressed to a "loyal" deputation, explain his views accurately enough:—

The present movement is not so much directed against the new organization of the army as against the army itself. Attempts are being made to relax the military discipline, as has been especially proved by the late events at Graudenz. The subscriptions in money which are now being made on behalf of those who are styled victims of their constitutional sympathies prove that a perfect consciousness of these tendencies prevails among the leaders of the movement, and that they try to extend them to many other questions. The necessity under which the Government was placed of acting against some functionaries caused these national subscriptions on their behalf. The acts of the Government against these public officers are made the pretext for pursuing aims of quite another character. The aim which is principally pursued by every means is the inauguration of a Constitutional Government. The Constitution has not promised this, but only legislation, with the co-operation of the Parliament. I am fully determined not to part with the Constitutional rights of the Crown, which form its power. Nothing shall divert me from these views, which I have pursued since I assumed the Regency, because they serve the welfare and the power of the country, which requires a powerful Crown and a powerful army. The leaders of the present movement, who desire neither of these things, are quite conscious of the ultimate object they have in view. Although there are not many of them, they have nevertheless succeeded in creating great confusion in the public mind.

ITALY.—After a considerable period of doubt and uncertainty, a Ministry has been formed under the auspices of Farini, the historian of Rome during the present century. The offices are filled as follows:—

Signor Farini	President of the Council.
Signor Pasolini	Minister for Foreign Affairs.
Signor Peruzzi	Minister of the Interior.
Signor Pisanelli	Minister of Justice.
Signor Minghetti	Minister of Finance.
Signor Dello Rovere	Minister of War.
Signor Menabrea	Minister of Public Works.

The Ministry relies on the support of the Right, or moderate Conservative party in the Chambers. It will probably hope for the aid of Ricasoli, who commands, as no other man does, the confidence of the country.

It is to be hoped that the new Government of Italy will do something to reform the prisons of Naples, which are the scene of cruelties scarcely less atrocious than those practised under the old Bourbon tyranny. Political prisoners are beaten, shut up in damp underground cells, have filth thrust into their mouths—are ill-used in every way; and the Times, whose correspondent is bitterly reviled for his inexplicable devotion to the Piedmontese party, refuses insertion to letters which reveal an amount of brutality on the part of the Government, and misinformation on that of the great English journal, which are truly amazing. Other organs, which are not so blindly attached to the cause of the Italian monarchy, have given the unhappy victims a fair hearing. Mr. Bishop, the Englishman who was convicted of being concerned in some reactionary conspiracies, and sentenced to the galleys, writes a letter of indignant complaint to his friends, which appeared in the Morning Herald of Monday. He says:—

Santa Maria Apparente, Nov. 22.

A fortnight ago I was taken very ill with cold, dreadful pains, &c. I sent several letters to Mr. Bonham (our Consul), and got no answer. Then the director of the prison sent to say I was to write in Italian; I did so, but it seems that none of the letters reached him. I begged the director to have something done for me, as I was getting daily worse, my rooms being constructed between two currents of air. No answer; and, as you know, the present regulations forbid a prisoner going beyond the precincts of his cell, to see his Excellency, without permission. No one came to me, and I lay getting worse. Then an affair occurred in the prison which well nigh killed me—one of those shocks to which we are constantly subject. The lower part of the prisoners had made another attempt to escape, which was suddenly discovered, and the informer was assassinated by them. The result of this was that we were all put under key, and guarded the whole of the next day by the soldiers who entered the prison; and in my state I was left alone without help for twenty-four hours, obliged to creep out of bed to go to the grating for everything I wanted. This completely did for me, and when the brutes came their second round they found me in this state; and had it not been for a young surgeon, a fellow-prisoner, I should have been left so. He insisted on leeches being sent for, and when brought, he sat up applying them, and nursing me. I had paper brought, and wrote again to Mr. Bonham in Italian, and about noon Mr. Bonham's son came up. I had been very ill, had written repeatedly, and not one letter had reached him. The dreadful vomiting returned while he was there, and he left me, for I could not speak. I remained in this state the whole of that day, and was under the next and part of the third. On the third, young Bonham came again and brought Dr. Pincoff, the same man who came to see me before. He wrote some prescriptions, and I got a little better, till the next day about 4 o'clock, when my throat became nearly closed, and by midnight I was unable to lie down, and so it has gone on till the day before yesterday, when I got a little relief. What I have gone through in suffering no pen can tell. While I was so bad they repented, I suppose, of having let me get so ill in that room, and moved me into another, where I am now. Though utterly bare and comfortless, it is protected from the draughts, and has, I may say, saved my life, for all agreed that the other room was killing me. Yet it was not "necessary that any direct means of communication with my consul should be insisted on!" They promised Dr. Pincoff that I should have the room to myself, but of course they broke their word and put another man in, under pretence that he was ill. A curd-milk separates us. I could not sleep, nor lie down. A little heart-breaking about might have relieved me, but the earthen floor ran such cold through me that I was constrained to remain in bed.

GREECE.—After several strong popular demonstrations in favour of Prince Alfred, it is reported that the Greek Government received an intimation that the English Court would not allow his acceptance of the throne; whereupon, it is said, the Government determined that, instead of awaiting the decision of the National Assembly, the choice of the King should be made by universal suffrage. The connection between the two circumstances is not very clear; for it is evident that the intention was that Prince Alfred should be chosen by the popular vote. Perhaps the Greek authorities fancied that so strong an expression of national feeling would induce England to reconsider her decision. It is now said that England, France, and Russia have agreed to recommend the Greeks to elect King Ferdinand of Portugal, who is a Prince of the House of Saxe-Coburg.

The Morning Herald publishes the following, as the substance of a circular addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the French representatives at European Courts:—

After having acknowledged the moderation which the Greek nation has exhibited in the presence of the grave circumstances arising out of recent events, the Minister declares that the Government of His Imperial Majesty has not remained an indifferent spectator of what has passed, but did not think it right to offer any opposition.

Two considerations presented themselves: on the one side the treaties that established Greece, to which France was a party; on the other, the unanimous movement of a people, desirous of modifying its Government. Between these two opposite facts France had but one line to follow—to leave the Greek people free to elect the assembly representing the nation, and to adhere, in accord with the co-protecting Powers, to the engagements jointly signed by them. This is the line the Emperor has faithfully followed.

The note adds that requested to point out a candidate for the throne of Greece, the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of the French did not feel itself at liberty to comply, convinced that in acting thus it would be causing a moral pressure, restricting the full liberty of the Greeks, and violating treaties. The crown of Greece could not, in fact, be considered vacant by France any more than by England or Russia, until the Hellenic nation had designated a new sovereign and the three protecting Powers had agreed to recognize him. Up to that time the existing engagements would preserve all their force.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys then goes on to state, with regret, that whilst the Government of His Imperial Majesty followed in perfect good faith the line it had traced for itself, the name of a Prince belonging to one of the three Powers was brought forward, and that this candidature was supported rather than discouraged in Greece. Whilst rendering full justice to the eminent qualities of Prince Alfred, and appreciating the lively sympathies of which he is the object in Greece, the French Government is not disposed to admit that his elevation to the throne will assure the security and happiness of the country. Would not Europe accept with reluctance the increase of influence which would result therefrom to England? Would not the two other Powers see in it a violation of treaties? Finally, would not the overthrow of the balance of power in the East and in the Mediterranean bring about inevitable complications?

M. Drouyn de Lhuys thinks that, under these circumstances, the Government of Great Britain has, perhaps, occupied itself too much with a candidature which it believed it had reason to fear, and has been desirous of obtaining guarantees which were not necessary. He trusts that the uneasiness to which these circumstances have given rise will soon be terminated.

Relying on the wisdom of the British Government, and informed by its representative at Paris that England is ready to disavow the candidature of Prince Alfred if Russia on her side will consent to the exclusion of any Prince belonging to the Imperial family of Russia; convinced, moreover, that the latter Power is ready to make this declaration, the French Minister sees no further obstacle to an understanding between the three Powers, and concludes with the expression of a hope that the three Powers will agree to point out for the choice of Greece a Prince who will be able to ensure her prosperity without compromising that of Europe.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 10.

Our last report left the market very strong on the basis of 15½ for Fair Dhollerahs and Omrawuttees, and 23½ for Middling Orleans.

On Thursday the market was steady, with a business of 10,000 bales. On Friday and Saturday, the tone was less buoyant, with sales of 5000 and 3000 bales, and prices were a shade in favour of the buyer. Fair Dhollerahs worth 15½d.

In Manchester, prices were steady, and the healthy feeling previously apparent, was quite maintained. On Monday the market opened with a large enquiry from the trade, and the sales resulted in 8000 bales at higher prices; the next day in anticipation of a good Manchester report, speculators bought largely, and business was protracted to a late hour; the total sales reached 15,000 bales, at ¼d. to ½d. advance.

To-day the market has been excited, with a very large enquiry both from the trade and speculators, the sales sum up 20,000 bales at a further advance of ¼d., the demand running chiefly on Surat cotton from 15½d. to 16d. We quote Middling Orleans 24d., Fair Sawginned Dharwar 18d., Broach 16½d., Omrawuttee 16½d., and Dhollerahs 16d. per lb.

Our market has now advanced 2d. per lb. from the lowest point touched ten days ago, and greater confidence is expressed regarding its future than for months past. The trade have bought very largely in the last three weeks—say 80,000 bales—and stocks of good Surat cotton here are getting into small compass with no prospect of replenishment for 4 or 5 months to come. In Manchester a more confident tone is prevalent, a healthy demand there has at last set in for the home trade, and it now seems probable that, apart from India, from which we shall receive little support for some time, there will be sufficient demand to carry off even the present increased production.

The American war is still waged with the same virulence that has hitherto characterised it, and not the faintest hope of an early settlement can be gathered from the late advices. It is apparent from the tone of the Northern press on receipt of England's refusal to mediate, that they will brook no interference in their quarrel, and that in their present mood the tender of friendly offices on the part of European nations would only subject them to insult.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, December 9.

Our market has exhibited a much more healthy tone during the past week, than has been observable for some time before, although no great extent of business has been transacted; still a moderate trade has been effected, especially in goods suitable for the home trade, in qualities which are scarcely to be found in stock, consequently, orders have been given out to manufacturers to make, a state of things very desirable, considering the amount of distress prevailing in this district at the present time. Some few manufacturers, in consequence of the better demand which has set in, will be enabled to find work for their machinery for at least some six weeks to come, at prices which will about clear them from loss.

Buyers are anxiously awaiting the arrival of the President's message, and various are the ideas with regard to the purport thereof, for if it be of a warlike tenor, we shall no doubt see a higher range of prices for cotton set in, which may induce speculators to come forward and anticipate any legitimate demand which may arise during the next few weeks. The Levantine merchants are buying rather extensively of T cloths, long cloths and domestics, some descriptions of which are very scarce.

The German buyers, as a class, are almost entirely out of the market, but if the present excitement in Liverpool should extend over some two or three days longer, we shall no doubt see them operating, as it generally (after a lull in the Liverpool market, such as we have had lately) takes some ten days' excitement in that market to bring them forward.

To-day our market opened rather quiet, but after it was known the Liverpool was very active; more enquiries were made both for yarn and cloth, which induced holders of cloth to raise their pretensions over what they were asking in the earlier part of the day. The closing report from Liverpool, stating that 15,000 bales had been disposed of, caused a better demand for yarns, and an advance upon No. 32s. to 40s.; twist and pincofs of ¼d. to ½d. per lb.; and ½d. to 1d. per lb. on No. 50 to 60 ditto, was obtained easily, whilst some spinners withdrew from the market altogether.

Cloths of all kinds participated in the better feeling, and those made from American cotton altogether, are held for rates as high as were obtained during the excitement in the latter part of the week ending the 2nd of September.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, November 21.

Congress meets on Monday, the 1st proximo, as it will be a second session no election for Speaker takes place, and business will commence at once. That office is now held by Mr. G. A. Grow, from Pennsylvania, who, like many of the members of the House of Representatives from that State, migrated thither from Yankee land in the capacity of a schoolmaster, and therefore instructed our Quaker neighbours in the mysteries of protectionism and fanaticism, from which they will not soon recover, although they have recently elected good State Rights' Democrats to fill the place of these adventurers who have been permitted to taint their fair character. Mr. Grow's position will be very painful to him; occupying the very centre of the hall, he will be a mark of the displeasure of his own constituents, and the great body of the people of the Northern border States, who are opposed to this wicked, cruel persecution of the South. The first act of Congress will be the reception of the President's message, but before an opportunity is afforded for discussing its merits and demerits; there will be an effort made by the Committee of Ways and Means to introduce a bill authorizing Mr. Chase to issue more irredeemable and inconvertible Treasury notes, as without such authority the wheels of Government will cease turning, and the whole machinery will come to a stand-still. There is likely to be trouble between the Executive and Legislative departments, which may end in a grand explosion and annihilation of the Federal Government.

Military matters have been working very slowly. Lincoln has succeeded in keeping the public mind occupied by the dismissal of McClellan and the movements of Burnside, but it is not believed that he has seriously thought of provoking another battle, preferring to throw the responsibility of all further action upon Congress. "Stonewall" Jackson's whereabouts seems to be a mystery; it is, however, suspected that he has in readiness some pontoon bridges, which may enable him to cross the Potomac with 40,000 men, to try the daring experiment of capturing Washington, President, Vice-President, Cabinet and Congress. Something brilliant is expected from him, and he generally performs what is laid down in the programme.

The newspapers furnish a long list of iron-clad steamers, many of which are mere contrivances got up by speculators. The two largest are the Dictator and the Puritan, very appropriate names at the present time, but they would not have been tolerated a few years ago. By the acts of Congress, all war vessels are required to be named after States, rivers, or cities; yet such is the ignorance of those persons in power, that they do not seem to be aware of the fact.

Gold has declined to 29 per cent., and may fall still more if the debtors to Europe do not pay up their balances. The truth is, few people have the ability to hoard; all persons with limited incomes have difficulty in making both ends meet, in consequence of the high cost of everything.

PARIS, December 9.

The appetite of the Parisians for fetes is proverbial, and the desire to witness the ceremony of last Sunday received an additional zest from a vague notion that "something" might happen—the something being neither more nor less than the explosion of an infernal machine, or the perpetration of a fearful crime by some less wholesale engine of destruction. Up to the very last hour rumour was busy with stories of plots and wonderful discoveries, and the consequence was that dense crowds congregated all along the line of the cortège, being naturally most dense and numerous along the new Boulevard. It were absurd were I to pretend to be the first to inform your readers that all went off quietly; and that, as I anticipated from the first, all these stories of "plots of stratagems and death," were nothing but the offspring of the lively imagination of some too-fanciful café-haunter, echoed and magnified by some of my too-credulous colleagues.

Without going into particulars, I may state that the affair might have been a great success, but for a circumstance which it would be unjust to make its organizers responsible. Everything was provided that could be devised to please the eye. Verdure and flowers, tall Venetian masts, and gay streamers, triumphal arches and porticoes, and graceful fountains. The national penchant for military display was abundantly gratified, by the passage of regiment after regiment in heavy marching order, infantry, cavalry, and artillery filing past. The amour propre of the bourgeois was mollified by the unexpected summons to the national guard to attend. The Imperial cortège in itself was as gorgeous and imposing as brilliant uniforms, nodding plumes, and steel and gold lace could make it; and yet, as a fête, the inauguration must be pronounced to have been decidedly a failure. The great element, cheerfulness, was absent, and how can a crowd be expected to be cheerful under a constant drizzle—not a good honest shower, that would come down with a will and have done with it, and give a turn to the sunshine and blue sky, but an incessant, nasty, uncomfortable drizzle, that converted the "macadam" into a thick, glutinous, slippery mud, and threw a wet blanket over the whole proceedings. The Emperor, who rode at a slow pace well in front of his escort, and the Empress who followed in an open carriage, were well but not enthusiastically received. Enthusiasm, however, is not to be expected from a crowd ankle deep in mud, the men hampered with their umbrellas, and striving to keep them clear from their neighbours, and the women in constant difficulties with their crinolines. It was stated that very great precautions had been taken. The new Boulevard was, it is true, lined with a formidable array of troops, but there was not a single soldier to be seen all along the road which the Imperial cortège had to follow before they reached it, the Rue de Rivoli, the Boulevards Sebastopol, St. Martin and St. Denis, there was no living wall of armed men to interpose between the Emperor and the crowd, whom simple sergeants de ville stationed at pretty wide intervals were quite sufficient to keep in their places.

The Emperor's speech was to the point. It shows that His Majesty has not lost his intuitive knowledge of the character of the French ouvrier. In England the idea which lead His Majesty to confer on a thoroughfare the name of a local worthy instead of that of his mother would probably not be appreciated. But the French character has some points in common with the Irish, and this sort of sentimentality which would not suit the hard practical sense of the English mechanic, will not be without a softening effect in the ateliers of the turbulent faubourg. The reference to the bakers' trade, and to the necessity for "cheap bread" was also one of those traits that go home to the hearts of the labouring classes, and on the whole I shall not be surprised to find that the "discours imperial" has revived the Emperor's popularity among the ouvriers, who it must be confessed have been anything but pleased at the change which is supposed to have taken place in his policy.

The war which has made so many homes desolate in America, and has in England, converted into paupers so many thrifty artisans, has not spared those parts of France which are dependent on American cotton for the supply of their manufactures. It is estimated that in Normandy and in Alsace upwards of 100,000 workmen are at starvation's door. Private charity has not done much to alleviate the distress. The Temps falls into a gross mistake when it asserts that France usually gives as many francs as England gives pounds on such occasions—as many farthings would be nearer the mark. The fault here as in all other highly centralized countries, is that the people are accustomed to look to government for assistance on every possible occasion—à fortiori in a great national calamity it is felt that the authorities must step forward and undertake the duty of administering the requisite relief. The Temps however has generously initiated a public subscription—the example has been followed by the government, and the Emperor has headed the list with £1000; the Empress putting down her name for £400 and the Prince Imperial £200. Each of the ministers subscribes of £20.—In addition a plan has been devised of public works on a large scale, which will afford the starving operatives employment and enable them to keep the wolf from the door during the coming winter months.

The Moniteur in a letter from New York gives a very clear idea of the position of the American belligerents. The army of Burnside is represented as sticking in the mud on the banks of the Rappahannock—the writer statse that Burnside is not allowed to judge for himself, but that Mr. Lincoln means to carry on the the war himself from his closet in Washington! according to the Moniteur he has dispatched to Burnside a "plan" approved of by himself and his ministers, which the general is not allowed to depart from—There is no reason to suppose says the correspondent of the official print that the Confederate commanders have in any degree lost the energy and skill which marked their previous operations, and the evident inference to be drawn from his letter, is that the advance of Burnside on Richmond makes his defeat a matter of certainty.

Vague reports of Ministerial changes are again current, but I confess that I cannot place faith in a current report that M. Pereire of the Credit Mobilier is to replace M. Fould at the Department of Finance. The resignation of M. Fould would be bad enough, but the appointment of M. Pereire in his place would be ruin. Not that M. Pereire is not an able and a respectable man, but because public opinion identifies his name with the establishment which depends upon Bourse gambling for its existence. It is also stated that the Emperor and Empress are about to honour Baron Rothschild with a visitat his chateau at Fevriere, where preparations are making to entertain their Majesties in a princely style.

The Opinion Nationale has received a warning for a fierce onslaught against the Government, which it charges with being a tool in the hands of the clerical party which it allows, in its blindness, to conspire for its overthrow. The occupation of Rome, the expeditions to Mexico and China, are all set down by the Opinion as continued and undertaken at the instigation of the parti pretre. The tone of the article is bitter, and it is written with undeniable talent and it must be admitted that much less offensive attacks have been visited with quite as much severity.

Another item of press news demands a word of notice. That much over-rated charlatan, Mons. Emile de Girardin, great in the art of blowing his own trumpet, has resumed his former position at the Presse. In his inaugural article he compares himself to a rose-tree! "Why," he asks, do I write "leaders?" Why does a rose-tree produce roses? The comparison, his readers will hardly think appropriate. It is satisfactory to find that his insufferable verbiage produces no sensation but that of ennui, and that the public have assigned him his proper place among the bores and twaddlers of the day.

M. Grandguillot, editor of the Constitutionnel, has obtained the authorization to establish a new paper "on devoted, but independent" principles, but cannot find any one to advance the necessary funds. M. Peyrot, late of the Presse, has on the other hand collected capital to start a new paper (opposition), but cannot get the authorization. Each is in the position of Martial's lover, and may exclaim with more truth, to that coy maid, Authorization:—"Nec tecum possum vivere nec sine te."

THE FRENCH PROPOSAL IN AMERICA.

(From an occasional Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, November 27.

The news by the Arabia has produced a profound impression here. It has for the moment overshadowed even the interest that is felt in news from the Rappahannock or the upper Potomac. Indeed it is far more important in its bearing upon the great issues of the war than anything we can expect to hear from these quarters.

The uppermost feeling with men of every shade of opinion is one of surprise. It has been popularly believed here, notwithstanding many indications to the contrary, that the initiative of intervention would come from England, and not from France. The people of the latter country were believed to be almost unanimously friendly to the cause of the North, or rather the Federal Government, while the Emperor was supposed to have too much on his hands already to take an unpopular step. The conviction was equally strong that in England, on the other hand, Government and people awaited with anxiety the opportune moment for interference in behalf of the South, and were deterred from such interference only by the fear of confronting the overwhelming power of the United States single-handed. Had England accepted the proposal of France, it would have been impossible to persuade the masses in this country that the proposal itself had not been instigated by her and suggested at the Tuileries. The actual event baffles all expectations, and contradicts every preconceived opinion. Its political effect is nevertheless momentous at this moment, and I fear fatal to the cause of peace.

There is no doubt that the leading men of both of the great parties expected European intervention. The Administration party expected it with an uneasiness, but ill-disguised by the silly blusters of their orators and presses. The Democrats expected it with divided feelings, some with the secret hope that it would bring the anxiously desired solution; some, and these the greater number, with no other fixed views than to take advantage of any mistake committed by their antagonists. The mild form in which intervention was proposed by France, prejudging nothing, and leaving the door still open for an attempt at reconciliation, was of all others the form most acceptable to the sagacious leaders of the Peace party. The people are sick of the war, but they are not yet prepared to resign themselves to the loss of the South. No party, therefore, which should propose peace by the recognition of the Confederate States has as yet a chance of popular endorsement. The Democrats have adopted a less direct, but also a less abrupt policy, with great success. They attack the war through the general unpopularity of the Administration, while continuing to flatter the popular hope that the South may yet, by some means or other, but only through their agency, be brought into the Union. An European proposal of an armistice without recognition would have suited their purposes admirably. Had the Administration entertained it, which was not probable, they might have made enormous capital out of it by denouncing the acceptance as a criminal and imbecile abandonment of the Union in the very crisis of its fate. Had, on the other hand, the Administration declined the proposition, as it was certain to do, the Democrats would have accused it, with justice, of a wanton thirst for human blood—of a cruel and suicidal persistence in their favourite schemes of servile war and extermination, and of a fixed purpose not to win back the South but to alienate it more irremediably.

In either case the Democrats would have had a practical point of issue with the party in power, and this is precisely what they lack. Whether the armistice was accepted or rejected, or whether or no it led to further steps on the part of the European Powers, a virtual cessation of hostilities would have ensued from the violent internal commotions which it would not have failed to arouse.

But however much opinions may differ as to the consequences of the proposal, there can be little doubt of the effect of its rejection by England, and the friends of peace must regret that, being so rejected, the subject was ever broached. To the extreme war party this refusal is a signal triumph, as well as an endorsement of their policy of raising the slaves against their masters. It is a testimony also, supposed to come from a most reluctant witness, that the cause of the Union is not so desperate as many even here had begun to fear in their heart of hearts. The popular conviction is more fixed than ever, that Europe dare not interfere in this quarrel, however much it desires to do so. Failing hopes are thus revived, and on the revived hopes the war spirit recruits. European intervention has been a sort of nightmare to the people of the North, which was not contemplated without dread by many of those who hoped to gain by it. To have averted it so long, and to have seemingly averted it now altogether, is regarded as a triumph of the diplomacy of the Administration, which almost compensates for its want of success in the field. This will have an important effect on the deliberations of Congress, which meets next Monday, and in which, before the arrival of this news, many men, though elected on Republican tickets, might have been disposed to disconnect their political fortunes from those of a falling party.

You must not suppose that the great and timely service which England has just rendered to the Republicans will be met by any spirit of gratitude. Already the abuse bestowed on her is, if possible, even more violent than before. No other motive is assigned to her action than abject cowardly fear. Many of the sincere peace men believe her to be animated by the fiendish desire to see the two sections of the late Union destroy each other, with a view of removing at the same time a rival to her commerce and a competitor with her East Indian possessions. Absurd as such ideas are, I assure you that they are entertained by many sensible and well-meaning people, and are not confined to any particular party. The Democrats are likely to become as violent in their denunciations as the Republicans have been, partly because it is popular to speak ill of England, partly from disappointment, and partly, also because they count upon the disappointment of the South. There are really some among them who believe that the Southern people, seeing themselves abandoned by all the world, and despairing of carrying on the war much longer unaided, will turn to the Democratic party of the North as their only friends, and on receiving sufficient guarantees for their institutions, which the Democrats have always been profuse in proffering, will make common cause against the common enemies, the Abolitionists and the English. I simply chronicle the delusion; it is not worth while to waste words in exposing it.

I write it with regret, but it is the conclusion at which any one must arrive after conversing with men of every opinion, in the streets and in the parlour, that England is not less hated, and only less respected, in the United States, since the refusal of the armistice proposition. The invective which thus far has been the cloak of fear, will henceforth be indulgence in a fancied impunity. If hereafter in this matter, which concerns her so nearly, she should raise her voice, as sooner or later she must, it will not be believed that she is in earnest, unless she do so in the most emphatic and unmistakable manner. Nothing less than the recognition of the South as an independent Power will now serve the purpose of peace, and without such recognition, every day confirms my conviction, this war can never end. So long as this step is not taken, the hope will still linger in the breasts of the Northern people that the South may yet be brought back; and so long as this hope remains, the war will go on, despite repeated defeats and the destruction of armies. Nor can, so long as this hope remains, any party appeal to popular suffrages to end the war, however anxious for this end the few farsighted leaders may be.

Burnside's army, after a brief period of great activity, has relapsed into the same listlessness which was so much complained of in McClellan. It is now generally believed that the march towards Richmond from Fredericksburg, if it was ever contemplated, has been abandoned, and that the real attack is to be made by way of the James River, and supported by gunboats. An article in the Philadelphia Press, the organ of the notorious Forney, who is supposed to hold the same position towards this Administration that he did at one time towards its predecessor—a place in what was called the "Kitchen Cabinet"—is generally considered as the semi-official manifest of the plan of campaign. If so, it differs in no essential respects from that in which McClellan so disastrously failed.

DEPORTATION OF NEGROES TO THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—The "masterly inactivity" of the British Cabinet seems to have been succeeded by a feverish activity of late. Intervention in Greece of the most active kind, and in a most Machiavellian spirit—intervention in Denmark of the most open character, and without the slightest invitation from any of the parties interested—and finally, in the person of its accredited agent at Washington, intervention of a most gross and glaring kind, in direct contravention of its professed neutrality, in a matter of vital importance to one of the belligerents.

On the authority of the London Times, the fact is stated that Mr. Stuart, H. B. M. Charge d'Affaires at Washington during the absence of Lord Lyons had had an interview with Mr. Seward relative to the proposals made from the British West Indies for the transportation thither, as "labourers," of the negro "contrabands," who were to be deported by their Northern masters, to Central American mines or Liberia.

The following extract from the Times gives the gist of this remarkable affair, which has elicited no comment in the columns of your City contemporaries:—

Advices from Demerara are to the 7th inst. Letters had been received by his Excellency the Governor, from the Hon. William Walker, at Washington. Mr. Walker had had an interview with the Minister of the Interior, but he was informed that the United States' Government could not treat with the representative of any British colony on the subject, and that the negotiation would have to be conducted with the Imperial Government. The United States' Government appeared to entertain favourably proposals for sending the liberated slaves to the British West India colonies, and there was some reason to believe that they would give those colonies the preference over other countries. Mr. Walker had not an interview with Mr. Seward at the time he wrote; but Mr. Stuart, the British Charge d'Affaires had seen Mr. Seward on the subject and had informed Mr. Walker that the negotiations would have to be conducted through the British Legation, but he did not think the time had arrived when any formal proposal could be submitted on the part of the British Government. He thought it probable that Lord Lyons, when he returned to Washington, would be fully informed as to the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

Comment on the above extract would seem superfluous, if the old British adage, "the receiver is as bad as the thief," still possesses its ancient potency. Here, in the face of solemn professions of neutrality between the belligerents, made at London, the British Charge d'Affaires at Washington is entering into negotiations with Mr. Seward on behalf of West India governors who covet Southern negroes, and postponing pressure on the matter on a point of time only. If this be neutrality, what would be intervention? The British Press has been as silent as the grave since the publication of the fact, and no whisper from Downing-street has been sent forth intimating that the proceedings of the British representative at Washington were officious, improper, or unwarranted. Yet these facts have been made public for one week past through the Times. What is the proposal? Simply this; that the British colonies shall be the receivers of Mr. Lincoln's "contrabands," who have forcibly taken from the only homes they know, and are to be as forcibly expatriated as "a punishment to disloyal masters," according to Mr. Lincoln's own proclamation.

Appropriate is the word, Convey the wise do call, says Nym to Ancient Pistol; but it must make the cheek of every high-toned English gentleman tingle with shame to find that we are taking lessons of policy out of such a book, by trailing England as a camp follower after the marauding minions of Abraham Lincoln, whose only trophies thus far have been captive women and fugitive or defenceless slaves.

Can England submit to be deemed accessory after the fact to such clandestine pillage? Yet listen how the proceeding is construed on this side of the water. The Constitutionnel, semi-official journal of the Empire, in its issue of December 3 contains the following comments on this proceeding at Washington and in the colonies, which I translate verbatim:—

The last number of the London Times gives us the latest news from the West Indies, brought by mail steamer Tasmania to Southampton. It is easy to perceive that the minds of the colonists are very much preoccupied with the idea of obtaining negro labourers. To arrive at this result, negotiations have been opened with the Washington Cabinet. The Times does not state this fact plainly, but it is couched in obscure terms in the news itself. We have thought it worth while to examine a little into this matter, and have obtained from a well-informed person the following explanation, which we give with the usual reserve:—

The last West Indian steamer gives another explanation of the English refusal to join His Majesty the Emperor in his humane and generous proposal to interpose the voice of reason between the infuriated combatants in America. Hitherto it was supposed that two reasons prompted that refusal. Firstly, the desire to avoid the conflict with the Northern States, whose naval power is not regarded with contempt by the Palmerston-Russell Cabinet, by the professions of a strict neutrality, which Mr. Gladstone declared favour the North; and secondly, the hope of developing the cotton culture of India, on the destruction of the Southern plantations, so as to control the cotton supply of the world, making Europe her tributary for this great staple. It now seems that she has embraced a third interest in her masterly inactivity, in the hope of repopling her West Indian Islands with the negroes stolen from the South by Butler and Co., and develop the cotton culture there. The Governor of Jamaica has sent a message to the Legislature, informing them "that it was the intention of the Government to further the immigration of free-coloured and black Americans into the island. The Governor admitted it might be considered a violation of that neutrality to which the British Government stood pledged between North and South, but at the same time the Government would be prepared to do all in their power for such immigrants as were sent to the island at their request by the Federal Government." At Demerara they have gone still further; for an agent, the Honourable William Walker, was sent to Washington, where he had had interviews with the Minister of the Interior on the subject; and Mr. Stuart, British Charge d'Affairs, had had an interview with Mr. Seward, who informed him that negotiations for the supply of coloured Americans would have to be carried on through the British Legation. If, therefore, this notable scheme is carried out, it is easy to see why England wishes the war to go on, by which she and her colonies would be so great a gainer. When we remember the holy horror and the virtuous indignation expressed in the British Parliament against the scheme of African apprentice colonization in the French West Indies, falsely stigmatized as a reopening of the slave trade, we cannot but admire this philanthropy which keeps one set of vessels to suppress the slave trade in wild Africans in the East, and another class of ships to deport Mr. Lincoln's tame contrabands to their West Indian possessions, although Mr. Lincoln's title to the poor wretches he proposes to exile is even more doubtful than that of their Southern taskmasters. That the poor negroes will be allowed any choice in the matter, is, of course, an absurdity.

The free negroes of Maryland have lately been holding indignation meetings against Mr. Lincoln's proposal to drive them out of the country. Mr. Lincoln's own State of Illinois, and, we believe, all of the North-Western free States, refuse now to allow any coloured person to settle within their limits.

The editor of the Constitutionnel adds: "We now can comprehend the vague and careless way in which the Times puts forth news of such importance." The remark has also been made that as the English first introduced the ancestors of the present slaves into America, so their descendants seem now disposed to transfer the labour of their children to the possessions they still hold; and that they do it still with the sanctimonious pride of the Pharisee, "who thanked God he was not like unto other men."

Paris, December 8.

THE GREEK CROWN.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—Whether it is that public attention is wholly absorbed in the Transatlantic questions at issue, or that the Philhellenic enthusiasm of thirty years ago has left us with a permanent distaste for everything Greek, certain it is that the subject which is now agitating every other European Government has awakened comparatively little or no interest in this country. The Crown which goes begging, and which our Continental neighbours suspect us of being so eager to obtain for one of the Princes of our Royal Family, scarcely serves as the theme of passing comment, except in the newspapers. No one seriously contemplates the contingency of an English Prince sitting upon this shaky throne, and no party, or section of a party, in this country desire for Great Britain so dangerous and worse than worthless dependency.

It appears to me, however, that this general indifference is abused by the present Ministry in a manner unworthy of its national character for fair dealing. The candidature of Prince Alfred is not a new thing. He was spoken of as the successor of the Bavarian King as long as twelve months ago, and his recent visit and protracted stay in those waters certainly did not tend to dispel the delusions of an excitable and sanguine people. Before the election commenced, it was absolutely certain on whom the choice would fall. How easy, then, would it have been to make known the intentions of the Government and the nation in so unmistakable a manner as to force the Greeks to seek another candidate? Instead of this, their hopes have been played with in what seems to me no very creditable manner. The words of the British Minister at Athens have been ambiguous as the oracle of old. The Ministerial press has told the world that it would be time enough to reject the throne when it was offered. No manifesto has come from the Foreign Office, which has recently been anything but dilatory in making known its views in American and Danish affairs. Why is this? Is it that the Ministry, conscious of have made mistakes in other directions, really wishes the election of Prince Alfred in order to make capital out of the refusal afterwards with Parliament and with our "gallant ally?" Such a game is scarcely consistent with the dignity of the Royal Family, or that of the nation.

RECEPTION IN THE UNITED STATES OF THE NEWS OF THE PROPOSED ARMISTICE.

The New York correspondent of the Times says:—

The telegraphic wires from Cape Race announce this morning the news brought by the Arabia, that the British Government has declined the overtures made by France for a joint mediation in the affairs of this country. The intelligence creates a feeling which is painful for an Englishman to witness. No thanks are expressed, no opinion is put forward that Great Britain has done a right or a friendly act. Not a word is said of the patient forbearance and statesmanlike reticence of the British Government; but, on the contrary, there is a howl from the rabid press and the rabid war party of exultation over "the miserable old country that has not courage to strike the blow that it meditates." It is held that England is afraid of America; that England is poor, effete, corrupt, and without influence in the affairs of the world; and that it will be the duty of the Federal Government, as soon as it has settled matters with the South, to declare war against her for fitting out the Alabama, and otherwise sympathizing with the rebellion—a war that will reduce her to the rank of a third-rate Power, and establish the independence of Ireland, under King Smith O'Brien or some other hero of the cabbage-garden. Among more sensible people, who are disgusted with Mr. Lincoln and the war, and willing to let the "wayward sisters" of the cotton States "go in peace," the news has been received with despondency. They see that if extraneous agencies are not brought into operation to produce an armistice, to be followed by a peace, the war must last for twenty years, unless the South should be laid under water and the people exterminated at an earlier period; or unless, which is far more likely, a violent revolution in the North should hurl Mr. Lincoln from power, before the expiration of his term of office, and place a man at the head of the army and the Government, with sufficient brains, honesty, and patriotism to recognize the independence of the South, as the best arrangement for both parties, and stop the horrible effusion of blood and the fiendish overflow of passions that the war has excited.

PRECIOUS METALS IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

The following account appears in a memorial presented by persons interested in money to the Confederate Congress:—

According to official reports, the receipts of gold bullion, from mines and deposits in North Carolina, presented during a term of fifteen years, at other Mints than at Charlotte and Dahlonega, amounted in round numbers to the sum of . . . $4,350,000 During the same period the gold deposited for coinage at the Branch Mint in Charlotte reached the value of . . . 3,790,000 The full returns, during that term, from North Carolina being equal to . . . 8,140,000 At Dahlonega, gold pieces were coined, during the same time amounting to . . . 5,280,000 While the product of mines in the State of Georgia, received at other mines than at Dahlonega and Charlotte, equalled the sum of . . . 2,400,000 Showing the whole amount of gold from Georgia to be . . . $7,630,000 In the meanwhile at distant mints (excluding those in Georgia and North Carolina), deposits of gold were presented from other Southern States or territory as follows:—

From Virginia	$1,400,000
„ South Carolina	540,000
„ Alabama	131,000
„ New Mexico	44,000
„ Tennessee	38,000

Proving a sum equal to . . . $2,153,050

These results in native precious metals approach eighteen millions, being an annual average of 1,200,000 dollars. This account does not include silver parted from gold in the mint refineries, nor bullion directly exported to foreign countries, but sums exclusively registered on Mint books, as drawn from States now embraced in a Southern Confederacy.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1862.

Burnside v. McClellan.

Threatened cities and towns are tolerably safe from the efforts of an enemy; at least, it is so in the Confederate States. Richmond was to have been captured, without the slightest doubt, on or before the 4th July, 1862; but the Confederate capital has not yet fallen into the hands of the Federals. Several months ago the Northern journals were exulting in the prospect of taking Charleston, and of wreaking their full spite on the inhabitants, but not a Federal has found his way into Charleston, except as a prisoner. Mobile was reported as taken, as was Vicksburg, but the reports were false. To the long list of threatened Southern towns we must now add Fredericksburg. On the 21st of November, General Burnside demanded its surrender, and gave notice that in sixteen hours he would bombard it if his demand was not complied with. On the 28th of November, Fredericksburg had not surrendered, and the bombardment was postponed. We should not have been surprised at an ineffectual bombardment; but to threaten an attack within sixteen hours, and not to make any attack, is remarkable conduct, even for a Federal commander, though it admits of explanation.

Whether or not General Burnside contemplated an advance to Richmond via Fredericksburg, the possession of the last-named place was important; for if he intended to embark his army at Aquia Creek, and proceed to the peninsula by water, the operation was dangerous, unless he could get some cover for the movement, and this he would have obtained by the capture of Fredericksburg. He formed his plans in ignorance of the position of the Confederate army, and when he sent a flag of truce to demand surrender, he evidently had no idea of the proximity of a large force under the immediate command of General Lee. Being made acquainted with the actual state of affairs, he generously extended the time for the removal of the women and children to forty-eight hours, and, it would appear, prudently resolved not to commence an attack that might lead to a general engagement.

On the 27th November, Mr. Lincoln visited Aquia Creek, and had a consultation with General Burnside. The purport of that interview has not transpired, but no doubt it had reference to the future movements of the Army of the Potomac; and certainly the position is calculated to make the Federal authorities anxious. We will not go so far as Northern critics, who say that the proposed advance via Fredericksburg is impossible, but it is so difficult and dangerous as to be rash and imprudent; and if General Burnside's object is to reach the peninsula he can do so, without exhausting his army, by water transport. Supposing the cry of "On to Richmond" is not a mere sham to stop the clamour of the Republicans, who, as represented by Mr. Wendel Phillips, are bent upon introducing "Yankee civilization" in the South, by exterminating the Southern population, and dividing the rich possessions amongst the Northern soldiery, we may suppose that the unsuccessful plan of General McClellan is to be repeated, and the peninsula is once more to be the base of operation against Richmond. It is said that the long-talked-of expedition under General Banks is to proceed to the James River, and co-operate with General Burnside. The Army of the Potomac is not strong enough to proceed in the enterprise without assistance, and so, if anything is to be done, the whole available Federal force must be massed in the peninsula. What the Federal commander desires to do is to divide the Confederate forces, but he cannot do so by any strategy he can invent. At the Rappahannock he is confronted by the main body of the Confederate Army, and as soon as he has embarked his troops the Confederates can withdraw to Richmond, and be ready to receive him in the peninsula; for the way that is impassable to the Federals is easy to the Confederates, who have the command of the railroad. Whatever battle-ground General Burnside selects, he must be prepared to encounter his enemy in full force.

But if the Federal troops are concentrated in the peninsula, what is to protect the Federal capital, or to prevent the Confederate army under General Jackson from entering Maryland, invading Pennsylvania, and cutting off the railroad communication between the West and Washington? The Maryland campaign is too recent not to make the Federals uneasy. The Confederate force in Maryland did not exceed the force now at the disposal of Generals Jackson and Stuart, and it needed 130,000 Northern troops to check its operations. If the Southern army again enters Maryland without having to contend with a large Federal force, not only would the Marylanders recruit the Southern ranks—General Wool, in his published defence, speaks of 20,000 Marylanders being ready to join the Confederate army—but Washington would be in jeopardy, and Pennsylvania would be without any efficient means of defence. General McClellan was fully aware of the exigencies of the situation, and, therefore, refused to advance against Richmond. The late incursion of sixty Confederate cavalry into Poolesville, in itself an unimportant affair, has, perhaps, convinced Mr. Lincoln of the risk involved in making the peninsula the base of operations against Richmond.

If Mr. Lincoln was not the puppet of a party, we should conclude that there would not be an advance to Richmond; and it is not impossible that even Mr. Lincoln may have elected to brave the anger of his supporters rather than incur a ruinous risk. If Burnside does proceed to the Peninsula, he will only repeat the plan of McClellan, with this difference, that he will do so under circumstances that render such a movement extremely hazardous. But until Burnside has taken his army to the James River, we shall doubt, despite the positive assurances of the Washington officials, whether he is prepared to forsake the prudent policy of McClellan at the bidding of the Republican fanatics.

The War Supplies of the South.

All authorities concur that the Confederate armies, unlike their opponents, are at this moment better provided with the necessities of warfare than at any previous period in this obstinate and hard-fought contest. Much is no doubt still wanting; many and severe privations are endured by these dauntless defenders of their country's independence, and the soldiers of the Confederacy are far from presenting that spectacle of military pomp which delights women and children at a holiday parade; but in the essentials of equipment we have every reason to believe that they are not worse off than the best supplied European armies might be after equally rough and protracted campaigning. The fact may surprise those whom the events of this war have not yet shaken in their prejudice that the South is a semi-barbarous country, without industry, and without the means of creating any, and inhabited by a degenerate people sunk in sloth and ease; but this fact is not more surprising than that such a people should have coped so long against such fearful odds, that it should have sent into the field armies as distinguished for their discipline as for their valour, that it should have found in its midst generals and statesmen worthy of the first rank in history, and that it should have shown itself capable of a unanimity of determination, self-devotion, and self-sacrifice, which is scarcely paralleled, and certainly not surpassed, in modern times. Those who have more rightly judged the resources of the South and the character of its people, and who know what a nation by a supreme effort may accomplish, will not be surprised to learn that the Confederates are in this the second year of the war infinitely better prepared for every emergency of the struggle than they were when they gained their first great victory on the plains of Manassas.

Arms and ammunition are, of course, the first and most essential requisites, and the destitution of these formed the greatest danger of the South at the outbreak of the war. A considerable portion of the earlier levies were armed with fowling-pieces, the private property of non-combatants, cheerfully contributed in response to the appeals of the Government. In the hands of men trained from boyhood to the use of firearms, and whose unvarying tactics in every encounter has been to engage the enemy as closely as possible, the smooth-bored shot gun or the hunting rifle did deadlier execution than the military weapon of longer range. A comparison of the losses of both sides in every encounter of the war proves that the better quality of his musket and powder has given no decided advantage to the Federal soldier. But whatever advantage there may have been can scarcely be said to exist now. Besides the large number of arms imported in spite of the blockade, the South has enriched itself by the spoil of a score of battle-fields. It is estimated, upon official data, that at least 100,000 serviceable muskets of the most approved patterns have been captured by the Confederates since the beginning of the war. Correspondingly large have been their gains in field artillery, of which they stood most in need. Their losses, on the other hand, have been singularly light in small arms, and consist chiefly of heavy guns, of which they never lacked an abundant supply, and which they never found much difficulty in replacing. The guns abandoned at Island No. 10, at Yorktown, and at various points of the coast, were such as could be cast in any common foundry, and which were, and still are, cast in large numbers in nearly every considerable town of the South. The naval arsenal at Norfolk alone furnished over 1000 guns of the heaviest calibre. It is doubtful whether all the captures of the Federals amount to that number.

The difficulty was much greater in regard to powder, and at first seemed insurmountable. The stock on hand was originally so small, and the supply, for a long time, so precarious, that the Confederate troops were rigidly forbidden to use it for the purposes of exercise, and, for the greater part, discharged their pieces for the first time in presence of the enemy. There was not, at the period of secession, a single powder mill within the limits of the seceded States. There are now several, judiciously distributed, in vigorous operation, the machinery for which had to be cast in the Confederate foundries. The sulphur is obtained from the pyrites of the copper mines, the saltpetre in part from natural mines discovered since the war, but chiefly by artificial process. For this purpose "nitre-beds" have been established in suitable localities in all the States, under the superintendence of a special bureau of the War Department, and so rapidly has the production of this necessary article increased, that from a single "nitre-bed" as much as 50,000 lbs. a week is said to have been obtained. The quality of the home-made powder is probably greatly inferior to that of European manufacture, for the latter is eagerly bought by the authorities at enormous prices; but the source of the greatest anxiety is removed, and one of the most serious dangers permanently averted.

Much that the South has done in the way of manufactures since the war appears miraculous, because due credit was not given to her industrial capacity in time of peace. It must be remembered that, though by no means a manufacturing country, the slaveholding States were never in that condition of barbarous helplessness which certain writers describe. So much of their capital and labour as were not absorbed by the extreme productiveness of their soil were always devoted to industrial pursuits. Southern mills, worked by white labour, spun about 200,000 bales of Southern cotton, and wove it into coarse cheap clothing for the negroes. Woollen manufactures have also long been in operation in Georgia, North Carolina, and other States. These establishments, enlarged with the necessities of the war, have acted no mean part in the difficult task of clothing the armies of the Confederacy. A large proportion of the steamboats which swarm on the Southern rivers in peaceful times were built in Southern ports. The appliances, then, could not be wholly wanting for building vessels for warlike purposes. It must be admitted that in all this the Confederates had to contend with fearful disadvantages, which could be overcome only by energy and ingenuity of no common order. What they possessed they used with wonderful dexterity; what they lacked they were not less dexterous in supplying or finding a substitute for it. Old files were turned into swords, bayonets, and bowie-knives. The cast-away iron was collected from the plantations and cities to be smolten in the foundries, and converted into machinery. Mines, heretofore feebly worked, gave forth their ores to the furnace. The worn-out rails of the iron track were made to serve as armour to "iron-clads." Thus it has happened that the blockaded unindustrious South could send forth a Virginia to solve the great modern problem of naval warfare, and an Arkansas to run the gauntlet of a whole hostile fleet.

The lack of salt was at one time the cause of much and well-founded alarm. The process of making it by solar evaporation was slow and next to impossible on a coast so generally exposed to the ravages of an enemy. Even more expeditious processes would not produce at once all that would be needed to cure the year's supply of meat. In salt mines the country was poor, except in one district, which was the sport of the accidents of war. Necessity, that mother of invention, has discovered in each farmer's dwelling, if not a salt mine, at least so much as will meet the year's demand. The earth-floor of the spacious smoke-houses is made to yield up the briny drippings with which it has been saturated year after year. The earth is dug up to the depth of two or three feet, and "leeches" in the same manner that thrifty housewives in many countries still "leech" ashes—that is to say, a stream of hot water is made to slowly percolate the briny earth, and in its passage dissolves the saline substance, which is afterwards, by an equally simple process, clarified and crystallized. As much as twenty bushels have been thus obtained from one old smoke-house, at no greater cost than a little fuel.

It was no easy matter to furnish several hundred thousand men with blankets during the cold winter months. An entire population stripped their beds of coverings, and the floors of their houses of carpets. Heavy cotton counterpanes and quilts of household manufacture have in nearly every Southern homestead taken the place of the woollen coverings which alone suit the rough uses of the camp. Every old woman or little girl that can ply a knitting-needle makes socks and mittens for the army. As the whole country is a huge camp, so is it also a huge workshop, in which no one is idle, and in which all work for the same common object. When a people is animated by such a spirit, the sum total of its individual wealth is at the command of those to whom it entrusts its destinies.

The question may be asked, where the labour can be found for the various industrial pursuits to which the war has either given rise or imparted a sudden activity, in a country in which every able-bodied man is a soldier. Female labour, employed to a much greater extent than heretofore in the South, serves as a partial substitute. The most important works, however, which require skilled labour, are carried on by the Government with artisans selected from the ranks of the army, a fixed rate of extra pay being allowed in such cases. In this manner a large number of establishments have, with the consent of their proprietors, become temporarily Government property. Thus the public arsenals, foundries, and dockyards are manned, and officers are required to report any men in their command who are fitted, by their previous trades and occupations, for such employments.

It will be easily understood that a country with such varied natural resources, both agricultural and mineral, requires but the stimulus of a great necessity to supply all its wants. Heretofore the fertility of its soil and the monopoly in the production of a great staple, have made it cheaper to buy certain commodities than to manufacture them. The war and the blockade have exactly reversed these conditions. The coal and iron mines, in which the South is rich, are now more productive than the teeming alluvial soils; and it is more profitable to manufacture soap, oil, candles, or leather, than to plant cotton. The difficulty was in the transition from the one industry to the other, and it diminishes in proportion as the national activity accustoms itself to its new channels. Hence the South suffered the greatest privations in the beginning of the war, because it had not then learned to supply its own necessities. Every day now renders the blockade less oppressive.

There is, indeed, a danger that if the war continues many years, the manufactures which are its artificial creation may become permanently rooted, and the South cease to be the same profitable market to the industry of Europe. The American colonies became manufacturers under the pressure of the War of Independence. The Continental blockade, by cutting off colonial produce, bestowed upon France and Belgium a new industry in the culture of the beet root, which has become permanent and important. A similar result to the South was foreshadowed in one of the earliest Messages of President Davis, as the inevitable consequence of the long continuance of the blockade.

The Northern Press and the French Proposal.

The news of the correspondence between the Governments of England and France in regard to the proposal of mediation in the American quarrel appears to have taken the people, and especially the editors of the North, completely by surprise. It was so completely unexpected—nay, so contrary to expectation—that they know not what to make of it. They had steadily refused to understand the feeling which the useless protraction of the war, and the severe sufferings which it entailed on all neutral nations, had provoked in Europe. They chose to persuade themselves that the people everywhere sympathised with them; that nowhere was there any sense of wrong suffered from them, of unprovoked insults received at their hands; that no one resented the wretchedness which had been caused by their acts, or the wanton outrages on international law and on the rights of neutrals of which the North has been constantly guilty. They fancied, or pretended to fancy, that they had no enemies in Europe who were not also the enemies of liberty; that none wished to see the war ended by a final dissolution of the Union but those who hated the Union on purely political grounds. They insisted on it that the South had no friends except those who were unfriendly to the North for some unworthy purpose of their own; they asseverated over and over again that all Europe wished well to the Federal cause, except the aristocracy of England. That England was anxious to interfere and to ally herself with the South, but was restrained by fear of France, was one of the favourite assertions of the Republican press. Europeans were better informed, but the information of Europe is not practically accessible to the people of the Northern States. While every one in England knew that France regarded with the utmost impatience the interruption of trade, the ruin of the cotton manufacture, the injury to the best interests of humanity involved in the prolongation of the American war, and was most anxious to terminate that war as early as possible—the Government of England holding back, and wishing to remain absolutely neutral as long as neutrality was possible—the Northern public was taught to believe that only the friendship of France for the Federal Government, her warm sympathy with Northern Abolitionism, her desire for the restoration of the Union, her admiration for the heroic Pope and the chivalrous Butler, prevented England from interfering to complete by force of arms the disruption of the great Republic of which she entertained an envy quickened by well-founded fear. Such was the creed professed by Northern journalists, and believed by the multitudes of their readers. The announcement that Napoleon III. had proposed to the English Government to tender the good offices of the two Powers, and, if possible, to obtain the co-operation of Russia, in order to bring about an immediate suspension of hostilities and an ultimate peace, and that this proposal had been decidedly declined by the Foreign Minister of Great Britain, astounded the editorial mind of New York. The writers who had so diligently misrepresented the attitude and policy of the two Courts knew not what to say for themselves. They had not calculated on an occurrence which should give the lie direct to all that they had been saying since the outbreak of the war. They could not think of any explanation; they were compelled to say something; and they have expressed themselves as lamely, mysteriously, and ambiguously as they could, waiting for some indication of popular sentiment, or some unusual inspiration of wit, which may enable them to adopt their interpretation of the present policy of the two European Powers to their past theories and to the temper of the public. Only one thing seemed clear to them. England was to be abused at any rate; that was sure to be a safe and popular cry; but what she was to be abused for, and what was to be pointed out as the course which honour and justice would have dictated to her, had to be left for future consideration.

"One man," says the proverb, "may steal a horse, while another is hanged for looking over the hedge." France can do nothing wrong in Northern eyes; England can do nothing that is not wrong. While it was supposed that England was likely to intervene, foreign intervention in American quarrels was denounced as an outrage, an insult, a crime that could only be met by an instant declaration of war. Whether it would have been so met is not certain; but it is beyond a doubt that every Republican organ amused the more intelligent and gratified the more rabid of its readers by declaring that any offer of foreign—that is, English—mediation would be the signal for a war which would reunite the North and South, annex Canada, liberate Ireland, and reduce Great Britain to the level of Greece or Holland. But circumstances alter cases. When it appears that France is disposed to tender her mediation, the cry against mediation is suddenly silenced; and we shall not be at all surprised if, on reflection, the refusal of England to mediate should produce a strong reaction, and encourage a desire, or the profession of a desire, for the aid of Europe to bring about a peace to which the North hardly sees its way without such aid. Certain it is that neither the Government nor the opposition organs have a word to say against the Emperor, while both are loud in denunciation of the English Government. The New York Times gently complains that France should have "indicated her willingness to interpose her influence to stop the war at a moment when all the advantages in a military aspect are in favour of the Union." The organ of the dominant party could hardly say less than this; and inasmuch as every one knows that the military position of the Federal Government is not favourable, that its armies are not "larger or more efficient" than they were a year ago, and that it has no chance of being able, for a century to come, to deal "the finishing blow to the rebellion," this complaint is almost a compliment. The New York Herald contrives to find occasion actually to compliment the Emperor.

He has been the "means of setting at rest, officially and decidedly, the idea that had possession of many minds, that the leading Powers of Europe would interfere in our domestic affairs, and thus destroy us as a nation." This sort of obsequious meanness will hardly find favour in the eyes of a people like the French; but it serves to set off as strongly as possible the virulent hatred to England, which is the ruling passion of the Republicans, and the favourite affectation of the Democrats. The former affirm that the English Ministers "consider the Union as a nuisance that ought to be abated;" and insinuate that while France intended a "friendly mediation," England looked to the possibility of a hostile intervention against the Federal Government, and would have been disposed to accept the proposal, with a view to that end, if she could have relied on the co-operation of Russia. This is marvellously silly. If war or dictation were meditated, the aid of Russia could not be required. She has no means of offensive warfare that could be dangerous to the United States, nor have France and England any need of her assistance for any hostile purpose. Either of them could in three months annihilate the whole maritime power of America, and compel every Northern garrison on the Southern coast to choose between starvation and surrender. It was only for purposes of peace—only in the interests of conciliation—that the co-operation of the Court of St. Petersburg, as the most trusted friend of the United States' Government, could be desired; and the stress laid by the English Government on the necessity of Russian support was the strongest proof that could be afforded of their anxiety in any case to prevent a mediation intended to be friendly and peaceful from becoming, through the obstinate perversity of the Cabinet at Washington, a forcible and peremptory intervention. The dishonest ingenuity of the New York Times, in attempting to give to this circumstance a signification exactly opposite to that which it really and obviously bears, is a proof of the obtuseness of the Northern people, and of the malice of the Republican press, whenever the conduct of England is in question. The Democrats are still more perverse. According to them, England perseveres in her neutrality in the hope that North and South will destroy each other, "when she can step in and gather up the pieces for her own aggrandizement." Both parties try to persuade themselves that it is the fear of Northern strength and Northern vengeance that has deterred England from interfering, even with the assistance of France—an error of which it would be difficult to disabuse the rabble of New York, but which cannot be shared by any who have had the advantage of practical experience in the conduct of affairs.

The object of the Democrats is very obvious. They wish to convince the South that there is no hope of European intervention; that the Confederate Government has no friends abroad; that it must succumb; and that the best policy for the South is to return to the Union, and, with the aid of its Northern allies, take ample vengeance on the Abolitionists and the Black Republicans, re-establish on a sure basis its ascendancy at home, and revenge itself by war for the refusal of England to recognize its independence. Of course there is not the least chance that the Southern States will ever consent on any terms to return to political fellowship with the countrymen of Seward and Butler, Turchin and McNeil; but the Democrats continue to hope against hope, and are not yet persuaded that their idol is irreparably shattered.

Nothing can be more clear than that the English Government made a terrible mistake in refusing the proposition of the Emperor of the French. They have contrived to offend everybody—their own countrymen, who are by their cowardice condemned to suffer for another year the miseries entailed by the cotton famine; their ally, who feels himself deceived, ill-treated, and left in the lurch; the Northerners, who would have been offended in any case, who hated England mortally before the question of intervention was discussed, and whose hatred could not have been more embittered by the acceptance than it has been by the rejection of the French proposal; and the Confederates, who have not a little reason to complain of the hostile attitude assumed by a Government professing a perfect neutrality, and representing a nation towards which the Southern people have always entertained a sentiment of loyal and cordial attachment.

We would fain hope that the English Ministry will learn at last that their dream of conciliating the goodwill of the North is utterly delusive. No what she may, England will be hated by the mongrel, half Hibernicized population of the Northern States, as a Northern organ lately promised, "until the last American now living shall have gone to his grave." If she desire friends in America, she can find them only in those Southern States which her present rulers have done their best to alienate and disgust. Happily, the Southerners are not ignorant that the English nation is one thing and the present Government another; and that the feeling of the former is only nominally and officially represented by the action of the latter. The policy of Lord Palmerston's Cabinet favours the aggressive, insolent, and worthless North; the sympathies of England are heartily with the gallant people who are defending, against overwhelming odds, the honour and the independence, the homes and the altars of the South.

The Sleswig-Holstein Question.

The Sleswig-Holstein question is the bête noire of the present generation of newspaper readers and writers. The readers frankly avow that they don't understand it, and the writers, if they could be frank, would, nine-tenths of them, make the same confession. The controversy is now so old and has changed its form so frequently—at one time concerning itself with musty muniments, then with revolutions and Provisional Governments, and now with the meaning of treaties and despatches; has been fought throughout on such false grounds and obscured so constantly by violent national feelings—that it requires a most laborious investigation to master it and a constant reference to keep up that mastery, and appreciate the new phases into which it is continually entering. Le jeune ouit pas en chandelle, most of our confireres would say. Even Earl Russell, who has undertaken to settle the dispute, has a most imperfect acquaintance with its history. In his last despatch to Copenhagen he bases his whole argument upon two gross blunders as to facts, yet the question is one which the public ought to understand. It is likely enough, one of these days, to set the north of Europe in a blaze. It is the one question which stirs the heart of Germany, kindling an almost equal enthusiasm in North and South. We shall therefore attempt its history for our readers.

The history of Sleswig-Holsteinism has two parts—the one apparently forgotten, no longer referred to in those negotiations as to the meaning of the treaties that closed it, which form the second part of the history; but the knowledge of which is nevertheless essential for the appreciation of the question in its present aspects.

The origin and the support of Sleswig-Holsteinism are to be found in those vehement aspirations to make a great German nation which for fifty years have tortured the Teutonic mind. Instead of trying to make something out of what they had, they began by insisting upon having what they could not get. Before they can begin to make their nation they must possess themselves of all its territory, and that is every bit of land in which the German language is spoken. Where German sounds there is German land; there are brothers who are to be brought back to the fold, or rather, to whom the fold is to be extended. In virtue of this programme France is to be asked to give up Alsace; in virtue of it Denmark is asked to give up Sleswig.

The King of Denmark is a member of the German Confederation as Duke of Holstein and Lauenberg; and, so far as these duchies are concerned, is subject to the laws of the Confederation. These laws provide that Constitutions, based upon a representation of Estates, should be established in all Federal States, and impose upon the Diet the duty to secure the fulfilment of this article, and, to a certain extent, to define the limits of the rights of these Estates. This right it has, with the one exception of Holstein and Lauenberg, used to rob the people of Germany of rights which they had extorted from their Sovereigns. In the case of Holstein it has exercised the right to assist the Estates against the King. And for this reason: although Holstein, as a fief of the German Empire, was part of Germany, and Sleswig at no time formed a portion of it, and therefore did not enter the Confederation when formed in 1815, there had long subsisted a close connection between the two duchies. The inhabitants of the part of Sleswig bordering upon Holstein are Germans, and the two duchies had certain public institutions in common. For many years an agitation had been fostered in the duchies to make that union a more intimate one, and to add Sleswig to the lands of the German Confederation. The agitation found its chief nourishment in the difficulties relative to the succession to Holstein. The Danish Royal family in the male race was dying out. The Lex Regia undoubtedly gave the succession to Denmark proper and Sleswig to the female line, but there was a question whether Holstein would follow that law, or whether, by the purely Salique succession then prevailing, it would not, in the event of a female ascending the Danish throne, pass to some other heir. A pretender presented himself in the shape of the Duke of Augustenburg, and he, to obtain a crown, and the German party, to secure a hearing, then set up the pretensions which are known as Sleswig-Holsteinism. These pretensions amount to this—that Sleswig is indissolubly connected with Holstein, not as a province of the Danish Crown, but in virtue of certain old stipulations and arrangements; that Sleswig therefore must follow the fate of Holstein; that the two provinces should be connected in one State, and as such be admitted into the German Confederation. The grounds alleged for these pretensions, are, first, to prove that Sleswig is an independent State, and not incorporated in the Danish Crown, a promise said to be contained in the old charters or Constitutions of 1326 and 1448, that South Jutland should never be incorporated with the Danish Crown. To which the Danes, denying, first, all existence of the charters, then the power of the makers, if the charters did exist, to make such a promise, oppose the fact of the incorporation of the duchy into the Crown in 1721. And next, to prove the indissoluble union between Sleswig and Holstein, a statute of 1460, promising that the duchies should remain for ever undivided. To which the Danes reply by a different interpretation of the promise, and the allegation that, as Holstein was then a part of the German Empire, union between the two duchies was impossible, and that even if a close union did at one time exist, it has ceased since 1721, when Sleswig was incorporated into the monarchy.

On the 20th of January, 1848, Frederick VII. ascended the throne of Denmark, and in the very first week of his accession—before, be it noted, Paris had kindled the flame which went through Europe—promised his people a Constitution and explained its leading features. It was of an extremely liberal character, establishing a common representation for the whole monarchy. But the Germans in Sleswig and the Holsteiners had their hearts set upon a union between the two duchies, and an independent position for the united States within the monarchy. Excited by the revolution in Paris, encouraged by Prussia, a meeting of members of the two Estates demanded of the King the convocation of the Estates of the two duchies in one assembly, for consultation upon a Constitution for Sleswig Holstein, and to consent to the reception of Sleswig into the German Confederation. Before the answer to this demand—a refusal—arrived, they had broken out into insurrection, and established a Provisional Government. The King of Prussia, who had just been worsted in a street fight in Berlin, sent his troops for "the defence of the German cause." The Parliament which met at Frankfort upon its own authority, but to which the Diet at once succumbed, immediately declared Sleswig German territory, as well as Posen and parts of East and West Prussia; the one on the ground that it was German; the others on the opposite ground, that they were not German. And then commenced the long conflict of arms and negotiation, from which Denmark, on the whole, came off victoriously. She vanquished the rebellion in Sleswig. She obtained from the great Powers the signature of a protocol in favour of the maintenance of the integrity of the Danish Monarchy, the signature of a treaty regulating the succession to the Danish throne for the whole of the monarchy, and removing all danger of the separation of Holstein; and lastly, an agreement by which, although Denmark undertook some onerous obligations with respect to Holstein and the whole monarchy, she obtained the formal abandonment of the Sleswig-Holstein theory by Austria, Russia, and the German Confederation. It is upon the interpretation of this engagement that the question now turns; all the claims to an indissoluble union between Sleswig and Holstein, or to the admission of the former within the Confederation, are abandoned. All that Denmark has to do is to fulfil the stipulation contained in an annexe to an Austrian despatch of the 26th of December, 1851, giving an interpretation, to which she has assented, of a Danish despatch of the 6th of December.

The Sleswig-Holstein question therefore, in its present form, seems to be one which admits of an easy solution; its earlier history explains why it does not. Germany was defeated in the attempt to get possession of Sleswig, but the defeat and the tumult at the time only strengthened the passion. She desires to give the largest possible extension to the engagements made by Denmark, and endeavours to wear out Denmark by maintaining disaffection and hostility in Holstein, and, as far as is possible, in Sleswig too. In this contract Germany acquiesces not only in the abandonment of the claims of Sleswig-Holstein to closer connection, but also in the dissolution of that administrative one which had formerly prevailed. On the other hand, the King of Denmark promised not to incorporate Sleswig with the kingdom, and also to establish a common Constitution for the whole of the monarchy, and resuscitate, with a view to their development by mutual arrangement, the Provincial Estates of the different parts of the monarchy. On the 28th of January, 1852, the King of Denmark published a proclamation, in which he announced this alteration to his people, and, among other things, promised the Danish and German nationalities in Sleswig "perfectly equal rights and effective protection." It was not easy to carry out these stipulations; Austria and Prussia had warned the King not to be too liberal, and had remonstrated against the electoral law prevailing in the Rigsraad or Parliament for Denmark proper. At last, however, in October 1855, the common Constitution was published. It established a common representation for common affairs, and defined what these common affairs were—foreign affairs, army, navy, customs, public debts, &c. This common representation, called the Rigsraad, was composed of eighty members allotted to the different parts of the country according to their population; the kingdom having 47, Sleswig 13, Holstein 18, and Lauenberg 2. The Holstein Estates objected to the new organization; they complained that the competency of the Provincial Estates had been restricted. Austria and Prussia took up their complaint, and insisted that the Estates should have the power of amending the Constitution. Denmark made many attempts to bring about an understanding, but at last the Diet resolved that the common Constitution was at variance with the Federal laws, and therefore legally void; and Denmark, giving way to avoid Federal execution, revoked, on the 6th of November, 1858, the common Constitution for Holstein and Lauenberg. The Danish Government made many attempts to effect an arrangement, but the Holstein Estates put forward the extraordinary proposition, that although Denmark was to contribute to the budget in accordance with its population and wealth, it should only have an equal share with Lauenberg and Holstein in fixing the annual budget, and in common legislation; in other words, that Lauenberg with its 50,000, Sleswig with its 100,000, and Holstein with its 550,000 inhabitants should each have as much power in making laws and fixing taxes as Denmark proper with its 1,600,000 inhabitants; nay, even worse, that Lauenberg or Holstein shall have the power of vetoing the budget, or any law. Whilst these debates were on, the German Powers raised the question of Sleswig, which had hitherto rested. They complained that the language regulations adopted in that duchy were not in accordance with the terms of the King's proclamation of 1852, and were unjust to the German inhabitants. The Danes denied the injustice, and also the right of the German Powers to interfere in Sleswig. The German Powers have rejoined by demanding the revocation of the common Constitution for Sleswig—that is to say, its annulment altogether, and the establishment of a new Constitution, admitting the demands of the Holsteiners and Lauenbergers for an equal share in the common representation. Denmark has replied with a decisive negative. "Holstein and Lauenberg," she says, "are part of the German Confederation, and, therefore, unjust as your claims may be, we will do in their internal organization all you want; but we will not allow Holstein, a fifth part of the monarchy, to stop as it pleases, or rather, as the wires are pulled from Frankfurt or Berlin, the whole legislation or administration of our States. We shall maintain the common Constitution for Sleswig."

At length Earl Russell steps in with his famous proposition, which practically amounts to all that Prussia demands—a revocation of the common Constitution for Sleswig, and a new arrangement, which would give precisely the same power to little Lauenberg to set the monarchy in confusion as Prussia has required of it. Denmark has thanked Earl Russell for his interposition, but declined it, and his lordship, nettled at the refusal of his offer, has rejoined in a despatch, the argument of which, as we have said, rests upon some gross blunders. So stands the question now.

Whilst the discussion turns upon the meaning of certain engagements made by Denmark to Germany in 1851, the old question, which then seemed settled, is still uppermost in the German mind. The German nation has not abandoned its pretensions to Sleswig, and whenever a chance offers it will renew the fight.

The London Cattle Show.

A sarcasm is always stingy when it is associated with the truth, however much it may be undesired. English people have been extremely indignant with their gallant neighbours for calling them a nation of shopkeepers. Undoubtedly shop-keeping is one of our favourite and exceedingly developed institutions. No one can walk through the streets of London, or of any of the provincial towns, without being struck with the fact. A tradesman without a shop-front is an exception. It is, then, true that we are pre-eminently a nation of shopkeepers, but it is untrue that we are infected with the little-mindedness that is implied in the sarcasm. Our shopocracy, though extremely courteous behind the counter, is proud and haughty enough at all other times and places. Our nineteenth century John Gilpins at the sea-side are as exacting as dukes are supposed to be by the classes whom Belgravia speaks of as the "omnibus people," and away from home are not particularly reverential to a duke, unless his Grace happens to be a customer. Our shopkeepers are as jealous of the national honour as any other class, and are ready to support any Ministry that will do a little fighting. They heartily sympathise with our Imperial ambition and our pugnacity. Old John Company was often sneered at for being a mere trading corporation. Well, it managed to bequeath to us an empire which Alexander the Great could not have won by any amount of weeping or fighting.

Again, we are often called a manufacturing nation. So we are, beyond all other nations of the earth; but we have souls above cloth-making and turning out Sheffield and Birmingham ware. We are not afraid, in the matter of literature, for instance, to be compared with any people in Europe. Moreover, we are deeply attached to agricultural pursuits. If a man makes money by dealing in rags, or by a cotton-mill, or by the profession of the law, or by any means whatever, he betakes himself to farming. He may have been born within the sound of Bow bells, but as soon as he has fortune, he buys "a place" in the country, and regards himself as belonging to the country gentlemen, and, if he is well behaved, is as welcome at the meet as the broadacre squire whose fore-father fought for King Charles I. But whether the country gentleman be a parvenu, or whether he is a nobleman, or an aristocratic commoner, he farms as well as let farms; and our gentlemen farmers are wonderfully ambitious of excelling in the breeding of cattle and sheep. A tale has been told of the surprise of the Norwegian peasantry that Englishmen should pay for the privilege of fishing in the rivers of Norway; for what is sport to their visitors is to them daily labour; and possibly some foreigners who designate us as a manufacturing nation, meaning thereby that we have no pretence to the character of an agricultural nation, would be surprised to hear that our nobility and gentry devote much time and money to farming; and if they are sceptical, they would be fully satisfied on the point by a visit to the Smithfield Club Cattle Show, which is now being held at the New Agricultural Hall, Islington.

Like most English institutions that are worth anything, the Cattle Show has been of slow growth. It began its career more than half a century ago, and its first meeting was in some livery stables in the now classic neighbourhood of Smithfield—then Smithfield was in its glory, then our weekly cattle market was held in the midst of the crowded city; and it seems but yesterday that an enthusiastic member of the Corporation of the City of London declared, before a Committee of the House of Commons, that the proximity of slaughter-houses added to the salubrity of a neighbourhood and the pleasantness of the atmosphere. The livery stables became too small for the exhibition, and sundry "yards" and a horse repository were hired by the Club. At length the Show had become fashionable, and, consequently, popular. At first the dealers and habitués of Smithfield were its main support, but soon farmers who farmed for the pleasure and honour of the thing entered into competition, and the regular breeders had to look to their laurels. A wit who visited Lord Erskine after his retirement from public life, found him studying "Coke upon Farming" with as much assiduity as in times gone by he had studied "Coke upon Lyttleton," and remarked, "Erskine thinks more of his sheep's wool than he did of the Woolsack." An Englishman is never so truly in earnest as when he is engaged in that which is not the actual business of his life, like the nobleman who had a carpenter's shop fitted up in his mansion, and thought he had lost a day unless he performed a fair day's work of twelve hours. In this spirit our gentlemen farmers and breeders no sooner heard of the Show than they determined to do their best to win the prizes; and the public, who like a fair fight for mastery, went, as a young son of Erin said, to look at the beef, mutton, and pork "all alive." The Club was in a difficulty. They wanted a larger building, but a larger building could not be procured within the fragrant smell of Smithfield—the odour so dear to the Corporation of London. They ventured on a movement westward, and engaged a place under the same roof that covers the gorgeous Wax-work Exhibition of Tassard's, so that the Cattle Show visitors, after feasting their eyes on fat cattle, might, if so minded, have a turn at the Chamber of Horrors. The migration to Baker-street took place in 1839, and since then the Show has been increasing from year to year, until Christmas without it would be nearly as bad as Christmas without holly and mistletoe. For the last few years the Club has been at its wits' ends for space. The large bazaar was not large enough for its purpose. The cattle, sheep, and pigs suffered considerably, and the visitors had to encounter a crush that was rather worse than a Jenny Lind crowd. Under these circumstances, some enterprising gentlemen determined to erect a commodious building, and as Smithfield market had been removed to Islington, they chose that quarter of the metropolis, instead of following the prevailing mania for South Kensington.

The New Agricultural Hall is large, which is not remarkable in these days of big ships and pantomimic dish-cover domes, but it happens to be a structure that is large without being ugly; which, it must be confessed, is rather an uncommon merit. The committee fortunately engaged the services of an architect, and not of an engineer who thinks the perfection of a building consists in it being ugly and big. We have no doubt that Mr. Owen Jones could have suggested some improvement in the way of internal colouring, but, fortunately, the New Agricultural Hall does not depend upon colouring and decoration for its pleasing effect. We only wish the architect of the new hall had had something to do with Trafalgar-square, and then the finest site in Europe would not have been the laughing-stock of that uncompromising and astute art critic, Mr. Punch.

We shall not offer any criticism upon the various specimens, although the temptation is strong upon us to say a few words upon the beef-giving shorthorns of the Duke of Beaufort, Earl Howe, Messrs. Eastwood, Tennant, &c., and on Mr. Foljambe's sheep, and Mr. Baker's pigs, and many of the 419 entries. If any one wishes to see cattle, sheep, and pigs in perfection, let him pay a visit to the Show, where there are some cattle as beautiful in their way as horses, and sheep that, if faithfully copied by Sir Edwin Landseer, would be the observed of all observers at the next exhibition of the Royal Academy. But we are not going to follow the example of the gentlemen of the provincial press, who always get enthusiastic and quote Virgil when they write about a cattle show, and generally select the lines in which a shepherd is described as amusing himself by an amateur musical performance. We do not mean this as a reproach to the London correspondents of country papers, for they do their best and do well; and if their quotations are inopportune, they are not inaccurate, but are faithfully copied from the generally received text. We may, however, observe that the Show of 1862 is a proof of the advantage of the emulation engendered by open competition. Instead of mediocrity and little perfection, there is such universal excellence that the judges have had a difficult task in awarding the prizes. The awards are, no doubt, just, but to the uninitiated it is difficult, if not impossible, to discern the difference in merit between the cattle that have won the first and second prizes, or to understand how the judges could pass by some cattle and pigs that have no prizes. Such an exhibition as the Cattle Show does much to make the English breeds of cattle, sheep, and pigs, renowned throughout the world. Another and very marked improvement is, that mere fatness is not looked upon as commendable, and more regard is paid to the beef, mutton, and pork, that the animals will yield, than to mere size. There is fat enough and to spare, but there is not, as in years gone by, an exhibition of animated oil cake.

The new hall was visited on Saturday by the Prince of Wales, and it was meet that His Royal Highness, as the first gentleman in England, should patronize an exhibition in which the gentlemen of England take so great an interest. It will be a sorry day for this land when country sports and country pursuits cease to be fashionable. It was also peculiarly graceful for the Prince to give an ec'at to an exhibition to which his father contributed from year to year, and in which, as in other matters, he so well represented the feelings of his adopted country.

Sheridan Knowles.

If intellectual greatness were hereditary the literary reputation of James Sheridan Knowles might have been safely predicted; for his father was an author and a man of learning, and nearly related to the Sheridans. The late dramatist was born at Cork, in the year 1784, and at the age of eight years accompanied his father to London. His literary talent manifested itself when only twelve years old by the composition of a play for some private amateur actors; this was followed by the libretto of an opéra, and at fourteen years of age by a ballad called the "Welsh Harper," which had sufficient merit to procure him the friendship of William Hazlitt, and this in time brought him into contact with Coleridge and Lamb.

At the close of the last and the beginning of the present century these who entered on the career of authorship had generally to bear the burden of excessive poverty. That period may be described as the revolutionary era of literature. Lordly patronage, fulsome dedications, the humble waiting in the ante-chambers of the great, the author anxious not to offend his patron's menials, the servile practices of Grub-street, had been irrevocably condemned, and men of letters had raised the standard of independence. But even a bloodless revolution in custom is not made with rose-water, and it was a hard battle that had to be fought before the reading public made the profession of literature remunerative as well as honourable. Sheridan Knowles, from childhood to manhood, was, we may be sure, enured to difficulty. His father came to London to try his fortune as a teacher and as a lecturer on elocution; and fortunes in London are more often sought than found, and in those days were not realized without a long course of patient industry. It is likely enough the boy, flushed by the reception of the "Welsh Harper," thought fame and riches were within his grasp; and he did not give up without a persevering trial; but at the age of thirty-five his prospects were so gloomy that he resolved to become an actor; and made his first appearance at the Crow-street Theatre, Dublin. From Dublin he went to Waterford, where he had for a comrade Edmund Kean—the afterwards eminent tragedian being at the time engaged as "general utility," and who in that capacity had to do the comic business in the pantomime as well as to sustain the leading rôle in the stock pieces. Knowles did not make a hit as a player, and only eked out a subsistence by helping his father, who had taken up his abode at Belfast, in teaching elocution. But the experience of the boards was not thrown away, for, by gaining an intimate acquaintance with stage business, it enabled him to write plays that were not only remarkable for their literary excellence, but for their adaptability to representation. We often hear of, and cannot deny, the present superiority of French dramatists, and it is due to the labour bestowed by them in writing their plays with a view to the exigencies of the stage; whilst English dramatists have despised what they please to call stage elaptrap, and confine their attention to the construction of plot, and the smartness of dialogue.

The first acting piece produced by Knowles was one of those melo-dramas in which provincial audiences delight, and which was called "Leo, the Gipsy." Edmund Kean took the lead, and the play was a success. After this triumph, which did not fill the pockets of the author, Knowles for awhile abandoned the footlights and turned schoolmaster at Belfast, and in the intervals of teaching composed a drama founded on the life of Brian Boroihme, and the historical play of Caius Gracchus, both of which were successfully produced at the Belfast Theatre; the latter in 1815, and which was not only celebrated in the provinces but made the young dramatist known in London.

Meantime, the "general utility" of the Waterford Theatre had become the leading man at Drury Lane, and the rage with playgoers. The unknown provincial actor had come to London in that exceedingly Thespian conveyance, a waggon; had been seen, and having risen in the morning a nobody, went to bed famous. The pit, he told his wife, "rose at him;" and he cared no more for the promised patronage of a noble lord who was remarkable for giving countenance to successful genius. The reputation of "Caius Gracchus" reminded Kean of his Waterford associate, and he wrote to him for a play founded on the story of Virginius. Before Knowles could prepare the work, a dull play by Soames was accepted by the Drury management, but "Virginius" was brought out at Covent Garden, Macready personating the hero; and in this and other plays the wish of the author that his old associate should sustain the chief part was not gratified. It was well for Knowles, though unfortunate for Kean, that this happened. We do not dispute the splendid ability of Edmund Kean, but his career was short, and Macready did full justice to the parts intended for his rival.

Knowles wrote a number of plays, of which none were complete failures, and some have kept the stage until this day. His best known plays are "The Wife," "The Hunchback," "The Love Chase," "William Tell," and "The Rose of Aragon." Though Knowles did not, as he expected, write for Edmund Kean, his dramas have been associated with the fame of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean.

It is unnecessary to offer any criticism on Sheridan Knowles as a dramatist. In that department of literature he excelled all his contemporaries. It would be as ridiculous to compare Sir E. B. Lytton to him as it would be to compare the plays of Mr. Tom Taylor to "The Lady of Lyons," "Richelieu," and "Money." The plays of Sheridan Knowles are intensely dramatic, without depending so much on the actors' art as not to be pleasant reading. There is no approach to the modern system of writing a drama for the display of the peculiar powers of a particular actor, but all the parts are fairly elaborated.

Not contented with his fame as a dramatist, Knowles again appeared on the stage, and with very little success. His best personation was that of Master Walter, in "The Hunchback," and even in that his performance did not rise above mediocrity. He twice visited America, and there his histrionic efforts were highly eulogised, and famous English actors might envy his Transatlantic reputation.

Mr. Knowles was twice married; his second wife, who survives him, was Miss Elphinstone, formerly celebrated as an actress. He did not make money enough from his writings and acting to provide for his latter days, and the late Sir Robert Peel conferred on him a pension of £200 a year out of the small fund appropriated in the Civil List for such purposes, and seldom has the Royal bounty been so well bestowed.

When Sheridan Knowles was advanced in years, the public were surprised by his reappearance, as a Baptist preacher and writer. In his new vocation he laboured with commendable zeal, until prostrated by the painful illness that resulted in his death on the 30th ult., in the 78th year of his age.

THE DESTINY OF MEXICO.*

Mexico is almost a terra incognita to Europe. Beyond some vague ideas about Mexican silver mines, and the atrocities committed by Mexican rulers, and that Mexico has an unpleasant habit of cheating her creditors, the general public knows nothing and cares nothing about that portion of the New World. Nor is this ignorance confined to the masses. In the late discussions about Mexico, provoked by the allied expedition, some of our public writers treated the matter much as they do the Greek revolution—as insignificant in itself, and deriving its sole importance from the probability of involving a European complication. Provided England, France, and Spain did not quarrel, the fate of Mexico was not worth the slightest consideration. Who would have gathered, from the tone of many of our able and generally well-informed contemporaries, that Mexico was, with the exception of Russia, a country of greater territorial dimensions than any European country—a country on which are lavished the best gifts of nature—a variety of climate, for most part healthy, and suitable for the rapid and abundant growth of all kinds of products—a country abounding in mineral wealth—a country, from its geographical situation and its geographical characteristics, adapted for carrying on a vast and highly profitable commerce? Mexico only requires a homogeneous people, or, at all events, a strong Government, to become rich and powerful. Not having the first, the second becomes indispensable. A strong people may sometimes prosper with a weak Government, but a conglomeration of indolent hybrid races cannot thrive unless directed by the energies of those whom it is not only a duty to obey, but who have sufficient power to enforce obedience. It is to be regretted that the true condition of Mexico is not better appreciated, for the first step towards the cure of an evil is to make it patent to the world. If we had been as familiar with the affairs of Mexico as we are with those of Greece, the prompt proceeding of the Emperor of the French would have excited far deeper interest than it has done, and Englishmen would not have been pleased with the English withdrawal from the expedition, unless the strongest reasons could have been given for so doing. If the combined Powers, or France alone, put an end to Mexican anarchy, and bestow upon the unhappy country a strong Government, not only Mexico, but commerce generally, will be immensely benefited. It is, however, by no means easy to understand the present misery of Mexico and the remedy for it, because to do so we must thoroughly acquaint ourselves with the cause of it, and that dates back to the time of the Spanish conquest and colonization.

The almost universal impression is, that Spanish cruelty is the cause of the ruin of Mexico. We are not disposed to defend or even to extenuate the harsh conduct of the Spaniards. We reject, of course, the extravagant calculation of Las Casas, that twelve millions of the natives perished through the treatment of their conquerors, whilst we admit the havoc must have been terrible, as is always the case when a superior race settles in a country inhabited by an inferior race. The Spaniards had peculiar difficulties to encounter; for they had not to colonize a country of which the aboriginal population was scarce and barbarous. The Spaniards found in Mexico cities and towns, and a civilized community—highly civilized, though widely different from the civilization of Europe. Before they could take possession they had to kill, and this was done to an extent that to this day reflects disgrace on Spain. Yet the Spanish Government did not sanction a policy of extermination. The mandates that issued from Madrid for the government of Mexico were singularly humane, and so far effectual that the destruction of the Indians was arrested, and they enjoyed social privileges such as at that period the people of the freest Governments in Europe might have envied—such as are not enjoyed by the serfs of Russia. The Spanish Government resolved to deal with them as if they were an equal race, and the Kings of Spain became the efficient protectors of the Indians.

We have said the Mexicans were an inferior race, and, in fact, they were and are, perhaps, the most servile people on the face of the earth. The negro, in his savage state, is superior to them as far as personal courage is concerned. The Indian tribes to the north of the Rio Grande are haughty and warlike. The presence of the white man has not tamed their native independence; they are slaveholders, but not slaves, and are to the negro a dominant race. The Spaniards met with a people altogether different in character. The Indians on the south of the Rio Grande were, and their descendants are, wanting in courage, and ready to submit to the will of a conqueror; and so great was their pusillanimity that it was commanded by the King of Spain that the negroes should not oppress the Indians, and that Indian villages should not be molested by negroes, though when this regulation was made the negroes were comparatively few in number, and were in a state of slavery. It is impossible, we think, to cite a more remarkable instance of the exceeding carefulness and humanity of the Spanish Government, or a more convincing proof of the inferiority of the aboriginal Mexicans.

The Spanish colonists were not, under any pretence, permitted to enslave the Indians, and their assignment to them as serfs was of such a nature that oppression, if the laws were faithfully administered, was impossible. The Indians, so long as they paid their tribute, were free from the control of their Spanish masters, and that this tribute was not onerous we may gather from this:—that 4 per cent. of the persons constituting an encomienda—that is, the inhabitants of a village or defined tract of country, could—in a few months, gain sufficient by service in mines, or by some occupation out of their proper district, to make up this tribute. Mr. Helps remarks that even this small amount of compulsory labour was only permitted on account of the overpowering indolence of the Indians. The Spanish colonists were not allowed to exact personal service. If the fixed tribute was paid, they had no authority to make an Indian engage in any labour out of his village. Under no circumstances were more than four in the hundred of the adult males of an encomienda permitted to leave their settled locality, except when employed in agriculture, and then 10 per cent. were allowed for twenty weeks in the year; and so soon as the specified term of their extra local labour expired they were bound to return to their village, and the same men could not immediately be sent out again. That this regulation was solely for the protection of the Indians may be seen by the permission granted to the surplus labourers of an encomienda to hire themselves as freemen to the Spaniards; care was taken that their wages should be fairly paid, and it was forbidden to pay them in wine—that is, the Indians were protected from the truck system, or payment in kind, to which English labourers were subject at the beginning of the present century. Thus the laws protected the serf, rather than the Spanish colonist; the latter could only demand his tribute, or, if that was not forthcoming, he could only exact a limited extra local service; on the other hand, the tribute being paid, the spare labour of the Indians was at their own disposal.

Nor were these laws deemed sufficient for the well-being of the Indians. Under no circumstances whatever could the Spaniards exact personal service. In 1609 a Royal order was issued, by which it was ordained that no Indian should, even for a crime, be condemned to give personal service to an individual colonist. And so far, an Indian convict was more jealously protected than a British convict, who, being transported, may lawfully be assigned to the service of a colonist; not, indeed, as part of his sentence, but as a modification of his punishment. Indians were not to be employed in climates differing from their native ones. They were not to be engaged in pearl fisheries, in sugar mills, in woollen manufactures, in vineyards, or in the cultivation of woad. The cultivation of cocoa was permitted, because of the stimulus and strength imparted to miners by eating its leaves; but even in this case the health of the Indians was as far as possible guarded from the effects of damp. The Indian was not to be so employed unless provided with a change of clothes, and the non-observance of this regulation subjected the employer to a heavy fine. Finally, the Indians, in order to be more efficiently cared for, were regarded by the law as minors, just as the negroes are in the Southern States.

We do not dispute the humanity of the Spanish Court, or its sincerity, but we cannot blind ourselves to the inconsistency of its treatment of the Indians. If they were so spiritless as to need protection from negroes, if they were so weak and inferior as to need to be dealt with as minors, how was it possible to make them useful, if their immediate employers were not to exercise any jurisdiction over them? How could it be expected that a community of children would thrive when the whole object of legislation was to make them independent of their masters? Mr. Helps remarks, with equal truth and candour, "The foregoing laws and the privileges of the Indians must have rendered labour scarce in the Spanish Indies." It did so, and the demand for negro labour increased, and negroes were imported in large quantities, the British being considerably engaged in the traffic, and obtaining, by the contract of 1713, almost a monopoly of the slave trade. It seems to us to have been a dangerous experiment to introduce negroes into a country peopled by a race in some respects inferior to the natives of Africa; but if Mexico was not to become a profitless waste, and the Indians were to be encouraged in their extraordinary indolence, negroes were indispensable. The negroes were treated with great indulgence. They were wellfed, and had an annual holiday of four months' duration—an indulgence that naturally led to tumults and murders. They were permitted to purchase their freedom, and to become serfs, with free election as to whom they would live with. Intermarriages were allowed between the races, and were frequent, for there is not the same repugnance between the Spaniard and the Indians or negroes, as between the Anglo-Saxon and the coloured races. The negroes were taught to read and write at a time when it was no disgrace to a middle-class Englishman to be unable to write his name. In a word, the Spanish system was to place superior and inferior races upon a political and social equality, and the work then commenced has been completed, so that in Mexico there is a very small proportion of pure white blood; and Indians and negroes are the political and social equals of the whites.

Mr. Helps concludes his laborious and valuable work before the period at which the result became manifest. We endorse his eulogy of the benevolence of the Spanish Government. Was it altogether a wise benevolence? Has the fruit been good or evil? Mr. Helps could not answer the question without a protest against that theory of the equality of races which, in writing history, he goes out of his way to support by unsound arguments, and unwarranted inferences. Let us glance at the testimony of an eye-witness as to the present condition of that country where all distinctions of race are forgotten.

Mr. Helps cannot complain of our selecting Mr. Lempriere as our authority, for so far as Mexico is concerned he is with him, and not against him. Mr. Lempriere does not profess to give us an elaborate treatise, and what we have is a mass of useful information rather loosely thrown together. He presents us with his first impressions of the country, and with statistics that very conclusively dispose of his arguments. From Mr. Lempriere's views we totally dissent, but he is not therefore less reliable as an honest witness to facts. In 1861 and 1862 Mr. Lempriere visited Mexico. The whole country was infested with robbers, and even in the capital it was dangerous to be out after dark. It is impossible to summarise his description of the lawless state of the country, but it may easily be understood when we are told that from 1821 to 1860 there were thirty-six forms of government and seventy-two chief executives—that is, a new form of government and two rulers, on the average, were chosen every year. Undersuch circumstances it is a mockery to talk of government; it is simply anarchy. Mr. Lempriere tells us of a series of murders which were committed with an impunity which would be remarkable if they were committed in the Fiji Islands. Trade is at the lowest ebb. The total foreign exports are said to be $28,000,000 per annum, or not a tenth of the exports of the Southern States, which have a population, including slaves and free, not more than a third larger than that of Mexico. But the $28,000,000 is not a fair indication of the industry of the people of Mexico. Of this $28,000,000 of exports $23,000,000 consist of gold and silver, and as the mines are worked under the direction of foreigners, for foreign capitalists, and as far as possible with foreign labour, the amount of exports shows the riches of the country, and not the industry of its inhabitants; the total amount of exports which are the produce of native labour does not exceed $6,000,000. We need not add to these statements, or comment on them. They show, most conclusively, what a wretched condition Mexico is reduced to, and that the experiment of the intermixture of races has signally and terribly failed. Yet it could not have been tried under more favourable auspices. The country teems with riches; the climate, or rather climates, are suitable for the various peoples, and, as we have above remarked, there was less repugnance with the Spaniards to intermarrying with the inferior races than there is with other white nations. Mr. Lempriere says one-fifth of the population is pure European blood, four-fifteenths native or indigenous blood, and eight-fifteenths mixed European and indigenous blood. This estimate does not agree with the general opinion which fixes the pure white blood at one-eighth of the entire population; but that more than one-half of the population is of mixed blood is sufficient to show how freely the races have intermarried. The consequence has been that the white race has not improved the coloured race, and that the mixed offspring is characterized by the indolence and lawlessness of the coloured people as well as by the vices peculiar to the whites.

What is likely to be the future of Mexico? Will the people go on from bad to worse, until depopulation invites colonization? Mr. Lempriere thinks that Mexico has reached the crisis of her fate. He says:—

In many of the United States' papers, speeches are to be read and lectures given on the desirability of getting a fresh supply of land for the great staple of the Southern States; but alas! it is always with the addition of the domestic institution. Not only could the wholesale importations of negro slaves enable the Southern States to get up a most enormous and lucrative trade in cotton from this country, but the inevitable result would be the enslaving of the four millions of wretched Indians who now drag on their existence at least in the enjoyment of a perfect personal liberty—a blessing which, in the absence of nearly every other, they inordinately value, if it is possible to put a limit on such a necessity to life; a consideration which, even more than the immense importance of opening up a new channel for the supply of Manchester and Rouen, ought to rouse the peoples of France and England to the value of Mexico as an independent and flourishing country: for if they do not in a very few months so ordain matters as to secure the independence of Mexico, the whole will as certainly be in the hands of the Southern States, and become a gigantic slave State, as any political proposition that was ever broached.

It happens that the Southern States are better adapted for the cultivation of cotton than Mexico, and that in the South there is an abundance of cotton lands capable of supplying the whole world with cotton, even if the present consumption of that staple should be quadrupled. The Southerners will not go abroad for cotton lands, seeing that they have the best at home, nor will they take their slaves to Mexico, seeing that they have more profitable employment for them in their present territory. But supposing the South had the intention attributed to it by Mr. Lempriere, we should be glad to learn how it can be effected. Assuming that there are four millions of Indians in Mexico, and that the South would undertake the task of reducing to order and holding in obedience such a lawless and degraded population, what is to become of the four millions of the mixed races and the whites? Are they, too, to be reduced to a state of slavery? If not, are Mulattoes to become slaveholders? Besides, the South has never attempted to enslave the Indians, and is not likely to do so. If any union between the Confederate States and Mexico were possible, it would be by the voluntary act of the people of the latter country, and not by conquest. And if, as Mr. Lempriere says, four millions of Indians are to be enslaved, what need will there be of importing negroes? What, too, is to become of the present people of the soil? Are they to be driven into the Gulf of Mexico? The only wish of the South in regard to Mexico is, that order may prevail instead of the present anarchy. But even if England and France interfere, Mexico will not be regenerated in a few months or even years, and it is also certain that the condition of Mexico will not be improved until might controls the fancied right of the degraded and servile races to make the country an unproductive waste.

SHORT NOTICES.

Population and Trade in France in 1861-62. By FREDERICK MARSHALL. (London: Chapman and Hall.)

The author of this useful book is not of a sanguine temperament, but insists upon taking a gloomy view of things in general. We gather from his pages, as indeed we know to be the truth, that France has made, within the last few years, a wonderful material progress. The annual value of her agricultural produce is £280,000,000 sterling, and besides that, her foreign commerce has been developed with extraordinary rapidity. The success achieved by the commerce of France whilst crippled by a protective system gives us promise of the great things we may expect when our neighbours adopt the system of free trade in all its completeness. But Mr. Marshall is melancholy. The population of France does not increase so fast as he thinks it ought; and he gives some terribly dark hints about "voluntary sterility," and shrinking from "excessive or voluntary paternity." Now what are the facts? The population of France is increasing, though slowly. It is sufficiently large to enable it to keep up the largest army in Europe, and yet to continually increase the products of the soil and of the loom, and to carry on a great and ever-growing commerce. Although we are not frightened with the Malthusian chimera of over-population, since as yet the world is very thinly peopled, we nevertheless think it well for France that her population does not grow so fast as to need a large and organized system of emigration to avoid poverty and misery. Mr. Marshall is also a little depressed about the moral state of the French. There is too much individuality, and, therefore, too little unity of type. Many persons would consider this a very happy sign of moral advancement, and certainly it does not justify Mr. Marshall's regrets. Excepting the gloomy inferences, "Population and Trade in France in 1861-2," is a very able work.

The Story of Peter Parley's Own Life. Edited by FRANK FREEMAN. (London: Sampson Low, Son, and Co.)

Samuel Goodrich was an American who determined to supply children with some books that should be quite as amusing as fairy tales, without being so foolish; and in 1823, when he made his first visit to England, he had an interview with the venerable Hannah More, that confirmed him in his intention. Hannah More had made truth attractive to young people, why should not Samuel Goodrich make truth attractive to children? Four years later the first volume of "Peter Parley's Tales" appeared; and this was followed by other volumes at frequent intervals, all of which were bought up with avidity, and were, and still are, eminently popular with children both here and in America. There is no doubt that Samuel Goodrich was of great service in raising the tone of children's literature, a task which many great writers have tried and failed.

Mrs. Halliburton's Troubles. By Mrs. HENRY WOOD. (London: Bentley.)

That the author of "East Lynne" should publish novels with the same rapidity that some writers produce magazine articles is not in itself a matter for very profound astonishment, for other novelists have done the same, and even exceeded her in this respect; but the marvel is, that though Mrs. Wood writes so much she writes so well; and, moreover, that beyond a slight family likeness between "Mrs. Halliburton's Troubles" and "The Channings," her works exhibit a charming variety of incident and character. Possibly the works so lately given to the public were long ago sketched and even elaborated in the author's mind, and that will account for the extraordinary fecundity of her pen. Of course she cannot continue at the present rate without repeating herself, or rather, producing poor facsimiles of her earlier novels. We cannot have too much of such good things as "East Lynne," "The Channings," and "Mrs. Halliburton's Troubles;" but if Mrs. Wood attempts to supply the public appetite, which in this case grows by what it feeds on, she will soon do little better than the legion of mediocrities who write silly novels for silly people.

THE FIRST GREAT BATTLE OF THE WAR.

[The subjoined description of the Battle of Manassas, called by the Federals "Bull Run," is the most complete and, in fact, the only intelligible account that has yet been published of an event of the true character of which Englishmen have but confused and contradictory ideas. It is extracted from a work recently published in Richmond, "The First Year of the War," by Mr. E. A. Pollard, to which we have before referred in our columns, and with which in our next impression we shall endeavour to make our readers better acquainted.]

General Scott, having matured his plan of battle, ordered General McDowell to advance on Manassas on Sunday, the 21st of July—three days after the repulse at Bull Run. The movement was generally known in Washington; Congress had adjourned for the purpose of affording its members an opportunity to attend the battle-field, and as the crowds of camp followers and spectators, consisting of politicians, fashionable women, idlers, sensation-hunters, editors, &c., hurried in carriages, omnibuses, gigs, and every conceivable style of vehicle across the Potomac, in the direction of the army, the constant and unfeigned jest was, that they were going on a visit to Richmond. The idea of the defeat of the Grand Army, which, in show, splendid boast, and dramatic accessories, exceeded anything that had ever been seen in America, seems never to have crossed the minds of the politicians who went prepared with carriage loads of champagne for festal celebration of the victory that was to be won, or of the fair dames who were equipped with opera-glasses, to entertain themselves with the model scenes of a battle, and the inevitable rout of "rebels." The indecencies of this exhibition of morbid curiosity and exultant hate are simply unparalleled in the history of civilized nations. Mr. Russell, correspondent of the London Times, an eye-witness of the scene, describes the concourse of carriages and gaily-dressed spectators in the rear of the army on the morning of the battle of Manassas, as like a holiday exhibition on a race-course.

The scene was an extraordinary one. It had a beauty and grandeur, apart from the revolting spectacle of the bedizened and indecent rabble that watched from a hill in the rear of the army the dim outlines of the battle, and enjoyed the nervous emotions of the thunders of its artillery. The gay uniforms of the Northern soldiers, their streaming flags, and glistering bayonets, added strange charms to the primeval forests of Virginia. No theatre of battle could have been more magnificent in its addresses to the eye. The plains, broken by a wooded and intricate country, were bounded as far as the eye could see to the west by the azure combs of the Blue Ridge. The quiet Sabbath morning opened upon the scene, enlivened by moving masses of men; the red lights of the morning, however, had scarcely broken upon that scene with its landscapes, its forests and its garniture, before it was obscured in the clouds of battle. For long intervals nothing of the conflict was presented to those viewing it at a distance but wide and torn curtains of smoke and dust, and the endless beat of the artillery.

Orders had been issued by McDowell for the Grand Army to be in motion by two o'clock on the morning of the 21st, and on route for their different positions in time to reach them, and be in position by break of day. It was also ordered that they should have four days' rations cooked and stored away in their haversacks—evidently for the purpose of gaining Manassas, and holding it, until their supplies should reach them by the railroad from Alexandria. Thus stood the arrangements of the Northern forces on the evening preceding the battle of the 21st.

It is a remarkable circumstance of the Battle of Manassas, that it was fought on our side without any other plan than to suit the contingencies arising out of the development of the enemy's designs, as it occurred in the progress of the action. Several plans of battle had been proposed by General Beauregard, but had been defeated by the force of circumstances. He had been unwilling to receive the enemy on the defensive line of Bull Run, and had determined on attacking him at Centreville. In the meantime, General Johnston had been ordered to form a junction of his army corps with that of General Beauregard, should the movement, in his judgment, be deemed advisable. The best service which the army of the Shenandoah could render was to prevent the defeat of that of the Potomac. To be able to do this, it was necessary for General Johnston to defeat General Patterson or to elude him. The latter course was the most speedy and certain, and was, therefore, adopted. Evading the enemy by the disposition of the advance guard under Colonel Stuart, our army moved through Ashby's Gap to Piedmont, a station of the Manassas Gap railroad. Hence, the infantry were to be transported by the railway, while the cavalry and artillery were ordered to continue their march. General Johnston reached Manassas about noon on the 20th, preceded by the 7th and 8th Georgia regiments, and by Jackson's brigade, consisting of the 2nd, 4th, 5th, 27th, and 33rd Virginia regiments. He was accompanied by General Bee, with the 4th Alabama, the 2nd and two companies of the 11th Mississippi. The president of the railroad had assured him that the remaining troops should arrive during the day.

General Johnston, being the senior in rank, necessarily assumed command of all the forces of the Confederate States then concentrating at Manassas. He, however, approved the plans of General Beauregard, and generously directed their execution under his command. It was determined that the two forces should be united within the lines of Bull Run, and thence advance to the attack of the enemy, before Patterson's junction with McDowell, which was daily expected. The plan of battle was again disconcerted. In consequence of the untoward detention on the railroad of some five thousand of General Johnston's forces that had been expected to reach Manassas prior to the battle, it became necessary, on the morning of the 21st, before daylight, to modify the plan accepted, to suit the contingency of an immediate attack on our lines by the main force of the enemy, then plainly at hand. It thus happened that a battle ensued, different in place and circumstance from any previous plan on our side.

Our effective force of all arms, ready for action on the field on the eventful morning, was less than thirty thousand men. Our troops were divided into eight brigades, occupying the defensive line of Bull Run. Brigadier-General Ewell's was posted at the Union Mill's Ford; Brigadier-General D. R.

Jones' at McLean's Ford; Brigadier-General Longstreet's at Blackburn's Ford; Brigadier-General Bonham's at Mitchell's Ford; Colonel Cooke's at Ball's Ford, some three miles above, and Colonel Evans, with a regiment and battalion, formed the extreme left at the Stone Bridge. The brigades of Brigadier-General Holmes and Colonel Early were in reserve in rear of the right.

In his entire ignorance of the enemy's plan of attack, General Beauregard was compelled to keep his army posted along the stream for some eight or ten miles, while his wily adversary developed his purpose to him. The subsequent official reports of McDowell and his officers show that that commander had abandoned his former purpose of marching on Manassas by the lower routes from Washington and Alexandria, and had resolved upon turning the left flank of the Confederates.

The fifth division of his Grand Army, composed of at least of four brigades, under command of General Miles, was to remain at Centreville, in reserve, and to make a false attack on Blackburn's and Mitchell's Fords, and thereby deceive General Beauregard as to its intention. The first division composed of at least three brigades, commanded by General Tyler, was to take position at the Stone Bridge, and feign attack on that point. The third division, composed of at least three brigades, commanded by Heintzelman, was to proceed as quietly as possible to the Red House Ford, and there remain until the troops guarding that ford should be cleared away. The second division, composed of three or four brigades, commanded by Hunter, was to march, unobserved by the Confederate troops, to Sudley, and there cross over the run, and move down the stream to the Red House Ford, and clear away any troops that might be guarding that point, where he was to be joined by the third or Heintzelman's division. Together, these two divisions were to charge upon, and drive away, any troops that might be stationed at the Stone Bridge, when Tyler's division was to cross over and join them, and thus produce a junction of three formidable divisions of the Grand Army across the run, for offensive operations against the forces of General Beauregard, which the enemy expected to find scattered along the run for seven or eight miles—the bulk of them being at and below Mitchell's Ford, and so situated as to render a concerted movement by them utterly impracticable.

Soon after sunrise, the enemy appeared in force in front of Colonel Evans' position at the Stone Bridge, and opened a light cannonade. The monstrous inequality of the two forces at this point was not developed. Colonel Evans only observed in his immediate front the advance portion of General Schenck's brigade of General Tyler's division and two other heavy brigades. This division of the enemy's forces numbered nine thousand men and thirteen pieces of artillery—Carlisle's and Ayres' batteries—that is, nine hundred men and two six-pounders confronted by nine thousand men and thirteen pieces of artillery, mostly rifled.

A movement was instantly determined upon by General Beauregard to relieve his left flank, by a rapid, determined attack with his right wing and centre on the enemy's flank and rear at Centreville, with precautions against the advance of his reserves from the direction of Washington.

In the quarter of the Stone Bridge, the two armies stood for more than an hour engaged in slight skirmishing, while the main body of the enemy was marching his devious way through the "Big Forest," to cross Bull Run some two miles above our left, to take our forces in flank and rear. This movement was fortunately discovered in time for us to check its progress, and ultimately to form a new line of battle nearly at right angles with the defensive line of Bull Run.

On discovering that the enemy had crossed the stream above him, Colonel Evans moved to his left with eleven companies and two field pieces to oppose his advance, and disposed his little force under cover of the wood, near the intersection of the Warrenton turnpike and the Sudley-road. Here he was attacked by the enemy in immensely superior numbers.

The enemy, beginning his detour from the turnpike, at a point nearly half way between Stone Bridge and Centreville, had pursued a tortuous narrow track of a rarely-used road, through a dense wood, the greater part of his way, until near the Sudley-road. A division under Colonel Hunter, of the Federal regular army, of two strong brigades, was in the advance, followed immediately by another division, under Colonel Heintzelman, of three brigades, and seven companies of regular cavalry, and twenty-four pieces of artillery, eighteen of which were rifle guns. This column, as it crossed Bull Run, numbered over sixteen thousand men, of all arms, by their own accounts.

Burnside's brigade—which here, as at Fairfax Court-house, led the advance at about 9.45 a.m., debouched from a wood in sight of Evans' position, some five hundred yards distant from Wheat's Louisiana battalion. He immediately threw forward his skirmishers in force, and they became engaged with Wheat's command. The Federals at once advanced, as they report officially, the 2nd Rhode Island regiment volunteers, with its vaunted battery of six thirteen-pounder rifle guns. Sloan's companies of the 4th South Carolina were then brought into action, having been pushed forward through the woods. The enemy, soon galled and staggered by the fire, and pressed by the determined valour with which Wheat handled his battalion, until he was desperately wounded, hastened up three other regiments of the brigade and two Dahlgren howitzers, making in all quite three thousand five hundred bayonets and eight pieces of artillery, opposed to less than eight hundred men and two six-pounder guns.

Despite this odds, this intrepid command, of but eleven weak companies, maintained its front to the enemy for quite an hour, and until General Bee came to their aid with his command.

General Bee, moving towards the enemy, guided by the firing, had selected the position near the now famous "Henry House," and formed his troops upon it. They were the 7th and 8th Georgia under Colonel Bartow, the 4th Alabama, 2nd Mississippi, and two companies of the 11th Mississippi regiments, with Imboden's battery. Being compelled, however, to sustain Colonel Evans, he crossed the valley, and formed on the right and somewhat in advance of his position. Here the joint force, little exceeding five regiments, with six field pieces, held the ground against about fifteen thousand Federal troops. A fierce and destructive conflict now ensued—the fire was withering on both sides, while the enemy swept our short thin lines with their numerous artillery, which, according to their official reports, at this time consisted of at least ten rifle guns and four howitzers. For an hour did these stout-hearted men, of the blended commands of Bee, Evans, and Bartow, breast an unintermitting battle-storm, animated surely by something more than the ordinary courage of even the bravest men under fire.

Two Federal brigades of Heintzelman's division were now brought into action, led by Rickett's superb light battery of six ten-pounder rifle guns, which, posted on an eminence to the right of the Sudley-road, opened fire on Imboden's battery. At this time, confronting the enemy, we had still but Evans' eleven companies and two guns—Bee's and Bartow's four regiments, the two companies 11th Mississippi under Lieutenant-Colonel Liddell, and the six pieces under Imboden and Richardson. The enemy had two divisions of four strong brigades, including seventeen companies of regular infantry, cavalry, and artillery, four companies of marines, and twenty pieces of artillery. Against this odds, scarcely credible, our advance position was still for a while maintained, and the enemy's ranks constantly broken and shattered under the scorching fire of our men; but fresh regiments of the Federals came upon the field, Sherman's and Keyes' brigades of Tyler's division, as is stated in their reports, numbering over six thousand bayonets, which had found a passage across the run, about eight hundred yards above the Stone Bridge, threatened our right.

Heavy losses had now been sustained on our side, both in numbers and in the personal worth of the slain. The 8th Georgia regiment had suffered heavily, being exposed, as it took and maintained its position, to a fire from the enemy, already posted within a hundred yards of their front and right, sheltered by fences and under cover. The 4th Alabama also suffered severely from the deadly fire of the thousands of muskets which they so dauntlessly confronted under the immediate leadership of the chivalrous Bee himself.

Now, however, with the surging mass of over fourteen thousand Federal infantry pressing on their front and under the incessant fire of at least twenty pieces of artillery, with the fresh brigades of Sherman and Keyes approaching—the latter already in musket range—our lines gave back, but under orders from General Bee.

As our shattered battalions retired, the slaughter was deplorable. They fell back in the direction of the Robinson House, under the fires of Heintzelman's division on one side, Keyes' and Sherman's brigades of Tyler's division on the other, and Hunter's division in their rear; and were compelled to engage the enemy at several points on their retreat, losing both officers and men, in order to keep them from closing in around them. Under the inexorable stress of the enemy's fire the retreat continued. The enemy seemed to be inspired with the idea that he had won the field; the news of a victory was carried to the rear, and in less than an hour thereafter, the telegraph had flashed the intelligence throughout all the cities in the North, that the Federal troops were completing their victory, and premature exultations ran from mouth to mouth in Washington.

If the enemy had observed the circumstances and character of this falling back of a portion of our lines, it would have been enough to have driven him in consternation from the field. With the terrible desperation that had sustained them so long in the face of five-fold odds and the most frightful losses, our troops fell back sullenly; at every step of their retreat staying, by their hard skirmishing, the flanking columns of the enemy.

The retreat was finally arrested just in rear of the Robinson House by the energy and resolution of General Bee, assisted by the support of the Hampton Legion, and the timely arrival of Jackson's brigade of five regiments. A moment before, General Bee had been well-nigh overwhelmed by superior numbers. He approached General Jackson with the pathetic exclamation, "General, they are beating us back;" to which the latter promptly replied "Sir, we'll give them the bayonet." General Bee immediately rallied his over-tasked troops with the words, "There is Jackson standing like a stone-wall. Let us determine to die here, and we will conquer."

In the meantime, the crisis of the battle and the full development of the enemy's designs had been perceived by our generals. They were yet four miles away from the immediate field of action, having placed themselves on a commanding hill in rear of General Bonham's left, to observe the movements of the enemy. There could be no mistake now of the enemy's intentions, from the violent firing on the left and the immense clouds of dust raised by the march of a large body of troops from his centre. With the keenest impatience, General Beauregard awaited the execution of his orders of the morning; which were intended to relieve his left flank by an attack on the enemy's flank and rear at Centreville. As the continuous roll of musketry and the sustained din of the artillery, announced the serious outburst of the battle on our left flank, he anxiously, but confidently, awaited similar sounds of conflict from our front at Centreville. When it was too late for the effective execution of the contemplated movement, he was informed, to his profound disappointment, that his orders for an advance had miscarried.

No time was to be lost. It became immediately necessary to depend on new combinations, and to meet the enemy on the field upon which he had chosen to give us battle. It was plain that nothing but the most rapid combinations and the most heroic and devoted courage on the part of our troops could retrieve the field, which, according to all military conditions appeared to be positively lost.

About noon, the scene of the battle was unutterably sublime. Not until then could one of the present generation, who had never witnessed a grand battle, have imagined such a spectacle. The hill occupied in the morning by Generals Beauregard, Johnson and Bonham, and their staffs, placed the whole scene before one—a grand moving diorama. When the firing was at its height, the roar of artillery reached the hill like that of protracted thunder. For one long mile the whole valley was a boiling crater of dust and smoke. Occasionally the yells of our men, in the few instances in which the enemy fell back, rose above the roar of artillery. In the distance rose the Blue Ridge, to form the dark background of a most magnificent picture.

The condition of the battle-field was now, at the least, desperate. Our left flank was overpowered, and it became necessary to bring immediately up to their support the reserves not already in motion. Holmes' two regiments and battery of artillery, under Captain Lindsey Walker, of six guns, and Early's brigade were immediately ordered up to support our left flank. Two regiments from Bonham's brigade, with Kemper's four six-pounders, were also called for, and Generals Ewell, Jones, (D.R.) Longstreet and Bonham were directed to make a demonstration to their several fronts to retain and engross the enemy's reserves and any forces on their flank, and at and around Centreville.

Dashing on at headlong gallop, General Johnston and General Beauregard reached the field of action not a moment too soon. They were instantly occupied with the re-organization of the heroic troops, whose previous stand in stubborn and patriotic valour has nothing to exceed it in the records of history. It was now that General Johnston impressively and gallantly charged to the front, with the colours of the 4th Alabama Regiment by his side. The presence of the two generals with the troops under fire, and their example had the happiest effect. Order was soon restored. In a brief and rapid conference, General Beauregard was assigned to the command of the left, which, as the younger officer, he claimed, while General Johnston returned to that of the whole field.

The battle was now re-established. The aspect of affairs was critical and desperate in the extreme.

Confronting the enemy at this time, General Beauregard's forces numbered, at most, not more than six thousand five hundred infantry and artillery, with but thirteen pieces of artillery, and two companies of Stuart's cavalry.

The enemy's force now bearing hotly and confidently down on our position—regiment after regiment of the best equipped men that ever took the field—according to their own official history of the day, was formed of Colonels Hunter's and Heintzelman's divisions, Colonels Sherman's and Keyes' brigades of Tyler's division, and of the formidable batteries of Ricketts Griffin and Arnold regulars, and 2nd Rhode Island, and two Dahlgren howitzers—a force of over twenty thousand infantry, seven companies of regular cavalry, and twenty-four pieces of improved artillery. At the same time, perilous, heavy reserves of infantry and artillery hung in the distance, around the Stone Bridge, Mitchell's Blackbura's and the Union Mills' Fords, visibly ready to fall upon us at any moment.

Fully conscious of the portentous disparity of force, General Beauregard, as he posted the lines for the encounter, spoke words of encouragement to the men to inspire their confidence and determined spirit of resistance. He urged them to the resolution of victory or death on the field. The men responded with loud and eager cheers, and the commander felt re-assured of the unconquerable spirit of his army.

In the meantime, the enemy had seized upon the plateau on which Robinson's and the Henry houses are situated—the position first occupied in the morning by General Bee, before advancing to the support of Evans—Rickett's battery of six rifle guns, the pride of the Federalists, the object of their untiring expenditure in outfit, and the equally powerful regular light battery of Griffin, were brought forward and placed in immediate action, after having, conjointly with the batteries already mentioned, played from former positions with destructive effect upon our forward battalions.

About two o'clock in the afternoon, General Beauregard gave the order for the right of his line, except his reserves, to advance to recover the plateau. It was done with uncommon resolution and vigour, and at the same time Jackson's brigade pierced the enemy's centre with the determination of veterans and the spirit of men who fight for a sacred cause; but it suffered seriously. With equal spirit the other parts of the line made the onset, and the Federal lines were broken and swept back at all points from the open ground of the plateau. Rallying soon, however, as they were strongly reinforced by fresh regiments, the Federals returned, and, by the weight of numbers, pressed our lines back, recovered their ground and guns, and renewed the offensive.

By this time, between half-past 2 and 3 o'clock, p.m., our reinforcements pushed forward, and directed by General Johnston, to the required quarter, were at hand just as General Beauregard had ordered forward, to a second effort, for the recovery of the disputed plateau, the whole line, including his reserve, which, at this crisis of the battle, the commander felt called upon to lead in person. This attack was general, and was shared in by every regiment then in the field, including the 6th (Fisher's) North Carolina regiment, which had just come up. The whole open ground was again swept clear of the enemy, and the plateau around the Henry and Robinson houses remained finally in our possession, with the greater part of the Ricketts and Griffin batteries. This part of the day was rich with deeds of individual coolness and dauntless conduct, as well as well-directed, embodied resolution and bravery, but fraught with the loss to the service of the country, of lives of inestimable preciousness at this juncture. The brave Bee was mortally wounded at the head of the 4th Alabama and some Mississippians, in the open field near the Henry house; and, a few yards distant, Colonel Bartow had fallen, shot through the heart. He was grasping the standard of his regiment as he was shot, and calling the remnants of his command to rally and follow him. He spoke after receiving his mortal wound, and his words were memorable. To the few of his brave men who gathered around him he said, "They have killed me, but never give up the field." That last command was gallantly obeyed, and his men silenced the battery of which he died in the charge. Colonel Fisher had also been killed. He had fallen at the head of the torn and thinned ranks of his regiment.

The conflict had been awfully terrific. The enemy had been driven back on our right entirely across the turnpike, and beyond Young's branch on our left. At this moment, the desired reinforcements arrived. Withers' 18th regiment of Cooke's brigade had come up in time to follow the charge. Kershaw's 2nd and Cash's 8th South Carolina regiments arrived soon after Withers', and were assigned an advantageous position. A more important accession, however, to our forces was at hand. A courier had galloped from Manassas to report that a Federal army had reached the line of the Manassas Gap railroad, was marching towards us, and was then about three or four miles from our left flank. Instead, however, of the enemy, it was the long-expected reinforcements. General Kirby Smith, with some seventeen hundred infantry of Elzey's brigade of the Army of the Shenandoah and Beckham's battery, had reached Manassas, by railroad, at noon. His forces were instantly marched across the fields to the scene of action.

The flying enemy had been rallied under cover of a strong Federal brigade, posted on a plateau near the intersection of the turnpike and the Sudley Brentsville-road, and was now making demonstrations to outflank and drive back our left, and thus separate us from Manassas. General Smith was instructed by General Johnston to attack the right flank of the enemy, now exposed to us. Before the movement was completed, he fell severely wounded. Colonel Elzey, at once taking command, proceeded to execute it with promptness and vigour, while General Beauregard rapidly seized the opportunity, and threw forward his whole line.

About 3.30 p.m., the enemy, driven back on their left and centre, and brushed from the woods bordering the Sudley road, south and west of the Henry house, had formed a line of battle of truly formidable proportions, of crescent outline, reaching on their left, from vicinity of Pittsylvania (the old Carter mansion), by Matthew's and in rear of Dogan's, across the turnpike near to Chimm's house. The woods and fields were filled with their masses of infantry and their carefully preserved cavalry. It was a truly magnificent, though redoubtable spectacle, as they threw forward in fine style, on the broad gentle slopes of the ridge occupied by their main lines, a cloud of skirmishers, preparatory for another attack.

Colonel Early, who, by some mischance, did not receive orders until 2 o'clock, which had been sent him at noon, came on the ground immediately after Elzey, with Kemper's 7th Virginia, Hay's 7th Louisiana, and Barksdale's 13th Mississippi regiments. This brigade, by the personal direction of General Johnston, was marched by the Holkham house, across the fields to the left, entirely around the woods through which Elzey had passed, and under a severe fire, into a position in line of battle near Chimm's house, outflanking the enemy's right.

The enemy was making his last attempt to retrieve the day. He had re-formed to renew the battle, again extending his right with a still wider sweep to turn our left. Col. Early was ordered to throw himself directly upon the right flank of the enemy, supported by Col. Stuart's cavalry and Beckham's battery. As Early formed his line, and Beckham's pieces played upon the right of the enemy, Elzey's brigade, Gibben's 10th Virginia, Lieut. Col. Stuart's 1st Maryland, and Vaughan's 3rd Tennessee regiments, and Cash's 8th and Kershaw's 2nd South Carolina, Withers' 18th and Preston's 28th Virginia, advanced in an irregular line, almost simultaneously. The charge made by General Beauregard in front, was sustained by the resolute attack of Early on the right flank and rear. The combined attack was too much for the enemy. He was forced over the narrow plateau made by the intersection of the two roads already mentioned. He was driven into the fields, where his masses commenced to scatter in all available directions towards Bull Run. He had lost all the artillery which he had advanced to the last scene of the conflict; he had no more fresh troops to rally on, and there were no combinations to avail him to make another stand. The day was ours. From the long contested hill from which the enemy had been driven back, his retreating masses might be seen to break over the fields stretching beyond, as the panic gathered in their rear. The rout had become general and confused; the fields were covered with black swarms of flying soldiers, while cheers and yells taken up along our lines, for the distance of miles, rung in the ears of the panic-stricken fugitives.

THE ROUT.

Early's brigade, meanwhile, joined by the 19th Virginian regiment, of Cooke's brigade, pursued the now panic-stricken fugitive enemy. Stuart, with his cavalry, and Beckham had also taken up the pursuit along the road by which the enemy had come upon the field that morning; but, soon cumbered by prisoners who thronged the way, the former was unable to attack the mass of the fast-fleeing, frantic Federals. The want of a cavalry force of sufficient numbers made an efficient pursuit a military impossibility.

But the pressure of close and general pursuit was not necessary to disorganise the flight of the enemy. Capt. Kemper pursued the retreating masses to within range of Cub Run Bridge. Upon the bridge, a shot took effect upon the horses of a team that was crossing. The wagon was overturned directly in the centre of the bridge, and the passage was completely obstructed. The Confederates continued to play their artillery upon the train carriages and artillery wagons, and these were reduced to ruins. Cannons and caissons, ambulances and train wagons, and hundreds of soldiers rushed down the hill into a common heap, struggling and scrambling to cross the stream and get away from their pursuers.

The retreat, the panic, the heedless, headlong confusion was soon beyond a hope. Officers with leaves and eagles on their shoulder-straps, majors and colonels who had deserted their comrades passed, galloping as if for dear life. Not a field officer seemed to have remembered his duty. The flying teams and wagons confused and dismembered every corps. For three miles, hosts of the Federal troops—all detached from their regiments, all mingled in one disorderly rout—were fleeing along the road. Army wagons, sutler's teams and private carriages choked the passage, tumbling against each other amid clouds of dust, and sickening sights and sounds. Hacks containing unlucky spectators of the late affray were smashed like glass, and the occupants were lost sight of in the debris. Horses, flying wildly from the battle-field, many of them in death agony, galloped at random forward, joining in the stampede. Those on foot who could catch them rode them bare-back, as much to save themselves from being run over as to make quick time.

Wounded men lying along the banks—the few either left on the field or not taken to the captured hospitals appealed, with raised hands, to those who rode horses, begging to be lifted behind; but few regarded such petitions. Then, the artillery, such as were saved, came thundering along, smashing and overpowering everything. The regular cavalry joined in the melee, adding to its terrors, for they rode down footmen without mercy. One of the great guns was overturned and lay amid the ruins of a caisson. Sights of wild and terrible agony met the eye everywhere. An eye-witness of the scene describes the despairing efforts of an artilleryman, who was running between the ponderous fore and after-wheels of his gun-carriage, hanging on with both hands and vainly striving to jump upon the ordnance. The drivers were spurring the horses; he could not eling much longer, and a more agonised expression never fixed the features of a drowning man. The carriage bounded from the roughness of a steep hill leading to a creek; he lost his hold, fell, and in an instant the great wheels had crushed the life out of him.

The retreat did not slacken in the least until Centreville was reached. There, the sight of the reserve—Mile's brigade—formed in order on the hill, seemed somewhat to re-assure the van. The rally was soon overcome by a few sharp discharges of artillery, the Confederates having a gun taken from the enemy in position. The teams and foot soldiers pushed on, passing their own camp and heading swiftly for the distant Potomac.

The men literally screamed with rage and fright when their way was blocked up. At every shot, a convulsion, as it were, seized upon the morbid mass of bones, sinews, wood and iron, and thrilled through it, giving new energy and action to its desperate efforts to get free from itself. The cry of "cavalry" arose. Mounted men still rode faster, shouting out "cavalry is coming." For miles the roar of the flight might be heard. Negro servants on lead horses dashed frantically past, men in uniform swarmed by on mules, chargers, and even draught horses, which had been cut out of carts and wagons, and went on with harness clinging to their heels as frightened as their riders. "We're whipped," "we're whipped," was the universal cry. The buggies and light waggon tried to pierce the rear of the mass of carts, which were now solidified and moving on like a glacier; while further a head the number of mounted men increased, and the volume of fugitives became denser.

For ten miles, the road over which the Grand Army had so lately passed southward, gay with unstained banners, and flushed with surety of strength, was covered with the fragments of its retreating forces, shattered and panic-stricken in a single day.

ON BOARD THE ALABAMA.

The following letter has been published in the Liverpool Mercury :—

Southern Confederate Steamer, Alabama,
Oct. 30, lat. 41.30, long 45.

Dear —,—Though I put to this letter the date of October 30, there is no saying, d'ye see, when you may get it; for, although I have pen and ink and all the other conveniences for writing, there is no post-office alongside into which I can conveniently drop it when written. There are few "friends" to visit the Alabama, and those persons who board and lodge with us for a time are too much taken up with their own affairs, and too anxious about getting away, to do a favour for any one else. Some of them we neither would nor dare ask. However, it must take its chance when the time comes.

I know your feelings were not in favour of my embarking in this enterprise, yet I assure you that I am taking well with both the ship, captain, and cause. . . . No crew could be more comfortable than ours is, though, from the always watchful nature of the duties which devolve upon us, more discipline and active duty are enforced than we shall, perhaps, get credit for. Plenty to eat, plenty to drink, and plenty of work to do, is the order of the day, and of every day.

It would be an endless task for me to attempt to give you even an outline of the fearful havoc we have committed among the Yankee vessels since we left the shores of the Mersey, or of the destruction of the many splendid ships, of which not one plank was left fastened to another. Among the finest was a vessel bound for Bremen, but not very heavy cargo, laden; the Wave Crest, bound from New York to Cardiff, Captain Hammond; the Manchester, from New York to Liverpool the Three Stars, whale ship; and a new bark, the Dunkirk, Captain Johnston, from New York to London. We have already taken about twenty vessels, laden with every article which it is possible almost for the countries of the world to produce, and they have all been destroyed with the exception of one or two whose commanders have given bonds for various amounts of ransom to Captain Semmes, payable to the President of the Confederate States when peace is proclaimed. The last one which we let off was the Tonawanda, which lay beside us several days, and had a good deal of British property, with some doubtful, aboard—the captain and crew being aboard our vessel. They were all glad to get away, but the only reason why such a course was pursued was that they had a large number of females on board as passengers, which the skipper said could not be stowed in our "fixins" now. The historical chivalry of the South would not permit of our disturbing or molesting the females, so we took his bond, put the prisoners we had on board, and sent her away, Semmes declaring that it was enough to break a man's heart to see that he was compelled to part in such a way with so splendid a ship.

It is next to a play to hear the fellows themselves tell how they were taken, and what they thought of us when first sighted. The mate of the Manchester stated that all on board his ship was in good order, going with a stiff breeze from S.S.W., when the look-out reported a sail on the beam. The red cross of St. George was flying, and the day being clear, our guns were made out quite visible. The man at the wheel remarked to the captain, "There's a British man-of-war bearing down us; we had better show our colours." The captain shortly after ordered them to be hoisted. Away went the stars and stripes, and, almost at the same moment, down went the British ensign, and in its place appeared the full flag of the Confederates. A 10lb. shot right across the bows astonished the captain, who, after a rapid survey through his glass, exclaimed, "It's that — pirate Semmes; the ship is lost!" I may only add that a few hours more and they were all prisoners on board the Alabama, and the last we saw of the Manchester the succeeding night was a bright sheet of fire in the horizon line as the darkness fell. The prisoners we take are treated as well as possible, "though our having so many hands on board prevents them all from receiving what might be considered proper accommodation. Some are made comfortable enough, but there are impudent and insulting Yankees who are not thankful even for their lives being spared, and they must take the consequences.

Since we have come into these waters we have got some splendid guns additional, all mounted; and, what with our own crew and brave volunteers who have since joined us, we are now able to fight as well as run, and both at the same time if need be so. We have also plenty of news about ourselves on board in the New York Times, Herald, the Shipping Gazette, Liverpool Mercury, and Gore's Advertiser, &c. Some of the New York papers, illustrated, give frightful pictures of the engagements their vessels have had with us, making them all surrounded with smoke and firing into us, all of which we heartily enjoy. One thing is certain,—they never will take the Alabama nor a man of us alive. Captain, officers, and men know their duty, and are quite aware of the doom which would befall them if taken, for there are no croakers or skulkers here; but if so unlikely a thing should take place, and the hair of one of our heads be injured, our commander assures us that the Government of Richmond will hang a regiment of Yankee officers in retaliation.

Captain Semmes (or the admiral, as we call him among ourselves both fore and aft) is of opinion that the war will be settled in the beginning of the year, and in that case we shall all be provided for for life. No more sea for me after that. Previous to the 20th of this month our prize-money alone was worth from £400 to £500 a man. So I am looking forward to the day when I shall return to Liverpool, and, relieved from the drudgery of a sea life, spend my remaining years in peace and contentment beneath the shadow of the extended wings of the Liver.

AMERICAN DIAMOND.—The largest diamond in North America is now being exhibited at Boston. It was found about a year since in the northern part of North Carolina, on the Virginia border, near the Blue Ridge. In the rough it weighed nearly 24 carats, and the cut diamond weighs nearly 12 carats. Its value is between $10,000 and $13,000, and but for two almost inappreciable spots it would be worth more. In size it approaches a large plum-stone in length, but it is deeper and broader, almost a square on the face, with rounded corners, DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA.

By ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE. Translated by HENRY REEVE, Esq. New Edition, with an Introductory Notice by the Translator.

"We cannot conceive a more opportune venture at this moment than the appearance of a new edition of M. DE TOCQUEVILLE'S 'America,' when the anticipations he published so many years back are come to the test of a practical fulfilment. His translator, Mr. HENRY REEVE, naturally glances at the great and grave changes which have passed over the world since twenty-five years ago, the first portion of this commentary on the American Constitution was published; and no less naturally and reasonably he insists on the fact, which is so startling a testimony to the prescience of TOCQUEVILLE'S philosophy, that the years which have swept away so much have left this book to stand."—Times.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies. Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade. The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property, &c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

We have received a file of the Charleston Courier to the 13th of November. From the latest dates we collect the following items of war news:—

On the 9th of Nov., about 5000 Federals marched from Washington, Martin county, North Carolina, to a point on the Roanoke River, below Williamston, to cut off the 17th and 57th Regiments stationed near by, and some miles below Plymouth. Four companies of the 26th Regiment, commanded by Colonel Burgwyn, stationed near Williamston, encountered the whole of the enemy's force, and kept them at bay during the day, giving time for the 17th and 57th to come up, and at night the entire Confederate forces, including cavalry and artillery, had reached the scene, and offered battle to the enemy, who fell back in order to prevent a fight. The skirmishing and shelling was kept up by the four companies and gunboats until 10 o'clock, p.m. The Confederate loss is reported two killed and thirty-one wounded, most of them very slightly. The Federal loss was very heavy—one entire cavalry company being cut up and destroyed.

On the 5th Nov., a demonstration was made on Nashville by General Forrest on the south and General Morgan on the north side. General Morgan was quite successful, destroying many cars, locomotives, and bridges. The Confederates killed and wounded from 75 to 100 Federals. Their own loss was very slight.

On the 9th of November, General Stuart, with Fitzhugh Lee's brigade, surprised the camp of Colonel Bayard, near Leesburg, Virginia, took seventy-one prisoners and the entire encampment.

The Courier of the 7th, says:—

A gentleman from Masonboro', North Carolina, reports the capture of a lieutenant and eighteen seamen from one of the blockaders off the North Carolina coast. This party had been sent in a launch to destroy the brig which had got ashore at that point in attempting to run the blockade. After setting fire to the brig, they started in pursuit of the passengers and crew, who had secured the most of their baggage and were endeavouring to escape. The pursuers landed, but were soon after met by a cavalry and infantry company, who surrounded the party and marched them off prisoners.

The Federals evacuated Greenville, West Carolina, on the 11th of November, taking nine citizens with them. They have also left Plymouth.

The Presidential Message to the United States' Congress was looked for on this side of the Atlantic with curiosity, not anxiety. Europe does not expect from Mr. Lincoln, or rather from the party of which he is the mouthpiece, any broad statesmanlike views, because the ruling faction in the North is committed to a policy perfectly defined, and, as the world at large thinks, utterly impracticable, but which will be adhered to as far as possible, since any deviation from it would deprive the Federal Government of the support of those on whom it has elected to rely. Nor did Europe expect that the Message would give any verbal promise of peace. Mr. Lincoln must be the last man to acknowledge that the cause of re-union is hopeless, just as the North will naturally be the last nation to formally recognize the nationality of the Confederate States. But it was correctly supposed that the Message would to some extent indicate the position and strength of the Federal Government, and show what effect the late elections have had on Mr. Lincoln and his advisers. We elsewhere give the Message in extenso, and in this place we propose to glance at its principal points, not offering any opinion upon their policy, but contrasting them with facts, which make them intelligible or significant.

The telegraphic summary of the Message described it as moderate in tone towards the South, and so it is, though the Republicans, who are discontented with it, might console themselves with the practical bearing of Mr. Lincoln's observations. The release of the political prisoners illegally arrested prepared us for seeming moderation, for that act proved that Mr. Lincoln was not ready to provoke such a Democratic opposition as would embarrass his Government. Not only is the Message moderate in tone towards the South, but it is exceedingly so with respect to Europe; though the sting with regard to England left out of the Message was put into the Report of the Secretary of the Navy. The moderation does not assume any tangible form, and is not very acceptable to any of the parties interested.

The part of the Message that most persons will turn to with the greatest interest is that which refers to emancipation. Does Mr. Lincoln intend to carry out his proclamation so far as he has the power? Does he mean, on and after the 1st of January, 1863, to do his best to stir up a servile war in the South? This subject is treated at length, but with an ambiguity that reminds us strongly of the pettifoggery of a country attorney, and which may for a moment bewilder, but cannot, we should think, deceive, any party in the North. Mr. Lincoln has come out with a new emancipation scheme, which is opposed to and yet is not to stay the action of his proclamation. Instead of the 1st of January, 1863, he offers upon impossible conditions to put off emancipation till the 1st of January, 1900, and his scheme includes, amongst other things, amendments of the Federal Constitution, to be concurred in by two-thirds of both Houses of the Federal Congress, and then submitted to the Legislatures and Committees of the several States, and if approved by three-fourths of them to be valid parts of the Constitution. The amendments suggested consist of several articles. Slavery is to be at an end in 1900; and any States abolishing slavery before that year are to be compensated for the loss of the slaves, the price to be paid in United States' bonds. Negroes who get free by the chances of war, are to be free for ever, and loyal owners are to be compensated. Congress is to be authorized to provide funds for the deportation of free negroes. It is surely somewhat singular that Mr. Lincoln should now ask for amendments of the Constitution to do the acts that he has already performed, and is still performing. By so doing he avows that his proclamation is illegal, and that his generals, who are kidnapping as many slaves as they can get hold of, are acting illegally. If not what need would there be for so amending the Constitution as to legalize such proceedings?

According to the census of 1860 there were 3,952,801 slaves in the United States; and taking them at an average value of £120—a very low average—it would require £475,000,000 to redeem them. The North cannot pay her present debts; where, then, is she to find such a sum of money as £475,000,000? And, further, what guarantee can Mr. Lincoln give the South that the proposed bonds will not be repudiated? What, then, is the object of making this impracticable proposal? Mr. Lincoln says it is not necessary for the restoration of the Union, and that its recommendation by Congress would not stay the war nor the Emancipation proclamation. The Republicans are thus assured that on the 1st of January, 1863, the edict issued at their instigation will be, as far as possible, put in force; and on the other hand, it is hoped that the proposal may in some way or other conciliate the Democrats. To suggest an amendment to the Constitution to reconcile the constitutional party to an emancipation policy, and at the same time to assure the Republicans that without waiting for the amendment of the Constitution, their pet scheme will be carried out in spite of the restraints of the Constitution, is a bold inconsistency.

The only paragraph in relation to foreign affairs to which we need direct special attention is that in which Mr. Lincoln indulges in flights of imagination that put Pope's celebrated paper capture of 10,000 prisoners into the shade. He says: "In June last there were some grounds to expect that the maritime Powers which at the commencement of American difficulties so unwisely and unnecessarily recognized the insurgents as belligerents would soon recede from that position, which has proved only less injurious to themselves than to America. But temporary reverses which afterwards befel the Federal arms, and which were exaggerated by disloyal citizens abroad, have hitherto delayed that act of simple justice." The necessity and wisdom of recognizing the Confederates as belligerents according to the custom of nations and the provisions of international law, we will not discuss. Mr. Lincoln unfortunately forgets that within the last few months he himself has been guilty of the "unwise and unnecessary" act of recognizing the Confederates as belligerents by negotiating a treaty for the exchange of prisoners. But Mr. Lincoln knows, as well as we know, that neither in June last, nor at any time before or since June last, was there the slightest ground for supposing that the maritime Powers would be guilty of the injustice and absurdity of refusing to recognize a belligerent Power as a belligerent Power. And what does Mr. Lincoln mean by "temporary reverses"? Does he refer to the slight check, the unimportant repulse, of the Seven Days' Battle? Still, we must remember that after the Army of the Potomac had been demoralized and beaten, Mr. Lincoln assured the broken remnant then cowering under the shelter of the Federal gunboats, that it never had and never would be beaten; and that, therefore, it is for him surprising frankness when he admits that the defeat and destruction of a powerful and splendidly-equipped army was a "temporary reverse."

Mr. Lincoln is particularly delighted that the British Government has evinced "a jealous respect for the authority of the United States, and the rights of their moral and loyal citizens." Are we to understand that all disloyal citizens are immoral, and that all loyal citizens are moral? Or does Mr. Lincoln mean us to infer that the British Government is not bound to respect the rights of loyal citizens who are immoral—such men, for instance, as the near and dear friends of his Cabinet whose honesty was assailed by the report of a certain commission of inquiry upon public speculation? Except that he is undignified, Mr. Lincoln is not, in his opinions and verbal absurdities, very much unlike George III.; for that monarch was under the impression that the revolution of the American colonists was not only a political offence, but a gross immorality and an unpardonable sin.

Since Mr. Lincoln is determined to carry on the war, it becomes important to see what are his means, and on this question the Message is explicit, though it does not reveal the whole truth. As to the military and naval forces, we are referred to the reports of the respective Secretaries; but in regard to finances the President gives us a little information on his own account. For the year ending June 1862, before the era of enormous enlistment bounties, the high price of gold, and the necessity of replacing the lost equipments of the army—the cost of the war has immensely increased since June—the total disbursements, we are told, were $570,000,000, and the receipts were $580,000,000. Who will say now that Mr. Chase is not a brilliant finance minister? Here we have an unparalleled expenditure suddenly thrust upon a country during a war that has cut off its most profitable trade, and yet there is an overflowing exchequer. Mr. Lincoln has a surplus. When we look to the particulars of Mr. Lincoln's statement, we find so little cause for Federal congratulation that we are rather surprised the naked truth was not covered with a verbal varnish, if not by clumsy fabrication. It was, we admit, necessary to be to some extent frank on the subject of finances, but the unpleasant facts might have been somewhat disguised. Out of the $584,000,000 of income received during the year ending June 1862, $530,000,000 was from loans and $59,000,000 from taxes. These figures of Mr. Lincoln are notoriously false, and they do not give anything like an adequate return of the indebtedness and expenditure of his Government; but accepting them, we have an admission which would make the North quake, if it were not for the comforting assurance that if the South cannot be conquered and made to defray the expenses of the war, there is repudiation as a last resource. The North is in the situation of a tradesman who is fearfully involved in debt, who goes on increasing his liabilities in the hope that some of his speculations will set him right, and who resolves, if they do not, to begin the world afresh. Only an eleventh part of the Federal expenditure, according to Mr. Lincoln's statement, was met by taxes; and if the actual expenditure was stated, it would be found that the taxes for the year hardly covered the interest on the year's loans. If an English journal had put forward such an account of Federal finances as Mr. Lincoln has done, the Northern press would have threatened us with dire vengeance and annihilation for so misrepresenting the financial condition of the prosperous United States.

Mr. Lincoln says disunion is impracticable, and that "there is no line, straight or crooked, suitable for a national boundary upon which to divide." Mr. Lincoln can see the practicability of schemes for buying and deporting four millions of slaves without money, or of any other scheme that has not been and never will be tried; but he cannot perceive the practicability of that accomplished fact—the dissolution of the late United States. None are so hopelessly blind as those who will not see.

Amongst the comments made in the Northern papers on the Message is an expression of surprise, mingled with indignation, that it totally ignores all military and naval sacrifices, makes no kind allusion to the past, and holds out no bright promise for the future. After making, according to the Times' correspondent, the blunder of cashiering and discharging officers in November who were killed in battle some months before, we do not wonder at Mr. Lincoln's neglect of the army; though it is not politic, but is, likely enough, careless and not wilful. Perhaps it was difficult to refer to military affairs. Was he, in a Message to Congress, to thank the troops for victories they never achieved? Or was he to acknowledge defeats which he and his Cabinet have hitherto stoutly and solemnly denied? There is another omission, which was not worth the notice of the Northern press, but which foreigners will not fail to note. Mr. Lincoln concludes his Message with pious expressions that, considering the weight of responsibility attaching to his position, we might readily believe were unfeigned; but is it not remarkable that a ruler, conscious of his responsibility, should not have said one word about those deeds of his officers which have shocked humanity and been execrated by the civilized world? Mr. Lincoln cannot plead a short memory; whilst he was preparing his Message the news came that the Confederate President had issued an order for the punishment of the Palmyra massacre. Was the report of that tragedy false? Are McNeil, Butler, and Turchin guiltless of the infamous crimes ascribed to them? If it were so, surely Mr. Lincoln might have denied the accusations, or, at all events, he might have done so in the case of McNeil. His silence is a virtual acknowledgment of the truth of the charge, and the tacit confession is a proof of his moral cowardice. Allman, for whose supposed death McNeil butchered ten innocent men, has returned to his home in perfect health. Does Mr. Lincoln think the Palmyra Massacre is an action "the world will for ever applaud, and God for ever bless"?

The Report of General Halleck so far as it relates to the conduct of the campaign is not worth consideration until we have General McClellan's version of the affair. It is not very generous thus to asperse the reputation of his rival; but perhaps General Halleck indulges in the petty spite because, whilst it pleases him, he knows no one will think the worse of General McClellan on account of his censures. General Halleck seems to be happily oblivious of his own disastrous campaign in the West, and assumes the air of a general who is not only gifted with military genius of the highest order, but who has also been singularly fortunate in all his military undertakings. With regard to the Report of the Federal Secretary of War we can only remark that it is exceedingly bold. It states that there are 800,000 soldiers fully armed and equipped, whilst it is tolerably certain that the effective Federal force does not exceed half that number. We do not doubt that rations are drawn for 800,000 men, but that is no proof that there are so many.

The Report of the Federal Secretary of the Navy says that the naval force consists of 323 steamers and 104 sailing vessels, carrying in all 3268 guns, but we are not informed how many of the steamers and sailing vessels are worth commissioning. The most characteristic part of the Report is the following reference to the Alabama:—

The Alabama went forth from England to destroy American shipping, and how far and to what results this abuse may be carried with impunity to the Government which tolerates it is a matter of grave consideration. This lawless rover, though built in and sailing from England, has no acknowledged flag or recognized nationality. Before the Alabama left England the British authorities were informed by the recognized official agents of the Federal Government of her character and purposes. The British Government, thus invoked, came too late to prevent her sailing. To what extent under these circumstances the British Government is bound in honour and justice to make indemnification for the destruction of private property is a question which may present itself for disposal. It is alluded to now from a sense of duty towards American commercial interests, and from the fact that recent intelligence indicates that other vessels of similar character are fitting out in England.

For the information of the Federal Secretary we beg to state that the Alabama acknowledges the nationality of the Confederate States, and sails under the Confederate flag. Further, that the British Government can no more prevent the sale of steamers to Confederate citizens than it can prevent, or rather than it chooses to prevent, the Federal Government purchasing warlike stores from our manufacturers. It also seems rather absurd for a Government with 427 vessels of war at its disposal to be so alarmed at the power of the little Alabama.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury states that the estimate of the public debt in July 1863 must be advanced to $1,120,000,000. If the war continues with undiminished disbursements, the estimated debt in July 1864 will be $1,744,000,000. The average rate of interest on the whole loan is 4 and 3-5ths per cent. The estimated receipts from the customs for the current year are $68,000,000, and from internal revenue $85,000,000. There is a balance of $276,700,000 to be provided for. To make up the deficiency the Secretary recommends the imposition of a moderate tax on the corporate circulation, and that the banks should issue a circulation furnished by Government, and thus establish one sound, uniform circulation of equal value throughout the country. From this source he expects to obtain $50,000,000. He further proposes to raise $200,000,000 by loans, and $20,000,000 by enlarging the limit for temporary deposits. Such are Mr. Chase's figures; and we need hardly remark that the Federal indebtedness is much greater, and is far more rapidly increasing than the report admits. Mr. Chase professes to be tired of paper issues, and advises a return to gold and silver, but he does not show how this consummation is to be brought about.

The Federal Congress has adopted a resolution directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to report on the cheapest and most expeditious mode of placing vessels of war on Lake Ontario when the exigency may arise for establishing water communication with other waters of the lakes.

A resolution has been offered in the Federal Congress declaring that the Union must be preserved, and denouncing as guilty of high crime any executive or legislative department that shall propose or advise any acceptance of peace on any other basis than the integrity of the Union as it existed before the rebellion.

Another resolution has been offered to hold a Convention of delegates from all the States at Louisville in April next, to consider the state of the country and the proper means to be pursued for restoring the Union.

We are afraid the gentleman who edits the War news for the Federal Government must be excessively blasé, and, like Sir Charles Coldstream, can see nothing in anything. In the late telegram from New York we find the following item:—

Nothing important has occurred at Fredericksburgh. The Confederate cavalry have crossed the Rappahannock and captured two entire troops of Federal cavalry.

Now, it seems to us that whilst the invading army which was to have levelled Richmond to the ground before Christmas is waiting on the north side of the Rappahannock for boats, it is very important that the Confederate cavalry should be able to cross that stream, capture two entire companies of Federal cavalry, and to recross that formidable obstacle to the Federal advance with their prisoners, and without molestation. Either the Northern army must be comparatively weak and disorganized or it must be badly generalled, and neither horn of the dilemma can be very reassuring to the Northerners, who have begun to doubt whether Burnside is likely to be more successful than his predecessor. In order to balance this Confederate exploit, we are told that General Sigel's cavalry captured forty Confederate cavalry; but there is a want of detail which discredits the rumour.

General Burnside, who was at first so very active and determined, is now busy erecting fortifications commanding the Confederate positions, and after threatening, on the 21st of November, to shell Fredericksburg in sixteen hours, he has intimated to the authorities of that town that so long as no hostile demonstration is made from the place he will not attack it. This is particularly mild after such tremendous threats. All General Burnside had done up to the latest dates was to return the President's visit to Belle Plain; and having passed a short time at the White House, to wend his way back to his army. We are not finding fault with this inactivity. We have thought from the first that the rumoured advance via Fredericksburg would never take place, and we have also felt considerable doubt as to the expediency of forthwith transporting the Federal army to the peninsula. The inactivity may have been inevitable as well as prudent; but it is irresistibly ridiculous when we remember that General McClellan, who was advancing, was disgraced because he did not advance fast enough; and that General Burnside was appointed to succeed him in order that there might be no more delay. Yet on the 6th of December General Burnside was engaged in erecting fortifications before Fredericksburg.

Amongst the reports about military movements in Virginia is an exceedingly doubtful one to the effect that General "Stonewall" Jackson has joined General Lee. This is circulated to allay the fears of the North that Pennsylvania may become the field of Confederate operations. A report of which there is not the least reason to doubt the accuracy is one that refers to the Confederates capturing a train of Federal waggons, with ordinance stores, in Virginia.

In the West we have to record a Confederate victory, which will, we expect, turn out to be very important when the particulars transpire. We are told: "An engagement has occurred at Hartsville, Tennessee, between the Federal advance force from Nashville and the Confederates under General Morgan. Colonel Moore's Federal brigade was repulsed several times, and finally captured. General Morgan afterwards attacked the Federals at Gallatin, but was repulsed with heavy loss." The capture of a whole brigade, which consists, at least, of two regiments, is not only a decided but a very remarkable triumph. The Confederate victory and the unsuccessful attack on Gallatin are brought into suspicious proximity. Our readers have doubtless noticed that the North never allows a Confederate victory without some counterbalancing disaster, which is afterwards denied.

The following items of war news are taken from the latest telegrams:—

The Federal expedition which had sailed from Suffolk, Virginia, has recaptured the Federal battery taken some time since, and has driven the Confederates across the Blackwater River.

The Federal gunboat Ellis was blown up during the expedition up the New River, North Carolina, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Confederates.

A portion of General Banks's expedition has sailed. The Federal army of the South-West has commenced a general advance from Memphis and different parts of the Mississippi.

Federal General Grant continues to advance in Mississippi, and has occupied Abbeville, which had been abandoned by the Confederates.

The Southern journals state that a fleet of twenty Federal vessels sailed from Hilton on the 5th inst. for Georgetown or Wilmington. Several Federal vessels had passed Charleston harbour. It was supposed that they were going to assist in attacking Mobile.

The same journals assert that 30,000 Federals are at Suffolk, preparing to move against Petersburg; while a Federal force at Newbern, North Carolina, will operate simultaneously against Weldon.

The Federals occupy Granada, Mississippi.

Mobile is at present strongly fortified, and the Legislature of Alabama has placed $1,000,000 at the disposal of the Governor, and authorized him to impress one-tenth of the negroes in the State to erect defences. The negroes were to commence at once to obstruct the channels leading to Mobile Bay, and the rivers above that city—a work which could be easily and rapidly accomplished.

It is now admitted by the North that the cotton remaining in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas has been overrated, and that only a few thousand bales are in the counties bordering the river. We are also told, what was well known before, that "the new crop will be very small."

The following paragraphs, both coming from the North, should be read side by side:—

An Union meeting has been held at New Orleans. The correspondents of the New York journals describe the proceedings as enthusiastic.

The Federal Commissioner Johnson, who was sent to New Orleans to investigate the condition of affairs, reports that persons in General Butler's command are growing rich upon the necessities of the helpless people of New Orleans, by extortions offensive to decency, and that the inhabitants of the city have been as much sinned against as sinning since General Butler's rule.

What grateful people the inhabitants of New Orleans must be! We wonder if General Butler's near relative—the corn, coal, and general dealer—took the chair at the enthusiastic meeting?

General Butler, in a letter permitting the National Advocate to resume publication, says all persons expressing a desire for foreign intervention will be treated as traitors. Should such persons not be treated as idiots? Can anything be more delightful than to live under the rule of General Butler? We suppose, however, by this intimation, that even in New Orleans there are some persons who do not know when they are well off.

The Democratic party has carried the city elections of New York by large majorities.

General Fitz-John Porter was being tried at Washington for disobeying General Pope's orders. The trial created some interest. General Pope was examined at length.

In New York a considerable collection was being made to aid the Lancashire operatives, who would require no aid if the North was not trying to conquer the South. The New York Chamber of Commerce "deprecated conducting the movement in a way to obtain favour with one class in England, but urged that it should be based exclusively on the grounds of Christian charity. England was a great customer of America for grain, and it was a plain case that it was America's duty to feed a brother nation in distress." For the same Christian and humane reasons, "a proposal to aid the French operatives was voted down."

On December 2 gold was 30½ premium. On December 8 it was 32 premium.

It is reported that General McClellan is to succeed General Butler at New Orleans; and it is added that this is intended to soothe the Democrats. This does not quite accord with the rumour of McClellan being brought before a court martial after the trials of Generals Buell, Porter, and McDowell, are concluded. Certainly, General McClellan will not be promoted with the good will of General Halleck, the devoted and genial friend of General Pope.

The trial for the illegal imprisonment of Mrs. Brinsmade is over. Kennedy is reprimanded for abuse of authority, and yet he is praised for his zeal. This reminds us of the jury who, after long deliberation, found a verdict "for both plaintiff and defendant, and each party to pay his own costs."

Major Nash Morgan, a cousin of General John H. Morgan, died on the 27th of October, at Lexington, of his wounds.

ENGLAND.

The distress in Lancashire continues to increase, but more slowly. The increase of pauperism last week was only 3500; and some unions had a very considerable decrease, as will be seen by the following official table:—

(a). Fifteen unions have more:—

	Paupers.		Paupers
Ashton-under-Lyne	470	Rochdale	50
Blackburn	50	Saddleworth	140
Bolton	300	Salford	120
Chorley	170	Todmorden	120
Chorlton	1,060	Warrington	70
Glossop	110	Wigan	360
Macclesfield	190
Manchester	1,550		5,000
Preston	210

(b). One union is in respect of the amount of pauperism the same as in the previous week—Bury.

(c). Five unions have less paupers—Burnley, 259; Haslingden, 250; Liverpool, 130; Oldham, 710; Stockport, 250; total, 1570.

The Lord Mayor's Committee met as usual at the Mansion-house on Friday, and reported a total receipt of £283,000, and a distribution which had already disposed of £173,000. Grants were made to the amount of £22,400. A debate again took place on the propriety of handing over their funds to the Manchester Committee. Letters were read from two local Committees—one of them utterly insignificant, and the other discredited by its connection with local funds—containing imputations on the Executive at Manchester; particularly the very silly one that a body of which Lord Derby is the Chairman, and which is composed of men of all sects and parties—Tories, Whigs and Radicals, Unitarians, Dissenters, and Churchmen—is influenced by party and sectarian feelings. The Mansion-house Committee decided to retain its functions. We have already explained why it cannot perform those functions efficiently, and need not add that we consider its decision deplorable and censurable.

The Central Relief Committee held a general meeting on Monday in the Manchester Town-hall, and received the report of the Executive Committee for the month of November. That report states that the distress had increased rapidly. The district Committees sent in information as to the condition of 490,700 operatives, representing, say, 1,000,000 souls. There were in full work 78,500, on half-time 167,600, without work 244,600. The weekly loss of wages was £164,000, or above eight millions sterling per annum. That is to say, the American war costs the people of Lancashire in wages alone over one-tenth of what it costs the Confederate States; its whole cost to England probably exceeds £20,000,000 per annum, or more than one-fourth of the Confederate expenditure. It appeared that at the end of November about 450,000 persons were receiving relief from the parish, the Committees, or both. The average earnings of an operative's family in good time bring in about 6s. per head; the standard of relief thought requisite by the Executive Committee is one-third of this sum, besides clothing, fuel, &c. This would require an expenditure of £61,000 weekly. The Guardians of the Poor in the suffering districts are now spending £18,000 weekly in out-door relief; when this amount is raised to £20,000, the Committees ought to be able to spend £30,000 in addition to their outlay on clothing. The report anticipates an increased pressure on the Relief Funds, as other resources fail. The rate of relief given does not provide for rent; and there are 100,000 cottages occupied by operatives, of whom very few can pay any rent at all. A large proportion of these houses is the property of small tradesmen, who, besides the ruinous reduction of their income from retail business, will probably encounter a large annual loss in cottage-rents. The small manufacturers who have risen from the ranks of the working-men, and who either rent loom-sheds or mills, or have built and furnished them in part with borrowed money, have to pay rent, or the interest of mortgages and loans, as well as rates and taxes, and many of them will encounter a certain ruin should the want of a supply of cotton continue. This ruin will extend to other classes connected with them—such as working mechanics and other small master tradesmen.

The report avoids the expression of any opinions as to the probable duration of the distress. The funds available to meet it (exclusive, of course, of those in the hands of the Mansion-house Committee—about £110,000) are calculated as follows:—

In hand, December 13	£233,000
Promised, not paid	180,000
In hands of Local Committees	90,000
Total	£503,000

Complaints have been made that operatives receiving relief have refused work. These complaints do not appear to be well-founded; but the Committee recommend that employment should be found for the recipients of relief. They recommend, also, that assistance should not be refused to workmen who own small properties—cottages or co-operative shares, which are at present almost unsaleable. They acknowledge the receipt of large quantities of clothing, blankets, and so forth, from all parts of England.

Alderman Goadsby said he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that many very respectable shopkeepers would, if pressed by the overseers to pay the increased poor-rate, become pauperized. One person among a number whose names he possessed, told him (Alderman Goadsby) that he had been a factory operative; that he then saved a sufficient sum of money to open a shop; that he now rented a shop at £66 per annum; that he had a wife and two children to maintain respectably; that his profits per week, through bad trade, were now 12s. a week only, and that his poor-rate took 5s. of that sum. He (Alderman Goadsby) would suggest that that Committee should ask the overseers to be as lenient with this class of men as possible.

Mr. Farnall read his weekly report:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report for the week ended the 6th instant, on 27 unions in the cotton manufacturing districts, will show you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of 3014 persons.

This increase of 3014 is explained as follows:—There is an increase at Ashton-under-Lyne, 466; Barton-on-Irwell, 123; Blackburn, 48; Bolton, 172; Chorley, 168; Chorlton, 1063; Glossop, 112; Lancaster, 9; Leigh, 49; Macclesfield, 191; Manchester, 1580; Preston, 189; Prestwich, 190; Rochdale, 52; Salford, 120; Warrington, 68; Wigan, 365; total 4966. There is a decrease at Burnley, 288; Bury, 43; Clitheroe, 31; Garstang, 26; Oldham, 1124; Saddleworth, 140; Stockport, 234; Todmorden, 66; total, 1952; making a net increase of 3014.

I have received no returns from the clerks of the unions of the Fylde and Haslingden for the week ended the 5th instant, and I have therefore inserted in my tabular report their figures for the week ending the 29th ultimo, and I am unable to state whether there has been an increase, or a decrease in either of these places. The figures entered for Bolton represent an increase of pauperism as compared with the week ended the 22nd ultimo, and those for Oldham are also compared with the same week.

There were on the 6th instant 271,983 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 57,535 were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 214,448 persons in receipt of parochial relief, or 372.7 per cent.

The total weekly cost of out-door relief on the 6th instant was £18,728 8s. 10d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2852 13s. 3d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £15,875 15s. 7d., or 565.5 per cent.

The average per-centage of pauperism on the population of these unions on the 6th instant, was 13.7; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.9.

The average amount of out-door relief per head per week, both in money and in kind, in these unions on the 6th instant was 1s. 5½d.; the lowest was 1s. 1d.; and the highest 1s. 10½d., at Glossop.

Of the 271,983 persons receiving parochial relief on the 6th instant 12,527 were in-door paupers.

The amount of money in the hands of the treasurers of the above unions on the 6th instant was £55,453 19s. 5d.; in the previous week the amount was £45,628 8s. 7d.

Severe comments were made on the inadequacy of Mr. Villiers' measure passed at the close of last session. Lord Derby explained that the whole responsibility of that measure rested with the Commons; the Upper House having felt itself, under the circumstances, bound to abstain from amendment.

The following is Mr. Farnall's account of the condition of Blackburn:—

The union of Blackburn contains 24 townships, within an area of 43,569 acres; its population numbers 119,937; and its net rateable value was £238,699 in 1856. The present weekly expenditure of this union in outdoor relief was, on the 29th ult., £1347, and the cost of in-maintenance for that week, at the rate of 3s. per head per week was £74, making a total weekly expenditure in relief alone of £1421, which is at the rate of £73,892 per annum. The expenditure of this union out of the poor-rates for all other purposes than relief, for the year ended Lady-day, 1862, was £15,168; this sum, therefore, added to £73,892 spent in relief alone, makes a total annual expenditure of £89,060. The net rateable value of the property of this union was in 1856, as I have already stated, £238,699; the total present expenditure, therefore, is now at the rate of 7s. 5½d. in the pound on that value. But it is necessary to make a deduction of 25 per cent. from the net rateable value of £238,699 for irrecoverable rates, empty property, &c.; and therefore, the net rateable value is reduced to £179,024, so that the present expenditure is at the rate of 9s. 11½d. in the pound on that value. I may mention that there were on the 29th ult. 24,019 persons receiving parochial relief in this union, and that in the corresponding week of last year 1519 persons were so relieved; and further, that the weekly cost of out-relief was, on the 29th ult., £1347, while in the corresponding week of last year it was £191. The present percentage of pauperism on the population of this union is 20; in the corresponding week of last year it was 3.8 per cent. Before I pass on to the position of the township of Blackburn, it will be convenient to remark that the provisions of Mr. Villiers' Act—namely, the Union Relief Act—came into operation in this union at Michaelmas last. So that the union, under the provisions of section 3 of that Act, was enabled to borrow the sum of £3517 0s. 1½d., being the amount which the guardians of the 24 townships of the union had spent during that quarter "in and about relief" in excess of 9d. in the pound on the net rateable value of the whole union. At Christmas next the valuable provisions of this Act adverted to will again afford the ratepayers immediate relief in this matter. The total expenditure of this union for the year ended Lady-day, 1862, was £28,992 17s.; so that a rate of 2s. 5½d. in the pound on its net rateable value covered its total expenditure. I will now direct your attention to the present position of the township of Blackburn. This township contains a population of 63,125 persons, and its present net rateable value is £144,589. This township is now spending weekly in relief alone £79 2s. 4d., being an expenditure in relief alone at the rate of £40,514 per annum. The expenditure of this town out of the poor-rates for all other purposes than relief for the year ended Lady-day 1862, was £8,541. This sum therefore, added to £40,514 spent in relief alone, makes a total annual expenditure of £48,965. The present net rateable value of this township is, as I have before stated, £144,589; the total present expenditure, therefore, is now at the rate of 6s. 9½d. in the pound on that value. But although the Small Tenements Act is in operation here, I find it necessary to make a deduction of 22 per cent. from the net rateable value (£144,589) for irrecoverable rates, empty property, &c., and therefore the net rateable value is reduced to £112,777, so that the present expenditure is at the rate of 8s. 8½d. in the pound on that value. I may add that there are now 12,956 persons receiving parochial relief who are chargeable to this township, and that its percentage of pauperism on its population is 20.5. In the corresponding week of last year there were 2420 persons thus chargeable to the township, or 3.8 per cent. on its population. On the 14th of February last a rate of 3s. in the pound was allowed, and on the 25th of September, 1862, another rate of 3s. was allowed, and in the beginning of January next the overseers propose making another rate of 5s. in the pound. The first of the rates named has been collected; it should have produced, with the arrears of the previous rate, £19,010

11s. 5d., and this sum was collected with the exception of £714 17s. 5d., or rather less than 4 per cent. of loss on the whole amount. The second of these rates (now being collected) ought to produce £16,675 6s.; but Mr. Clough, the assistant-overseer, is of opinion that £4000, or 22 per cent., will be lost on this rate, so that the amount to be received will be £14,675 6s. The 5s. rate which will be made in January next should, after a deduction of 22 per cent., produce a sum of £24,277, which amount, it is believed, will meet the expenditure of the township to Lady-day next.

A Cattle Show at Horsham has afforded to Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, late Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, an opportunity of speaking his mind on the political questions of the day. He alluded to the marriage of the Prince of Wales with a Danish Princess, expressed strong sympathy with Denmark, and censured in strong terms the despatches of Lord Russell; despatches which, he said, no Englishman could read without regret. They put this country in a false position; made her appear as the ungenerous supporter of the strong against the weak, and as having forsaken and reversed her traditional policy. He expressed respect for the suffering operatives of Lancashire, and for the employers who, while losing heavily themselves, were doing their best to relieve the sufferings of their hands. He thought that England ought to remain strictly neutral in the American quarrel. At the same time he was not prepared to say that it would not be possible for this country to interfere, by giving expression to the deep feeling which existed in the country, and on the other side of the water, and to the desire which prevailed for a cessation of hostilities. He had received letters from persons occupying high positions in the Federal States of America, and he thought a strong expression of feeling, not on the part of the three Powers only, but by the whole of Europe, could not but have great weight on public opinion in America, and give heart and courage to those persons in America who were anxiously looking forward for the return of peace. A distinguished man in America had written to him, and, in reference to the affair of the Trent, said he could not conceal for one moment that the spirit shown by England upon that matter had a very considerable effect upon public opinion there; but that they were the more willing to give satisfaction in consequence of knowing that Europe was unanimous in its expression of feeling upon that question, and the expression of Europe was one which no country could afford to disregard, and least of all his country of America. Therefore he was not without hope, and he did not despair that the time would very shortly arrive when a general expression of opinion on the part of the Powers of Europe might be productive of that which they all desired to see, viz., a cessation of that miserable and cruel struggle. Turning to Italian affairs, he said that the Conservative party were not and never had been hostile to the Italian cause. On the contrary, their desire was to see Italy evacuated by both France and Austria; and it was not their fault that this had not been done.

Mr. Cobden has delivered a great speech on the state of Lancashire, to his neighbours of Midhurst, in Sussex. He explained that the vast majority of the cotton manufacturers were not men of great wealth; and that two-thirds of the capital invested in the manufacture was locked up in buildings and machinery which are making no profits, and yet paying heavy rates. He referred to what we feel to be a peril far greater and more real than is as yet understood—the destruction, by the protraction of the cotton famine, of the capital which sustains the trade of Lancashire. “So far,” he said, “from the working-classes wishing to see their employers’ capital exhausted, one of the fears constantly haunting their minds is, that the capitalist who owns the mill may never again be able to open it.”

When I was in Lancashire—at Ashton—one of the places where they have had the greatest amount of suffering—three or four working men, most intelligent leaders of their body, went round with a requisition to memorialize the Government for a national grant in relief of the distress of that district. They called upon a friend of mine, a leading man in Ashton—Mr. Hugh Mason—himself a member of the Executive Committee over which Lord Derby presides. They called upon him to induce him to sign this memorial, and he said, “What is your motive for wishing to have it signed? Are you afraid that enough will not be done by voluntary subscriptions to keep you and your families during the winter?” “Oh, no,” said the spokesman of the party, “we are not all afraid that the money will not be found, but we don’t like to see the money found out of the capital of this district, because we are afraid that some of the weaker capitalists will fall altogether, and if they break what is to become of us?” (Hear, hear.) These men had intelligence enough to foresee what would be the consequence, provided the manufacturing capitalists fell into ruin, and I tell you candidly that that is the greatest and most unmanageable danger that is now before us. I can see that the working classes of that district could be maintained, partly by the munificent charity which has been manifested all through the country, or by a vote of the House of Commons when we meet, but I don’t see that it is so easy to deal with the danger which threatens the capitalist class. I speak now not of the rich millionaires, they are the Field Marshals, the Generals and the Colonels of that great army of industry; but I speak of the rank and file of the capitalists, who are rich in fixed capital, but have little floating capital. If this state of things goes on, the consequence would be that a widespread ruin would engulf the capitalist class as well as the labourers, and then, indeed, you would have a wilderness and a wreck in that district. (Hear, hear.) I have sometimes thought myself that the wisest plan would be, instead of clamouring for these capitalists to contribute their reserve floating capital for the support of the working classes—I have sometimes thought that it would be a wise plan, if it were practicable, to exempt that unproductive property now in Lancashire, in the shape of silent mills and manufactories, from poor-rates, and the liability to support these people. You must bear in mind the peculiarity of that property. There are investments in Lancashire amounting to 30, 40, or 50 millions sterling, in fixed capital, and it is all liable to pay poor-rates, whether idle or employed. (Hear, hear.) All the mills in Lancashire now standing idle and silent are rated to the poor, and pay precisely the same in poor-rates as if they were engaged productively. I came from Scotland not long ago, through Carlisle, Preston, Chorley, and Bolton, to Manchester, and I passed through a continued forest of smokeless chimneys. Not one of those vast mills was producing one farthing, not one of the cottages was paying rent, and yet all the buildings and cottages were still paying poor-rates. I say, then, that I think it would be a wise thing if this property could be exempted so as to save the most precious possession we have in Lancashire to the men who are at the head of these establishments, whose ingenuity and skill are necessary for conducting them. It is their capital alone which can give the employment so long afforded. Let the capital be destroyed, and the mills must be dismembered, and the machinery sold as old iron in order to pay the rates; or another process may go on—the mills may be dismembered because they shall no longer be liable to pay the poor-rates, inasmuch as it is only while they have machinery in them that they are liable to pay it. (Hear, hear.) I speak this only in reference to the future. It may be said that we shall not see things go so bad as that. Sanguine men have told us that next year there will be cotton enough from other sources than America to supply the mills and machinery of Lancashire with half-work—that is, that three days’ work a week may be had out of Indian and other cotton. But my experience of that business does not lead me to expect that it would be of much service to the capitalist classes to have only half the cotton they have machinery to spin. They would simply become the sport of the people who hold that cotton. (Hear, hear.) Their exigencies would always render it impossible that they could work it to a profit, and I see scarcely any difference in having no cotton at all and having three days’ supply a week of Surat cotton, which is so difficult to work and so unproductive.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The address of the Emperor to the Russian Ambassador when the latter presented his credentials is thought to be significant. His Majesty said: “I congratulate myself upon the friendly relations existing for six years between the Czar and my Government, and which have the more chance of continuing as they are due to the mutual sympathies and real interests of the two empires. I have been enabled to appreciate the straightforwardness of heart of your Sovereign, and have conceived for him a sincere friendship.”

The Emperor has been on a visit to Baron Rothschild, which is supposed by the quidnuncs to have some reference to political or financial projects for the future. A pamphlet directed against the unity of Italy, and advocating, somewhat late in the day, the execution of the Treaty of Zurich, is to be published by M. Dentu, from whose shop the brochures attributed to the Imperial pen have issued. But as yet there is no reason for giving credit to the reports which attribute “inspiration” to the forthcoming production.

Prince Lucien Murat has published a manifesto reminding the Neapolitans of his existence, and re-asserting his pretensions and professing an ultra-liberal creed.

ITALY.—The following short biography of the new Italian Ministry is given by the Temps:—

M. Farini, the President of the Council, is a Roman; he was an eminent physician and a leader of the Liberal party when he was appointed Director-General of the Hospitals and Prisons of Rome under the Ministry of Count Rossi. In 1848, when the Republic was proclaimed in Rome, he emigrated to Tuscany; thence he removed to Piedmont. M. Farini was for some time Minister of Public Instruction in 1850, and subsequently he was Minister of the Interior in the Cavour Cabinet. He was Dictator of Emilia and Lieutenant-General of the King at Naples after Garibaldi’s departure. M. Farini was the principal negotiator of the cession of Nice and Savoy to France. He was born on the 22nd of October, 1822. M. Peruzzi, the new Minister of the Interior, is a Tuscan. He was a leader of the Liberal party in 1848, and in 1859 was at the head of the movement which transferred Tuscany to Piedmont. He was Minister of Public Works in Ricasoli’s Cabinet. He is a man of energy and undoubted liberalism. It has been said by mistake that he is an enemy of the French alliance. M. Minghetti was, in 1848, Minister of Commerce to Pius IX.; he has twice been Victor Emmanuel’s Minister of the Interior—once under Cavour and once under Ricasoli. He is a distinguished political economist; as Finance Minister he will now have an opportunity of showing his talent. M. Pasolini, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, is also a Roman. He was for a long time Mayor of Ravenna. In 1847 he was a colleague of Rossi, under whom he filled the office of Minister of Public Works. A refugee in 1849, he went into Piedmont. In 1859 he was appointed Governor of Milan, which post he held till M. Rattazzi came into power, when he resigned. Shortly afterwards, at the personal request of the King, he accepted the appointment of Governor of Turin. M. Manna, the Minister of Commerce, is a Neapolitan. He was a Director-General of Customs under the Bourbons, and in 1860 was sent by Francis II. to Turin, to negotiate an alliance with Piedmont. M. Meubrea, Minister of Public Works, is a General of Piedmontese Engineers. He was Secretary-General to Azeglio in 1850, and Minister of Marine in the Ricasoli Cabinet. M. Amari, Minister of Public Instruction, is a Sicilian; one of the most eminent savants in Italy, and an Orientalist of European reputation. He long resided in Paris as a refugee, and is a corresponding member of the Institute.

M. Della Rovere, Minister at War, held that portfolio under Ricasoli; he has been Lieutenant-General of the King in Sicily. M. Ricci, Minister of Marine, is a Genoese, and has the reputation of being a capable naval officer.

The Farini Cabinet seems likely to command the confidence of the Chambers and of the country.

GREECE.—The candidature of Prince Alfred is definitely disposed of. The British Government has intimated to the Provisional Government of Greece, that the Prince cannot accept the throne which the appeal to universal suffrage has already practically given him, and has recommended the Greeks to elect another Prince of the House of Coburg—Ferdinand, the King Consort of Portugal, the father of the present King, and a prince whom age and experience undoubtedly qualify better for so difficult a position. The Prince, however, seems indisposed to exchange his dignified and easy retirement for a troubled kingship at Athens; and it is doubtful, moreover, whether, even if he would consent to accept the throne, the Greeks would give it him. A very tempting bait will, however, be held out to him if the English Government, as has been announced, offers the Ionian Islands as the dowry of Prince Ferdinand. Mr. Elliott, who has been sent on a special mission to Athens, has, it is affirmed, been instructed to make this proposition at Athens, and Earl Russell has also, we are informed upon good authority, announced the intention of England to the great Powers, and summoned a Congress to confirm the cession, and regulate its details.

DENMARK.—A despatch from Copenhagen announces that the King of Denmark is rather seriously ill. This Sovereign is only 54 years of age, and his death would be a serious loss for the country, which he governs in a liberal spirit. He has no children, and his heir presumptive is the future father-in-law of the Prince of Wales—Prince Christian, of the House of Sleswig-Holstein-Glücksburg. The rights of that Prince were established by the law of succession of the 31st of July, 1853, and guaranteed by a protocol signed at London by the principal Powers.

We take the following from the Morning Herald of Monday last:—

If we may believe the organs of the Danish Government, Earl Russell has found his match. He has been dressed with a little of his own sance, and a very piquant dish the public will deem him. The Swedish Foreign Minister having read—we suppose in the newspapers—his lordship’s famous Sleswig-Holstein despatch, wrote to his Ambassador at London, “that as Earl Russell’s despatch upon the question of Sleswig can only be destined for the enemies of Denmark, or for those who are not acquainted with the real position of that question, the Swedish Government thanks Earl Russell for not having forwarded to Sweden a copy of the despatch, as she does not belong to either category.”

We are afraid that this story is too good to be true.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 17.

The past week has been one of unusual interest, and greater excitement has prevailed than at any period since the month of August. Our last report left the market very strong, on the basis of 16d. for Fair Dhollerahs, and 24d. for Middling Orleans.

On Thursday and Friday the tone was more subdued with sales of 8000 and 10,000 bales, but great firmness was manifested, the trade buying freely.

On Saturday, in anticipation of a warlike message from the President, a fresh current of speculation was started, and with sales of 10,000 bales; prices closed at ½d. higher.

On Monday the excitement continued, and grew in intensity as the day advanced; in the afternoon the Persia’s news was to hand, reporting the determination of Lincoln to carry on the war till the Union was restored, which further added to the excitement, and the business reached 20,000 to 25,000 bales, at ½d. to ¾d. advance.

On Tuesday the market was again very excited, with sales of 20,000 bales at ½ advance.

To-day the tone is less buoyant, but a fair business has been done at yesterday’s prices, the sales reaching 10,000 bales. We quote Middling Orleans, 24½d.; Fair Sawginned Dharwar, 19½d.; Broach, 17½d.; Omrawuttee, 17½d.; Dhollerah, 17d.

The cause of the recent activity is mainly the improved state of trade in Manchester, together with a growing conviction—now almost approaching a certainty—that the American war is going to continue for six or nine months longer. Spinners so far have fully supported our market, and from the freedom of their purchases have imparted a healthiness to our position as we advanced that was wanting during the brief period of excitement preceding this last great rise. Though Manchester has barely advanced in the same ratio, still a considerable rise has taken place and the demand from the Home trade and the Continent continues on an increasing scale and better news is expected before long from India, which may once more revive the export demand for that quarter. Great confidence is entertained here regarding the future of cotton, and a much higher range of prices confidently looked for early in the spring. It seems probable, however, that the top has been reached for the present; the late large advance will tempt some spinners to resell whilst some 70,000 bales at sea are now past due; the approaching close of the year will moreover tend to limit business. American cotton is still comparatively neglected and does not move in the same ratio as Surats, the former is still almost 6d. per lb. under the extreme point reached on the 2nd of September, whilst the latter are generally within 2d. to 3d. of the extreme point touched at that time.

The American news this week, per Persia, City of Washington and Jura, to the 8th inst., is of more than usual interest. The Message of the President to Congress is moderate in tone, and displays a willingness to yield in some degree to the Democratic party, whilst at the same time it advocates a vigorous prosecution of the war, and holds out no prospect of peace, except on the basis of a restoration of the Union.

The winter campaign has now commenced, and great expectations are entertained from the naval armaments that have recently been despatched.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, December 16.

Although we have to report an increased demand at better rates, both for yarn and cloth, during the past week, yet we fall far short of the advance in price obtained in Liverpool during the same period.

The principal part of the business transacted here has been on the part of the manufacturers, who have placed orders for yarns in anticipation that when the President's Message did arrive we should have some excitement in the cloth market, which will no doubt take place (now that it has come to hand) when the tenor of it has been seriously discussed.

The German buyers are in a better position, as far as orders are concerned, than they have been for some time past, yet they display great caution in placing their contracts for fear of exciting the spinners too much in raising their pretensions, consequently yarns suitable for Continental export have realised a smaller advance in prices than has been obtained for twist and pincofs.

The demand for cloth has been confined principally to T. cloths, long cloths and domestics for the Levantine market, also printers and shirtings for the home trade.

To-day our market opened rather excitedly, spinners asking 2d. per lb. advance on Friday's quotations, which very naturally checked business, but in the latter part of the day, when the Liverpool market was found to be very active at an advance of ½d. on the prices of the day previous, rather more business was effected, and the advance obtained here was equal to 1½d. per lb. on the rates of Tuesday last for all numbers.

Cloth may be quoted at about 6d. per piece more than was obtained this day week.

CLIPPINGS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS.

ANOTHER CRUISER.—The Richmond correspondent of the Columbus Sun says he is at liberty to state that a letter of marque and reprisal has been issued to certain officers of another splendid vessel, which will, in due time, sail from a Confederate port.—Charleston Courier.

The Grand Jury of Hancock county, Georgia, in their last presentment, remark:—

We recommend a Convention of the Governors of the Confederate States, to agree on some plan to be submitted to their respective Legislatures, to curtail the production of cotton during the continuance of the war, and to increase the production of such articles as will add to the comfort and convenience of our armies in the field.—Savannah Republican.

THE ROLL OF HONOR.—By joint resolution of the Legislature of Alabama, the Governor is authorized to prepare a book in which shall be placed the name, regiment, and residence of every soldier from that State who has died in the service of his country during the present year.—The Mobile Register.

A STEAM RAM.—Mr. W. R. Scott has exhibited to us a plan of a steam ram offering essential advantages over any plan previously proposed, and strongly approved by naval officers who have examined it.—The Charleston Courier.

PRICES OF STOCKS AND BONDS IN CHARLESTON.—At the latest dates the prices were:—Bank of Charleston Stock, 28 shares, $118, $118½, and $118¾; Planters' and Mechanics' Bank Stock, 43 shares, $31½; South Carolina Railroad and Bank Shares, 11 shares, $128½, dividend off; South Carolina Railroad Company, half Shares, 11½ shares, $54½, dividend off; Union Bank Shares, 57 shares, $65 to $65½; State Bank Stock, 50 shares, 26½; Farmer's and Exchange Bank Stock, 160 shares, $25½; People's Bank Stock, 6 shares, $28½, dividend off; $4600 City 6 per cent., $101; 4 Memphis and Charleston Railroad Bonds, $1000 each, $116; 8 North-eastern Railroad Bonds, $500 each, $109½.

The Charleston Courier of the 11th ultimo, gives the following account of the success which has attended the efforts of the Confederates in developing their own resources for the supply of military stores.

At our latest reports the supply of nitre from the operations of the bureau established by Government was 56,000 pounds a month, with good prospects for steady increase. In several places nitre beds have been established with reference to permanent operations.

At the Augusta works thirty-five beds have been commenced, under the faithful and efficient superintendence of Mr. JOHN LUCAS, of this city, who, for assiduity, fidelity and patient perseverance, is a model superintendent.

The Ashley Works have just been started, under charge of J. P. CLEMENTS.

The Charleston Works will soon be in operation, under Dr.

JOHN A. JOHNSON, a brother of the lamented Lieut. Col. B. J. JOHNSON.

The Cooper River Works will be immediately established under Dr. RAVENEL, and will receive, by consent of the Mayor, all the otal from the city, which will furnish a valuable supply of nitre, while it will induce a more thorough system of scavenging.

The nitre beds in Columbia, S.C., established under orders of the Executive Council, are efficiently managed by Dr. W. Hutton Ford, who is rendering good service. These works remain under the State control.

The others we have mentioned, and all others in the State, are under Confederate authority, and are directed by Professor Francis S. Holmes.

A pamphlet, giving full practical directions for making nitre, will be furnished on application to Prof. Holmes or Dr. John A. Johnson, Charleston. Our farmers and planters, generally, should foster and aid the permanent establishment of nitre beds.

The powder mills at Augusta, Ga., under charge of Lieut. Colonel Rains, are making three tons a day, and they may be extended to five tons—equal or superior to any mills on the continent.

The return of lead from South Carolina has exceeded any other department.

In this connection we glean a significant item from the Houston (Texas) Telegraph.

POWDER IN TEXAS.—The powder manufactory of San Antonio is making powder enough to supply at least half the Confederate army, and that it is equal to Dupont's best. Cartridges are also made there to supply the army in Arkansas.

THE DEFENCE OF MOBILE.—The Mobile Register utters a stirring appeal to the citizens in contemplation of an attack. We present the closing remarks.

As for the people of Mobile, their duty is plain; from the grey-haired man to the boy with the down just shading his lip, all should be in arms.—Go home and ask your women what you should do. You will come forth clad in armour to join the throng of your fellow-citizens, and to become soldiers until the invader is driven from your doors. By these means the army of Mobile can be increased by several thousand good firelocks and strong arms. Think how sweet will be your reward should you thus contribute to save your beloved city from the hoof of the tyrant invader! Think how the iron of humiliation will be driven into your souls if, for the lack of your heroic aid, Mobile and the two States which she guards should pass under the yoke of Benjamin F. Butler! By your honour, by your liberty, by the value you set upon your property, and by the love you bear your country, "to arms!" Lay aside your business, give over money making, cease speculating in the commodities of life, forego the hope of selling your tobacco, for hostile gold, and give all your thoughts, your energies, and your strength to the defence of your country.

Do your duty, and Mobile is impregnable. It will be a New Orleans or a Vicksburg, just as you will to have it.

A SOUTHERN VIEW OF THE DEMOCRATIC ELECTION IN THE NORTH.

(From the Charleston Courier, Nov. 11.)

The triumph of the Democratic party in the elections recently held in several of the States of Lincolnism, whether it furnishes ground for the hope of a speedy termination to this terrific struggle or not, is a fact that must arrest attention. It is certainly manifest and unquestionable that such a result could not have been obtained a twelvemonth since. No one supposes for a moment that had the contest for supremacy between these political organizations taken place last fall, the party now exulting in its success would have defeated the bloody minded fanatics. At that time opposition to the unconstitutional measures adopted by the Government dared not speak above a whisper, and its utterances were feeble and guarded. The adroit leaders of that party knew better than to attempt openly an organized opposition. Thoroughly acquainted with the temper of the public mind, they were aware that the true policy for them to pursue was to remain quiet, and to seem to sanction all that had been done and undone, in the meantime operating in secret, and by various crafty means making success certain, when the opportunity presented itself. And the boldness they exhibited in conducting the canvass, is as worthy of admiration as the patience they exercised in biding their time.

The fact we are now considering would never have occurred had their Government been successful in accomplishing its most desirable and important purposes. Had Lincoln's armies been everywhere victorious, his open disregard of constitutional obligations solemnly assumed, his enormous expenditure of money and reckless issue of bills, and his acts of tyranny and cruelty would have called no protestation and no censure. The vulgar and ignorant despot might have trodden under foot their most cherished rights with perfect impunity, had he not been unsuccessful in the execution of his important devices. It was the failure of his grand army to take Richmond, and the miserable defeats sustained by that numerous and splendid host at Manassas, together with other ruinous reverses on the field of carnage, that emboldened the Democratic party to rise and make a stand against the Radicals. So that whether we are to reap benefit from that result or not, without the potent aid given by our brave soldiers, that triumph would not have been achieved.

But in considering the success of the opposition party in the Abolition States, we may with safety conclude that a change has taken place in the feelings and sentiments of a large mass of the people concerning this purposeless and injurious contest. The extent of that change and its precise nature, we have no means of ascertaining. The Democrats do clearly and earnestly condemn the manner in which the war has been carried on, and vehemently denounce the Government for its tyrannical usurpation of power. It may be that they mean more than they say, and that the leaders of that party entertain purposes that prudence made it necessary for them to hide from the public gaze. We are aware that despite the number and the wealth of which their ranks can boast, the organization they confront has the bayonets and wields the sword of power, and had they dared come out in favour of peace on any terms, the Government would have looked after the ballot-boxes. Left to conjecture as to that ulterior purpose, we can form no opinion touching the change in the views and feelings of the successful party on that absorbing and all-important subject—the duration of the war.

Of this, however, we are certain, that there are now two parties in existence in the States with which we are at war. The party that has heretofore held unlimited sway and executed its infamous measures in either contempt of law, decency, and humanity, will hereafter be watched with a jealous eye, and no small measure of the rancorous hatred they in common entertain for us, will be poured out upon one another, and the fierce strength with which the war has been prosecuted will, to a large degree, be diminished by internal discord and divisions. If the feeling grow hotter, and the dissensions more furious, till from quarrelling they proceed to blows, and like mad beasts devour one another, so much the better for us. Like Kilkenny cats, let them kill and eat one another, until the whole Yankee race is exterminated, and all the bells in christendom would ring out merry peals over the happy catastrophe.

But let us build no expectations on the result of these elections. Let us rather continue to regard every man, woman, and child in Yankeeedom as a bitter and relentless foe, and place confidence only in God and our own right arms. If peace delay its coming, we shall be the more joyously welcomed when it does come, and we shall be the better able to appreciate and enjoy its blessings and delights.

THE UNAIDED STRUGGLE.

(From the Charleston Courier.)

The continuance of this contest involves increased suffering. The evils that follow in the train of this calamitous visitation grow more direful with every day. Other hearts than those now aching with anxiety and bleeding from bereavement are rent with grief, and the friend who sympathized with some afflicted one yesterday, to-day weeps bitter tears over his own sorrow. The iron is driven the deeper, and our burdens become more and more heavy. And though more than eighteen months have passed away since the strife was begun, the end seems more distant than it appeared to be a twelvemonth since. Hope after hope has gone out in darkness, and expectations we had fondly cherished, have turned out to be miserable delusions. So often have we been disappointed and deceived, that now our faith rejects every promise and turns away from every sign. Our foe is as active and determined and powerful as ever he was, and the agent that was to compel foreign nations to intervene and put an end to this wicked and infamous contest, has not been potent enough to accomplish that end.

We stand alone. Vast hosts are mustering to repeat in stronger force and with more obstinate courage the attempts that have been made, and strongholds hitherto unattacked will soon have to bear the most furious onslaughts the enemy with his wonderful resources of ingenuity and material is capable of making. To frustrate his well-conceived plans to repel these terrible attacks, we have to depend entirely upon ourselves. The foe will do his utmost: military genius and knowledge, the boundless credit of the Government, the best mechanical skill—mind, money, muscle—have all combined to ensure success.

And while these tremendous efforts are being put forth—while our homes are darkened by the shadow of the death-angel's wing and our bosoms wrung with anguish—while we are enduring grievous privations and hardships, and our soldiers are almost naked, we stand alone.

It is true foreign tongues mention our name with respect and admiration. It is true our fortitude and gallantry have received abundant reward in glowing words of praise and in warm heartfelt wishes for success. But sympathy and admiration have afforded no substantial assistance, and all unaided we brace our nerves for the dreadful conflict.

Most happy are we in having got rid of delusive hopes. We became worthy of our just and glorious cause, worthy of the high character we had always borne, and fit instruments of the great work we are doing, only when we resolved by the help of Heaven to achieve our independence with our own right arms. Since we took this honourable position we have acquitted ourselves like men, and so successfully vindicated our right to a separate nationality by splendid fighting and heroic endurance, that though not formally recognized as a member of the family of nations, we are virtually regarded a distinct and independent people.

We have fought our way to the point we now occupy, and we glory in that fact. The nations from whom we expected help have become acquainted with our qualities as a people through the narrations of the battles we have won, and to none of those great Powers are we indebted for a single victory. To God alone we acknowledge obligation, and we are made the more glad and confident by the assurance that we have been guided by His wisdom, and protected by His power.

If it had been left to us to choose, we would gladly have accepted intervention, and hailed it as a most manifest token of the Divine favour. But the God whom we serve saw proper to disappoint that hope, and, though our path is beset with formidable difficulties, and dangers darken over our future, the many and important benefits the war has conferred, force us to acknowledge that the way we have come is the better way.

We occupy a place to-day in the esteem and respect of European powers that should gratify the most inordinate national pride. And while the name of our infant Confederacy is the synonym of all that is pure, lovely, and of good report among men, the flag of the United States is the symbol of boastfulness and cruelty, and an object of universal contempt and abhorrence.

Had we been helped, we might have fought as valiantly, but the victories we gained would not have shed so brilliant a lustre on our arms, for another would have divided with us the honour and renown. And if our hope of foreign intervention had not been disappointed, it is certain our suffering would not have been nearly so great, and it is the trials we have been called upon to bear that have developed those traits and qualities which have made us invincible in the field, and prepared us to accomplish the high destiny for which we have been ordained by Providence.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, December 2.

When the heads of the Federal Government and of the two Houses of Congress possess such baptismal names as Abraham, Salmon, Gideon, Caleb, Hannibal, Galusha, and Thaddeus, it is no wonder that matters have gone astray, and the fact that all these people, excepting the President, were born in New England, accounts for the mass of falsehoods contained in the documents just presented to the country. William, Edwin, and Edward are names that boast of a parentage in New York, Pennsylvania, and Missouri, but as their owners have risen from the scum of those States, and have not even had the advantage of the honest training of one generation of gentility, they are equally as bad as the Yankees.

Mr. Stanton informs us that he has 800,000 men under arms, and 200,000 more ready for equipment; he has simply multiplied the real number by the figure 3. Mr. Chase, on the other hand, states that the total disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30 were $570,841,700; he, however, says that some reimbursements, to the amount of $96,096,922, may properly be deducted therefrom, which would leave the expenditures $474,744,788; he has only thus furnished an account of one-third of the indebtedness of the Washington Government. Yet by the ingenious wording of his language, the casual reader would be deceived, as he leaves out the $500,000,000 of unsettled claims that were due at that date, as well as the $90,000,000 of bonds and scrip issued before the beginning of the last "fiscal year." The truth is that the Lincoln Administration has plunged the adhering States into an expense of $200,000,000, which will never be paid. Mr. Chase is not content with the use of mendacity for the past, but practices deception for the future. Upon the basis of his figures for June 30, 1862 he estimates the total debt for the same period in 1863 at just double the sum, or $1122,297,403, when the true amount, if the war continues, will be rising $300,000,000. Among the items given is $1339,710 for "foreign intercourse;" this is monstrous, when it is known that the fixed salaries of all the Ministers and Consuls, in the aggregate, is comparatively trifling. It is supposed, however, that Thurlow Weed, Bishop McIlvaine, and Archbishop Hughes, the special commissioners to manufacture opinion in Europe on behalf of the North, can account for the large balance; or has the system of espionage on your side of the Atlantic, and on board of the Cunard and Inman steamers, been so very extensive as to consume the difference? Like all "story tellers," Mr. Chase forgets his former "fibs;" it was only in October that he published an official statement of the "receipts and expenditures of the Treasury Department for the three months ending on the 30th of June," in which the receipts were set down at $238,000,000, and the expenditures at $194,000,000, or, as he admitted, at the rate of $800,000,000 per annum, and that was acknowledged by every one to represent but two-thirds the actual expenditure; only the items that had reached that particular department were included, and all the unfinished and unsettled accounts with the contractors and soldiers did not appear upon the books.

Mr. Lincoln says: "The vast expenditures incident to the military and naval operations required for the suppression of the rebellion have hitherto been met with a promptitude and certainty unusual in similar circumstances, and the public credit has been fully maintained." This is false; every dodge has been resorted to to avoid payment, and even a large portion of the acknowledged debt, is represented by promissory notes, called "certificates of indebtedness," at twelve months' date. Only $68,000,000 have been funded since the fall of Fort Sumter; all the 7.30-100ths Treasury notes are due in October 1864, and are simply "certificates of indebtedness," having two years to run. While Old Abe is honest (!) enough to suggest that "the increased disbursements made necessary by the augmented forces now in the field" demand the consideration of Congress, i.e. insults the truth by stating that "the suspension of specie payments by the banks soon after the commencement of the last session of Congress made large issues of United States' notes unavoidable." Surely the banks have suspended often before, and "United States' notes" were never issued; and the fact is that in the present instance they got themselves so overloaded with Treasury notes, which they only took in order to prevent Mr. Chase interfering with their circulation by his own issues, that they were obliged to suspend specie payment; and, contrary to his agreement with them, he has issued, in addition, over $300,000,000 of inconvertible "green-backs," that have exterminated the notes of the county banks, and the proposed further emission will drive in all those of the institutions of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia—Mr. Lincoln's excuse for the "legal tender" notes is a barefaced falsehood, and his insinuation that "the long-felt want of a uniform circulating medium" is perfectly absurd. Gold and silver coins are the only "circulating medium" known to the Constitution, and bank notes, or any other kind of notes, have never saved "to the people immense sums in discounts and exchanges." The balance of trade always regulates exchanges, and the premium and discounts are greater now between the East and the West than they were prior to this boasted "circulating medium." The Illinois financier continues: "Fluctuations in the value of currency are always injurious, and to reduce these fluctuations to the lowest possible point will always be a leading purpose in wise legislation." Who caused these "fluctuations?" but Mr. Lincoln himself, in his insane attempt to subjugate the South. And as to the recommendation for "the organization of banking institutions under a general Act of Congress," which would be unconstitutional, that could not help matters. The Government has already monopolized nearly every channel of credit, and an increase in the number of banks cannot augment the quantity of money, any more than the erection of flour-mills can give a greater number of bushels of wheat to the world; and the Federal Government has no more right to grant charters for banks than for blacksmiths' shops.

During the revolutionary war, hostilities against Great Britain were about being brought to a close in consequence of the want of money, when the individual States came forward and advanced the required amounts. Such, however, will not be the case now; the Legislatures of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Delaware and Maryland, all have Democratic majorities, and will refuse their aid; besides which, the Constitutions of most of these States, which have been amended within the last thirty years, do not permit such use of their credit. The Government must, therefore, be brought to a standstill in a very short time from the want of funds; it is merely the "agent" for the States, and when the "principals" refuse to give the "sinews," it will lose all muscle. Many persons say that as Napoleon carried on great wars without money, so can the Federal authorities; but the two cases are quite different in their character, and the endeavour to find an analogy between them betrays an extreme want of judgment.

It has been frequently explained in this correspondence that Mr. Chase has had the advantage of the great credit system of the Northern States, by filling up the void created by the displacement of specie, with bank notes, and promissory notes; but as he proposes to "mount the liquor till it runs over," there will soon be a terrible "spill," when all the "froth" will be visible. With the failure of Mr. Chase, one-half of New York will be broke, and many of your Lombard-street neighbours will, no doubt, be "fellow-sufferers." The whole financial system of Wall-street has been carried on for the last two years on the wooden-matnags, Yankee-clock principle, viz.: not genuine in one respect, and only capable of going "on tick" for a limited period in the other; the deception will soon be perceived, when there will be many a "winding up."

NEWS FROM THE ALABAMA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

St. THOMAS, Nov. 28th.

The San Jacinto is now coaling here, and it is reported that the Alabama is coaling at Sombrero. The importers of coal refused to supply the San Jacinto for payment or drafts, and the Colonial Bank negotiated the Commander's exchange at 10 per cent discount, payable in American gold.

The St. Thomas Times, of the 26th inst., which it was well to caution you, is by no means friendly to the Confederate cause, contains the following account of the recent doings of the Alabama and San Jacinto, which I believe to be substantially correct:—

On Monday last the French brig Marie Valentine brought here from Martinique, to the care of the United States Consul, forty-one American seamen, they being a part of fifty that had landed on the 18th inst. at Port Royal, by the rebel ship Alabama, she having met and burnt on the 2nd of November, in lat. 35 deg. 40 min. north, and long. 66 deg west, the American whaler Levi, 376 tons, Captain Starbuck, out five days from New Bedford, to which port she belonged. The captain and twenty-eight of her crew were kept in irons until landed at the above-mentioned port. On November 8th, met and burnt the T. B. Wales, Captain Lincoln, from Calcutta, bound to Boston—cargo, saltpetre and gunny-cloth. Captain Lincoln had his wife with him, and as passengers, George H. Fairfield, Esq., (late United States' Consul at the Mauritius), wife, two children, and two servants. Captain Lincoln and wife, and Mr. Fairfield and family, were admitted to the cabin of the Alabama, and the crew placed in irons. This vessel, it will be remarked, arrived at Port Royal on the 18th, and on the 19th the United States' frigate San Jacinto appeared, and laid off on the port, so as to avoid the detention of twenty-four hours had she come to an anchor. That evening, between 6 and 8 o'clock, the Alabama succeeded in eluding the frigate and made her escape; the next morning the San Jacinto went to sea. At Port Royal it is stated there was an English brig laden with coal and other stores intended for the use of the Alabama, and the supposition is that these two vessels would proceed to some distant island, for the purpose of having these articles transhipped.

The forty-one men landed here will proceed to-morrow in the American schooner Alice, Captain Goodale, to New York.

NASSAU, November 22.

The Confederate steamer Antonia (late British steamer Herald), and the steamer Leopard, arrived here on the 20th inst., with dates to the 17th inst. The steamers Aries and Hero were in port when these vessels left.

The exploits of Captain Semmes give great satisfaction to our friends in this place. It amuses us not a little to find that the Federals openly acknowledge they cannot catch him, but we were scarcely prepared to hear that they were asking the much-abused Britishers to help them. We had a visit to-day from Commodore Wilkes (Rear-Admiral, I should say). He was informed by the pilot that he could not enter the port, or come to anchor at any of the anchorages until the permission of the Governor was first obtained. With his usual insolence, he replied that if he wished to anchor his ship he should do so without the Governor's leave. He took very good care, however, not to attempt this, not liking, possibly, the look of the Armstrongs of the Barracouta.

I forward to you files of Charleston papers to the 13th of November.

PARIS, December 16.

The most important news of the week, in an American point of view, is supplied by La France, usually well informed in such matters. It states that the French Government have received important despatches from Baron Mercier, and that the inhabitants of Louisiana whose property has been confiscated and plundered by "General" Butler, Mr. Lincoln's exécuteur des basses œuvres—to compare him to an honest hangman would be unfair to the latter—have appealed to France for protection. It is not likely that such an appeal would be made in vain, even if the Louisianians had no claim on the French Government, but such is not the case. Not only are a large portion of the inhabitants of Louisiana of French origin, French in manners and language, but by special stipulations their rights are secured under the guarantee of France. Louisiana, as all your readers know, was ceded by France to the United States in 1803, and one of the provisions of the treaty was that France guaranteed the Louisianians their property, the free exercise of their religion, and all their political rights. La France tells us that victims of Butler's Confiscation Decree have, in their application to France, invoked that treaty. I am not able to say what course the Emperor is prepared to adopt with reference to this question, but it cannot be denied that the conduct of Mr. Lincoln's strap at New Orleans affords just and legitimate grounds for interference.

During the past week the belief has again sprung up that the large naval force despatched to the Gulf of Mexico is quite as much caused by the state of the relations between France and the Federal Government as by any possible contingency connected with the Mexican expedition. It is asserted that two more iron-clad frigates, the Magenta and the Solferino, are to be sent across the Atlantic—and as the Mexicans have no navy of their own, it is not surprising that the public should consider this great naval demonstration as specially connected with American affairs.

Alarming rumours have throughout the week been current touching the Mexican expedition. I have seen private letters, and have reason to believe that the hardships the expedition has had to encounter are nothing more than the matter-of-course difficulties so distant an expedition in so uncivilized a country is likely to meet with. Large reinforcements, however, are under orders, and a depot of men and stores is to be formed at Matinique.

A great many years ago, Count de Montalembert wrote a book about England, which excited a great sensation. One passage in particular created great indignation among the French press, whom he charged with being wholly deficient in that spirit of honesty and fair play which, he remarked, characterized every organ of public opinion in England. No English paper, said the Count, however bitterly it might attack an opponent, would condescend to garble his own words for the purpose of damaging his arguments; in short, with English journalists the suppressio veri and suggestio falsi are things utterly unknown. I will not "look a gift horse in the mouth," and examine what foundation there may be for this sweeping compliment, but the accusation, I am sorry to say, is even more true now than when M. de Montalembert penned it, and in no respect is it so true as in all that regards the American war. Would you believe, for instance, that neither the Debats, the Temps, nor the Opinion Nationale have (save in their telegrams) in any way noticed the atrocious massacre at Palmyra, nor the infamous outrage on Mrs. Brinsmade? Yet the Debats and the Temps are beyond question the most honest and liberal of the French papers, but having with press inconsistency taken up in America the cause of despotism which they attack in Europe, they suppress all that can reveal the real character of President Lincoln's Government. They refuse to let their readers know that throughout the Federal States personal liberty does not exist, that the press is gagged, that peculation goes hand in hand with plunder, and that atrocities, which can only find a parallel in the horrors perpetrated in France during the Reign of Terror, are applauded and rewarded by the Federal President, supported by an unruly mob, the fear of which keeps aloof all such honest politicians who place a higher value on their life and liberty than on the advocacy and defence of truth.

The Constitutionnel, on the other hand, distinguishes itself by the extent, variety, and general accuracy of its intelligence from the South. The following letter from New Orleans appeared in its columns a few days ago. I transcribe it in extenso. I can, after all, understand the thick and thin partisans of Lincolnism suppressing evidence so damaging to their cause:—

"——— Pudet

Hæc dici potuisse et non potuisse refelli."

The letter runs thus:—

This city presents a most melancholy appearance; the streets are almost deserted, and scarcely any one is to be seen but adventurers from the North who come to seek a part in the spoils. The shops remain open, but sell nothing, as no one has any money. Commerce is dead, and agriculture abandoned in all the localities in possession of the Yankees.

A measure which renders life still more difficult, is the proclamation, by which General Butler orders all lodgers who occupy houses belonging to the rebels, to pay their rent to a special officer appointed for the account of the Washington Government. The same measure is applicable to those who are debtors of the rebels, as well as to those who hold any bills or other securities belonging to the traitors. This, as you may imagine, is opening a door to denunciations and robberies of all kinds, and is a premium offered to bad faith. A woman was, a few days since, accused of opening a letter from a Confederate soldier to his wife, and containing a bank note, but she was acquitted of the charge, on the grounds that the money belonged to a rebel.

If we turn to the political and moral state of the city, the situation is still worse. There is no longer any trace of liberty or of confidence in the daily relations of life. A meeting of three persons in the streets is interdicted, and if you approach a friend to speak to him you are sure to see a spy come up to endeavour to catch what you say. It is only at home and in the bosom of one's own family, and with well-known friends, that any one can venture to give vent to his feelings. General Butler gives a slave a fee of from ten to twenty piastres for every tale he can bring.

It frequently happens that a well-known friend or acquaintance has disappeared, and the result of an inquiry is that he has been sent to some fortress as a prisoner, and it is vain that you ask why or wherefore, for no one can tell you; and if you ask for how long a time he has been condemned, you hear that it is for three or five years. When tried, they are not allowed either witnesses or counsel, or even a jury. They are taken before Butler, who, after swearing and stamping his feet for a few minutes, sentences them to imprisonment. And to what prisons are they sent? Horrible bastilles, situated on a desolate beach surrounded with pestilential swamps.

All communication between New Orleans and the surrounding country is nearly entirely cut off. No one can quit the city without showing the sentinels a permission signed by General Butler, and whose document cannot be obtained without great difficulty, and never except by those who have taken the oath of allegiance. The parishes nearest to the city are all deserted; the inhabitants have fled to escape the danger of death which threatened them night and day. The railway of the Opelousas is guarded by negro soldiers, who commit all kinds of depredations, and kill any one who attempts to make the slightest resistance.

Squads of bandits every day leave the camp and enter the houses, which they pillage of everything that comes in their way. Hence the whole of Lower Louisiana is a scene of indescribable desolation; the eye of the traveller can discover nothing but plantations abandoned or devastated. Beyond the parish of Jefferson, some fields of maize and beans may be seen, but the crops are all lost, for the negroes of President Lincoln have signified that they would shoot any proprietors who might attempt to remove anything off the ground.

The political situation of the North presents the deepest interest at the present moment, and excites the liveliest attention on the part of the South. Are the Democrats or the Radicals to obtain the triumph? What will be the consequence of the almost certain victory of the former?

Determined and intelligent separatists wish for the success of the Black Republicans, feeling persuaded that their madness and fury will exasperate the West and precipitate the crisis. I, for my part, cannot share in that opinion. In spite of the pains which the Democrats take to convince the public that they are determined to vigorously pursue the war, I think they are at heart very desirous for peace, and secretly ready to do everything to bring it about. They clearly see the insanity of this fratricidal struggle and the impossibility of a restoration cemented by blood. When they post up warlike declarations, it is because, as the proverb says, they are obliged to howl with the wolves. It is an electoral tactic and nothing more. That the Democrats sincerely regret the Union, I have no doubt; but they have too much political good sense not to see things in their real light, and they are too deeply imbued with constitutional principles to dream of the conquest and subjugation of the South. That party has a fund of patriotism and liberalism, which has become strengthened by the rude trials through which the country has passed and is now passing.

It is not the same with the fanatics of New England, a race obstinate, egotistical, haughty, and inflexible in its ambition, senseless in its counsels, sanguinary in its acts, and bigoted in its own hateful fashion of interpreting the sacred records. What that race desires is less the re-establishment of the Union, than the satisfaction of their self-love, their their jealousy, and their vengeance. The solution every day more and more hoped for, will, therefore, more surely result from the accession of the Democrats to power, for it is to be presumed that the Black Republicans, out of hatred, spite and envy, will refuse to their adversaries for the continuance of the war, the co-operation they have given during the radical administration. Supposing, however, that the war were to be continued under the direction and control of the Democrats, it would, at least, be carried on according to the laws observed in civilized countries. Brigandage would disappear, and we should no longer witness those excesses of which we are now the victims.

At the moment I am writing I have received a copy of the True Delta, in which mention is made of a proposed mediation on the part of the European Powers. We have so often been the dupes of rumours of this kind, that I receive the news with extreme mistrust, although the time appears opportune for step of that kind. What do the Powers wait for? Why do they remain indifferent and apathetic spectators of a scene of war and devastation, which is unparalleled in history? It would be well for them to decide and abandon that strange torpor—which policy condemns, and humanity reproves. May God hasten the moment so painfully and anxiously looked for.

Leaving these painful scenes, and coming over to this side of the Atlantic the prospect, though not so gloomy, is still far from cheering. In the political world the greatest confusion prevails, and the great Powers of Europe preserve towards each other an attitude of distrust, which is far from reassuring to the friends of peace.

The chief stumbling-block in everybody's path is Italy and the Roman question—it is useless mincing matters. The new Cabinet which has been formed at Turin, and its programme, apparently so quiet and dignified, must be held as an answer to the last French despatches, in which Italy was made to feel so keenly her dependent position. The clerical party at Court are in a state of exultation, but they are so intoxicated with their own triumph that it seems to me they overrate their own power, and instead of being a convenient tool, fancy that they are the real master mind. Messieurs de la Guernonniere, the Papal Nuncio, Keller, de la Rochejaquelein, and Segur d'Aguesseau, imagine—modest souls!—that they can mould the Emperor, whose views and wishes they unconsciously promote, to do their bidding! Their organ, La France, reminds one of the Fat Boy in Dickens' "Pickwick Papers;" La France wants to make our flesh creep, and darkly hints at awful contingencies. In addition, our clerical friends are about to avail themselves of that powerful instrument for producing a sensation, an anonymous pamphlet, echoing M. de la Guernonniere's favourite scheme for the dismemberment of Italy. Do I believe that the Emperor means anything of the kind? I really cannot say; but think that His Majesty is determined on one thing—i. e., to keep his troops at Rome; and that, like our old Athenian friend, he thinks it useful to cut off the tail of his favourite dog. That dog of Alcibiades is one of our standing institutions, as Henri Heine pointed out long since. In one of his celebrated letters he introduces a stranger and a bourgeois. Scene, a little German town:—

Stranger: Bless my soul, what a fine dog that is.

Bourgeois: Yes; that is Alcibiades' dog.

Stranger: Indeed!—Alcibiades?—What do you mean?

Bourgeois: Why, of course, we have no Alcibiades amongst us, but we find his dog mighty convenient, and cut a bit off his tail from time to time.

I have always thought that the great use of La France was that it performed the part of that celebrated bow-wow. It always affords something to talk about, and enables the ruling Powers' real intentions to lie perdu until a fitting time occurs to reveal them. At the same time it is dangerous to play with edged tools, and these rumours of dismemberment, of placing a Murat on the throne of Naples, are calculated to keep up a feeling of distrust, and an agitation which is highly prejudicial to the continuance of peace.

The Greek question, though to all appearance settled, still occasions uneasiness, and the last move of the English Government—the cession of the Ionian Islands—gives rise to all manner of suppositions; for such is the perverseness of human nature in Paris that people refuse to believe that England would abandon a first-rate military position merely because the natives fancy they have a natural affinity with an adjoining country, unless she had some very good substantial reason for doing so. It may, indeed, be a piece of folly perfectly Quixotic, what the French call eccentricité Britannique, carried to its farthest limits; but it must be admitted that this extreme generosity is a case for reasonable suspicion.

In Paris we are going pretty much in the usual style. The formidable Jour de l'an announces its approach in its usual insidious style. Waiters, porters, coachmen, and servants are getting suspiciously obsequious and civil, and the toy and sugar-plum shops are putting forth all their most tempting wares.

Dr. Nelaton, who pulled the bullet out of Garibaldi's foot, has just administered a very proper rebuke to a deputation from Nantes, who sought to return him for that town on opposition principles. Dr. Nelaton very properly told them that his skill in the use of the bistouri by no means implied familiarity with public affairs, and gave them to understand that one honest man added to the Corps Legislatif would not much improve it, whilst his patients (and his patience) would suffer from his attending the deliberations of that celebrated corps.

M. Emile Augier has drawn a hornet's nest about his ears by his anti-clerical comedy Le Fils de Giboyer. The celebrated Louis Veuillot, the great Billingsgate Quintillion of the clerical press, has rushed into print, and demolished M. Augier in his favourite style. The dramatist meanwhile is paid marked attention to by Prince Napoleon and all the Radical party, and has published his comedy with a preface, in which he compares it to Molière's chef d'œuvre!

The Emperor has gone to-day to pay his long-announced visit to Baron Rothschild at Fécamp; only a dozen guests are invited to meet His Majesty. It is merely a shooting party, but if the fog was as dense in the country as it has been in Paris, His Majesty must have had but poor sport. A great deal has been said as to the real object of that visit being financial, political, and so on. But in spite of appearances, I am told that the only object was the destruction of the hares and pheasants in the financial Baron's well-stocked preserves.

The little Prince Imperial on Sunday last went to the play for the first time. The theatre was the Cirque in the Place du Chatelet; the performance consisted of a pantomime, Rothomago, which I am told the little fellow appeared to enjoy quite as much as a young bourgeois of his own years (he is six years old). The imperial party sat out the whole performance, from 7 to 12 p.m., and were vociferously cheered by a crowded house.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1862.

Mr. Lincoln's Message.

Manhattan, the eccentric New York correspondent of the Standard, tells a story of the Northern President which is worth repeating. An office-seeker, who considered that he had rendered large services to the Republican party, pressed his claims on the gratitude of the President, with the extravagant boast that the victory of 1860 had been owing to his exertions. "That is to say, you made me President?" "Yes, I think so," was the applicant's reply. "Then a pretty fix you have got me into, that's all;" and Mr. Lincoln closed the interview. Si non e vero e ben trovato. The Presidential Message is exactly in this tone. We could almost find it in our heart to pity the man who, in such a position, has nothing better to say, and the nation which, at the crisis of its fate, is doomed to listen to such a string of platitudes and absurdities from the Chief to whom universal suffrage has entrusted its destinies. Weakness is ever pitiable; weakness in high places, too conspicuous to be hidden, too helpless even to seek for strength in those who might strengthen it—the weakness of an insignificant man thrust by chance, or by that popular caprice which is worse than chance, inasmuch as it is wholly incalculable, into one of the most important positions in the world—weakness which yet is strong enough to deluge a continent with blood, to menace the peace of Europe, and interrupt the commerce of half the globe—weakness which has made Virginia a desert and Lancashire a poor-house—affords a spectacle too terrible for contempt, and almost too revolting for pity. The Presidential Message is the wail of bewildered, helpless, weakness, ashamed to confess, and yet unable to conceal, its utter perplexity. Never before, we think, did the head of a great nation gravely come forward when the national fortunes were in such peril, and the national passions so vehemently excited, to offer counsels so utterly void of meaning, and consolation so entirely barren of truth. Never before did Democracy show to such disadvantage as now, when the men to whom it has handed over the control of a vast empire, and the management of a gigantic war, appear before the nation to deliver themselves of nonsense that would hardly be endured by a parish vestry in language that would disgrace a fourth-form school-boy.

We have no doubt that Mr. Lincoln feels the wretchedness of his position. Even to such a mind as his, "to be weak is miserable;" to be so weak as he is, under such a burden as is laid upon him, would be misery that no sensitive conscience could endure. But Mr. Lincoln's conscience is not sensitive. He has never shown any squeamishness about bloodshed; he has never shrunk from lawless tyranny, from disgraceful treachery, from cowardly brutality; he has not even feared to assume, by tolerating assassins in the service over which he has supreme control, the guilt of deliberate murder. Yet he does seem to desire to do what is in his eyes the paramount duty of his position—to restore the authority of the Federal Government throughout the vast extent of territory that formerly constituted the United States.

That is his fixed idea; the one thing that is obligatory on his conscience, and essential to his peace of mind; and that is exactly what he is beginning to learn that he never can do. He feels that he does not see his own way, he feels that none of those about him see their way; and he goes on groping in the dark, and blundering into crime after crime, into disaster after disaster, till no obtuseness of intellect or conscience can prevent his knowing that he is assisting in the ruin of his country, and helping on the final destruction of that Union which it is his real and earnest endeavour to restore. When he was thanked for his Emancipation edict by a deputation of Abolitionist fanatics, he gave utterance to what has probably been the uppermost thought in his heart after every one of the acts into which he has been cajoled or hurried by Ministers and partisans—"I trust to God that I have made no mistake." It was the phrase of a man honest after his kind; a man whom the pride of place had not inflated with self-confidence, and whom political passion had not rendered deaf to doubts and qualms of conscience; but of a man so weak, so irresolute, so utterly wanting alike in the reserve and in the courage of a statesman that no one who heard it could ever again believe that Abraham Lincoln was fit to fill the position to which the voice of faction and fanaticism had called him.

That part of the Message which relates to foreign affairs displays the weakness not of indecision, but of insolence and insincerity; the weakness not of Mr. Lincoln, but of Mr. Seward and Mr. Gideon Welles. We are amused, if not surprised, to find that so far from apprehending European intervention, so far from fearing that if the Confederate States should not speedily be crushed, they may be recognized by Powers which cannot be expected in such a matter to wait on the pleasure of the Government at Washington, the President has entertained hopes, not yet dissipated, that the recognition of the belligerent rights of the South, so unwisely and unhesitatingly accorded by France and England, would ere long be withdrawn. It was but a few days after he had learned that France had proposed an interposition which would have finally sealed the independence of the Confederacy that Mr. Lincoln delivered himself of this astonishing idea. Seeing that the South has contrived to prove her belligerent status by inflicting upon the Federal armies a series of the most tremendous defeats that any modern army ever sustained, and to extort even from himself an acknowledgment of that status in the negotiation of a regular exchange of prisoners, it is incredible that he should seriously imagine that the European Powers have or ever had any idea of withdrawing from the position they have taken—the only position they could reasonably assume, or could hope peacefully to maintain. If—Dis exaudita malignis—Mr. Lincoln's hope were realized, what would be the consequence? In the first place, the search of British vessels on the high seas could no longer be permitted. That is a belligerent right, and if the United States are not at war, they cannot claim to exercise it; while, if they are at war, there can be no question as to the recognition of their enemy as a belligerent. Again, the right of blockade is one which can only be exercised in war; and if England and France ceased to recognize the Confederacy as a belligerent Power, they would be obliged to notify to Mr. Lincoln, that they could no longer tolerate his pretension to blockade Charleston, Mobile, and Savannah. If in return some practical obstacles were placed in the way of the shipment of arms and ammunition from Liverpool and Nassau, would this compensate the North for the inconvenient restrictions imposed on its operations by the acceptance of its absurd declaration that it is not at war—an assertion of which we certainly fancied that we had heard the last?

Notwithstanding that the "temporary reverses which have befallen the Federal arms, and which have been exaggerated by disloyal citizens abroad," have delayed this "act of simple justice," the President considers the state of foreign relations more satisfactory than he could have expected. Certainly, even Mr. Seward could hardly have foreseen that Great Britain would endure so quietly the insult and contumely that have been heaped upon her—the burning of her merchantmen in neutral waters; the blockade of Bermuda; the attacks on British vessels within gunshot of British shores; and finally, the menace of Captain Wilkes to enter the harbour of Nassau by force, in open defiance of the prohibition of the colonial Government. The necessity of "blockading 3000 miles of sea coast" affords no excuse for such operations as these. But the patience of England—or of Lord Russell—is to be yet further tried. Mr. Welles is of opinion that the British Government ought to answer for the misdeeds of the Alabama, and to indemnify the merchants whose ships Captain Semmes has captured and destroyed. If she should decline to do this, it will be "matter of grave consideration" how long England is to be allowed to maintain her neutral attitude, and furnish arms and materials of war impartially to the agents of both the belligerent Confederations. This is "an abuse;" and "how far it may be carried with impunity to the Government which tolerates it" depends, in the opinion of Mr. Welles, and apparently in that of his superior, rather on the patience than on the prudence of the Northern Cabinet. If language of this kind were printed in official documents by any European Government, explanations would probably be demanded as soon as the telegraph had communicated to London the publication of the insult; but the habit of treating American impertinences with contemptuous forbearance is so ingrained in English statesmen that not even the lesson of the Trent has been sufficient to teach them that the tolerance of contempt is mistaken at Washington for the submission that springs from fear.

The Secretary of the Treasury has not yet presented his Report; but he has contributed to the Presidential Message a suggestion which appears to us a masterpiece of financial folly. Mr. Chase professes an anxiety to reduce the fluctuations in the value of the currency, and ensure its prompt convertibility into coin. The simple way of doing this would, of course, be to make Treasury notes payable in gold or silver at certain offices in every great town, or even in one town only. But this plan is either too simple for Mr. Chase's taste, or too difficult for his strength. We are inclined to suppose the former; because if the Treasury of the United States has not and cannot procure the means of paying its notes in coin, it certainly cannot give any other institution the means of doing so. But Mr. Chase proposes to create, by Act of Congress, certain banking companies, privileged to issue notes of a particular form, supplied to them by the Treasury in exchange for the deposit of United States' bonds, which notes are to be convertible into cash. We have tried in vain to make out what the Minister expects to achieve by this curious manœuvre. Suppose his banks established—suppose that they have lent to the Treasury £20,000,000 sterling, and begin to issue notes "payable on demand"—what will happen? Simply this, that as the currency is depreciated about 25 per cent., every note issued will immediately come back on the issuers in exchange for coin. Not only, therefore, would the proposed banks have no influence over the present currency, but while that currency remains extant, they could not float a single five-dollar note "convertible into coin." Is it Mr. Chase's hope that the banks would assist him to withdraw a portion or the whole of the mass of depreciated paper at present afloat; bringing it back to him in exchange for the bonds which are to form the basis of their own issues? It is true that this might be done—if the terms offered were worth the acceptance of any large banking companies—to a limited extent, but only to a limited extent. For when they had purchased as large a quantity of United States' bonds as would cover the whole amount of convertible notes that could be floated, a portion of the present inconvertible currency—that portion of it which, as is shown by the depreciation, is in excess of the amount of convertible paper or gold really required for the purposes of currency—would remain in the hands of the public. And as, while any portion of the currency is convertible or metallie, the currency can never be in excess of the public demand (for such excess immediately causes convertible notes to be exchanged for bullion, and bullion to be hoarded or exported), the banks would only be able to float such a quantity of convertible paper as, together with the remnant of inconvertible Treasury notes, would make up the whole amount required for circulation; that is, they would not be able to issue notes up to the amount of their stock, even if the whole purchase money of that stock were used directly or indirectly to redeem the inconvertible paper now afloat. Mr. Chase's scheme would require that Government should first of all restore the value of the currency by redeeming the excess; in fact, should itself make its notes payable in coin. When it had done this there would be no occasion for the services of the banks; until it does this the banks cannot be brought into active existence. Finally, we do not see how it could be made worth the while of any company to accept the proposed terms. Any bank can at present issue notes, depositing or not depositing stock as security; and it can hardly be thought that the advantage of having notes of a particular and uniform pattern (and this is all that Mr. Chase offers) will induce any of them to lend to the Government money which can be employed to better purpose and on better security: for when a country, enjoying perfect liberty of commerce with all the world, is confessedly raising only eleven millions sterling by taxation, and spending a hundred and twenty millions—when it is creating a debt of which the interest alone will in another year exceed its whole revenue—the security of the Government must be rated very low indeed.

But whatever may become of the national finances, the war is to go on. It is sad to think that thousands of lives and millions of money are to be wasted month after month at the bidding of a man who actually assigns as a reason for prosecuting the war the impossibility of finding or drawing a boundary-line between the two Confederacies; as if the lines which suffice to separate States would not serve as the demarcations of empires; as if, while France and Russia are content with imaginary boundary lines, a "natural frontier" were necessary in America; or as if "natural frontiers" could not be found in abundance. But the war must go on, we fear; not because disunion is impossible, for disunion is an accomplished fact—not because boundaries cannot be drawn, for nothing is easier—not because terms of peace could not easily be arranged, for both parties are sick of the conflict, and would be glad to settle the dispute on any equitable basis—but simply because the North, having undertaken to conquer the South, does not see how to draw back. The war must go on, because it has begun. England has declined to join with France to put an end to it; it cannot end of itself; and there is not in the Northern States a man or a party with the genius, the courage, or the power to stop its progress, or to arrest the headlong course of the country on its road to destruction.

Compensated Emancipation.

The world has never beheld a more pitiable spectacle than that now presented by the head of a still great and powerful nation, who in a moment of supreme peril can find only homely commonplaces for its consolation, and suggests for its guidance nothing better than a vague visionary plan which has already failed in practical application. With the childish obstinacy of a very weak man, Mr. Lincoln clings to his scheme of "compensated emancipation" as the specific cure of the ills that afflict the country, and hopes that the proposition which was rejected by States of which he held military possession would be accepted by States in which the authority of Jefferson Davis is undisputed, or that a "generosity" which alienated friends still remaining to him in the border land, would win the affections of open and implacable enemies. We must, however, do Mr. Lincoln the justice to remark that in another part of his homily to the nation he himself is not without a confused perception of the inadequacy of his remedy, for in a sentence as unclear as only he could write it, he seems to express the despondent belief that the strife between the North and South would not end before the present generation of men had passed away. The Northern President has a reputation for simplicity of mind and naïveté of expression, and he certainly deserves both by the remarkable manner in which he betrays the real purposes of his more astute advisers in permitting him to reiterate the already rejected proposal. "We are divided among ourselves," says, in substance, this ingenuous Chief-Magistrate, "on the subject of slavery. My scheme flatters all the divergent opinions—those who wish the abolition of the institution, by holding out to them a distant prospect of realizing their wishes; and those who deprecate the abolition, by postponing the whole subject to a dim and remote future. Thus if it does not heal the dissensions between North and South it may at least heal the dissensions among ourselves, and enable us to direct our undivided efforts towards restoring the Union by fire and sword." The plain interpretation of which is—the people in the recent elections have condemned the emancipation policy of the Administration. The Administration cannot dispense with the support of the violent party which raised it to power, and it dare not act openly in opposition to the popular will. The latter is to be flattered by the form of asking Congress for constitutional authority to carry out emancipation by a sober and peaceful process in the course of years; the former are in the same breath assured that the President, in his military capacity, will not await such authority, and will adhere to his more expeditious process.

Whether this cunning device will have the desired effect remains to be seen. We do not believe it. The President is too awkward a man to carry out successfully this species of political tight-rope dancing. His mode of steering a middle course has heretofore been to reel like a drunkard from one side of the road to the other. His steps are not likely to become at once more steady and even. Apart from the intrinsic impracticability of the scheme, whichever party, if any, may favour it, the other is tolerably certain to oppose it for party purposes, and each can do so upon equally good grounds. The Abolitionists may denounce it as a shameful compounding with sin and crime; the Democrats may dilate upon the absurdity of adding to the burthens of the nation another debt equal to more than half the National debt of Great Britain, and the impossibility of deporting outside of the United States a people of four million souls. Either of these modes of reasoning are purely speculative, for the laws of the United States can never have the slightest practical effect upon the nation which is now politically and historically, if not diplomatically, recognized to be a separate and independent nation.

In this connexion the letter from the South which we publish elsewhere arrives most opportunely, although written before Mr. Lincoln's proposal was known or even suspected. As a temperate statement of Southern views on the subject of emancipation, and a frank exposition of the danger which actually threatens the South, it will amply repay careful perusal. We are strongly impressed in this letter by a train of reasoning which has never received sufficient attention in Europe. Our correspondent, quoting the words of the Confederate President when Senator in the United States' Congress, says that slavery is less a question of property than a plan for the civil government of an inferior race. We in this country are wont to consider the compensation of the owners as the greatest difficulty of the problem of emancipation. Our correspondent suggests that a far greater difficulty lies behind this. It is not the master alone who is protected by this plan of civil government in a regular supply of trained labour; the slave also derives from it the only efficient protection of an inferior and feebler race, from the crushing heel of a stronger and exterminating race. Whoever has studied the invariable consequences of such a collision of races will not be apt to pass lightly over this branch of the intricate problem. The negro as a slave has only one master, with a chance that this master, whether from his position in society or from self-interest, would at least be humane, and have a decent regard to his welfare. The negro, as a freed man, would have as many brutal masters as there are poor white men with whose earnings he might have to compete, and without greater protection from the laws than he now enjoys. The only substitute for the present plan of civil government is an unlimited issue of United States' bonds, and the deportation of a whole people from the land of their birth.

The Meaning and Power of Conventions in the United States.

The telegraphic summary of the Message of President Lincoln has given rise to the erroneous impression that he had recommended to the Congress of the United States the important step of calling a Convention of the States. Congress has no constitutional power to make such a call, except at the request of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States; but the mere suggestion by the President of such a measure would, as we shall endeavour to show, have a significance far beyond any amendments to the Constitution. There are two modes by which the Constitution of the United States provides for its own amendment—one by a simple and comparatively easy process which has been already repeatedly employed; the other so grave and so fraught with momentous consequences that the founders of the republic made it possible only by the previous concurrence of two-thirds of the States. These provisions are as follows:—

Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses should deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress.

It will be seen, on reading the text of the Message, that Mr. Lincoln has contented himself with the simpler and usual method. His suggestion is therefore without the slightest significance. According to the theory of the North, the Southern States are still members of the Union, and to engraft the proposed amendments upon the Constitution three-fourths of the nominal number—that is to say twenty-four States, or more than are actually in the Union and represented in the Congress which he addresses—must give their concurrence. Well aware of this, the President hints at the expedient of manufacturing States for the occasion out of the Territories. Of the prosperity of these he speaks in glowing terms, apparently forgetful of the flat contradiction he gives himself in another place by admitting that the sale of the public lands—the unfailing indication of the increase of population in the wilderness—has ceased to be a source of revenue, and is not sufficient to pay for the management of those lands. Until the hint shall be acted upon, the subject is not worth extended comment, and we may better employ our space with one at present of more interest—the meaning and power of American Conventions.

The loose manner in which the word is used in the unintelligible slang of American party politics excuses even a well-informed English reader for ignorance of the precise meaning of the term, or the real function of such a body in the political machinery of the country. He is confused by hearing of the various "State" and "National" Conventions, which meet under various party names, nominate Governors and Presidents, and play so important a part on the political stage; but these are assemblages of self-constituted delegates, which derive their being and authority from no part of the written or unwritten laws of the country, and in this case, as in the case of commercial conventions, railroad conventions, etc., etc., the term is simply an Americanism for "congress," and used in the same sense as we speak of a Social Science Congress, an International Copyright Congress, etc., etc. In its true political significance the term "convention"—probably borrowed from the French Revolutionary Assembly of that name—is a body representing and wielding the sovereignty of a regularly organized political community—that is to say, a State. The members must be elected according to the electoral law of the State.

Such a body always styles itself "The people in Convention assembled," and is held in theory to have all the powers which would pertain to the people of the State, if met together in a primary assembly. In practice, however, its functions are usually restricted, either by precedents and usage, or by the special purpose for which the Convention is convoked. From its very nature such an assembly can only be convoked by the highest constituted authority of the State, but it does not derive its powers from, nor can be restricted in the exercise of them by, the authority which convoked. The very reason of its convocation is to exercise functions and powers beyond and above the competency of the constituted authorities, and which require that the people should temporarily delegate the sovereignty residing in them to representatives in a common and extraordinary consultation. A Convention, therefore, is never called, except in some exceptional emergency—as to frame, remodel, or amend the organic law of the State, and nearly all the States have more than once made use of this agency to alter their several Constitutions. It was through the agency of such Conventions that the present Federal Constitution was adopted by most of the original members of the Union, it was through such agencies that each new State subsequently became a member, and it was through such agencies that the seceding States withdrew from the Federal compact. The essential difference between a State Legislature and a Convention of the people of the State is, that the former exists by virtue of the written law, and can exercise no powers not conferred on it by that law; while the latter is the source of the law itself, and bases its authority upon the fundamental theory of a republican polity, that the sovereignty resides in the people. It is remarkable that this apparently irresponsible and anomalous political engine is the only one of all the political institutions of America which has not at some time or other been perverted and abused. Whether it is that meeting only on extraordinary occasions, and for some great purpose, the Convention impresses the popular imagination with a respect which the American has lost for his ordinary governmental machinery, or from whatever reason, certain it is that the corruption and levity which so generally characterize American legislative assemblies have seldom or never disgraced Conventions. As a rule, the delegates are chosen with more discrimination and by a higher class of voters than in ordinary elections. It now only remains to add that no general rule or usage obtains, or has ever obtained, among the various States as regards Conventions. Thus in Virginia, the usage obtains that all acts of a Convention must be submitted to the primary electors before becoming valid; while in most of the other States the acts of a Convention are held to be final, unless by its own direction submitted to a popular vote, as has sometimes been the case. Nor can, in the relations between State and State, or between the State and the Federal Government, any distinction be drawn between the acts of a Convention and those of the Legislature, provided the sovereign will of the State be distinctly and unmistakably signified. Thus the adoption of the present Federal Constitution by the Legislatures of a few of the States was held to be equally valid, though not so solemn, as if, like in the majority of the States, it had been the act of a Convention.

The term "National Convention," as contradistinguished from a "State Convention," is used for convenience and in absence of a better. Strictly speaking, there can be in the Federal system no such thing as a National Convention, because the only political community known to this system is the State. As the Congress is a Legislature of and for the States, so the so-called "National Convention" is a Convention of States, and not of the people. The style of the Federal Legislature is "the United States in Congress assembled;" the style of the Convention is "the United States in Convention assembled." In neither case is it in theory or practice an assembling of the people. In every other respect the analogy of the "National" to the "State" Convention is perfect, and the relative position of the Federal Legislature and the Federal convention is the same as between the corresponding State assemblies. This will be best illustrated by the reference to the history of the first and only national, or rather Federal Convention, so termed, that has ever been assembled in the United States. In 1787, the thirteen United States, finding their Federal system defective and insufficient for their purposes, severally sent, through their Legislatures or Conventions, delegates to a general Convention of all the States for the purpose of deliberating upon, and, if possible, proposing for adoption to the States, a new and improved Federal compact or Constitution. This Convention met under the presidency of George Washington, and after protracted secret deliberations, proposed to the States the Federal compact which, with the subsequent amendments, is known as the present Constitution of the United States. The old Federal Government was dissolved, and the new one went into operation, according to the fiat of the Convention, so soon as nine of the States had adopted the proposed change, and although the remaining four still delayed their entrance into the Union, and two of them remained for a considerable period outside of it as independent little republics.

The reader cannot fail to perceive the exceptional, and in one sense revolutionary, character of such a Convention. In theory and in practice it is independent of and above the President, the Congress, and the Supreme Court. Its assemblage would be, in fact, the resumption by the States of the powers delegated in the creation of the Federal Government; for the Convention, with the consent of all or a part of the States, might abolish the Presidential office, entrust the legislative branch of the Government to one instead of two assemblies, extend or restrict the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, or abolish that tribunal, consolidate all the States into one compact empire, or dissolve the Federal tie altogether, and resolve the Union into as many separate republics as there were before States. For mere amendments of the Constitution it is unnecessary to conjure up a body with such extraordinary powers, since the Constitution itself provides within itself a simpler and less dangerous mode for its own amendment. The call for the Convention of the States could mean only a confession of the total wreck of the Federal Constitution, and the utter inadequacy of all its provisions to the emergencies of the crisis. Such a confession, in all probability, will, and perhaps must, precede the recognition of the independent nationality of the Confederate States by the States of the North, since the Constitution has conferred on no part of the Federal Government such a power, and the Convention is the only body which could exercise it with the form of law. In this view of the case, the call of a Convention would be the certain harbinger of peace. The Message of President Lincoln would indeed be an important State paper did it contain even the bare suggestion of this last refuge from the troubles that gather daily more thickly and heavily around the Government and the people.

The Ionian Islands.

The Greeks have been made the victims of a diplomatic trick as thoroughly unnecessary and idle as it has proved successful. The English Government was thrown into a great fright upon the expulsion of King Otho, by the suspicion that Russia, in order to obtain the election of the Duke of Leuchtenburg to the vacant throne, would either repudiate altogether the Convention of 1830, or, admitting it to be still in force, insist that the Duke did not come within its terms. To prevent this danger, the Government organs were instructed to support the candidature of Prince Alfred, and encourage the Greeks to believe that the Prince would accept the throne if it should be offered him. With the same object Mr. Searlett, the English Minister at Athens, was kept in a state of complete uncertainty as to the intentions of the Government, and was not allowed to undeceive the populace of Athens, or even the Provisional Government. The manœuvre was perfectly successful. Russia, frightened in her turn by the possibility that Prince Alfred would accept the throne, hastened to declare her adherence to the convention, and to abandon the candidature of the young Beauharnais Romanowski. Inasmuch, however, as the Greeks have not shown the slightest desire to elect the Duke of Leuchtenburg, and, on the contrary, have displayed a violent antipathy to everything Russian, the success is utterly valueless. As the Russian had never the slightest chance of being elected, his promise, or rather the promise made for him, not to accept the throne was quite unnecessary. England has gained nothing by her finesse, but the Greeks have lost a great deal by it. They have wasted much energy and enthusiasm, sustained a severe and dispiriting disappointment, and if they have not exactly made enemies of France and Russia, have, at least, deprived themselves of the goodwill of those Powers. If we may believe statements very confidently made in well-informed quarters, Earl Russell is ashamed of the scurvy trick he has played the Greeks, and is disposed to make them amends. We are told that the Honourable Mr. Elliott has been sent to Athens upon a special mission, with instructions to spare the Greeks the trouble of looking out for a substitute for Prince Alfred, and to promise on the part of England to endow her nominee with the same dowry, which the Greeks only hoped might be given them with Prince Alfred. Improbable as the news appears, there really is reason to believe that Mr. Elliott is instructed to offer the Provisional Government of Greece the cession of the Ionian Islands upon condition that Prince Ferdinand is elected King of Greece.

The Ionian Islands would make no contemptible present to a regenerated Greece. Fertile and prosperous, their annexation would at once make a very respectable addition to the population and resources, and, we must add, to the debt of the Hellenic kingdom. Of the seven islands which, with their small dependencies, constitute the republic which bears the sonorous title of "The United States of the Ionian Islands," six—Corfu, Paxo, Cephalonia, Santa Maura, Ithaca, and Zante—lie on the coast of Albania, and the western shore of Greece; and one, Cerigo, lies on the southern coast of the Morea, 150 miles from Zante, the southernmost of its sisters; and apparently having no reason at all for her political connexion with them. Corfu is the northernmost of the group, being posted, as it were as a sentinel, at the entrance of the Adriatic, and, with the exception of Cephalonia, is the largest. All the islands produce oil and wine; the currant is largely cultivated, especially in Zante, Cephalonia, and Ithaca, and forms the largest item in the exportations of the republic. Its total population must now be approaching a quarter of a million, spread over about a thousand square miles, and the town of Corfu, with a population of more than 16,000 may be taken as its capital. It has flourished exceedingly under the British protectorate, but it has never been content. The people have always clamoured for union with Greece, even at the time when Greece was most mis-governed and pauperized.

The history of the Ionian Islands, from the days when Ulysses governed them, teste Homer, to our own, is not very interesting. They experienced the same calamities with the mainland, and passing under the Roman rule, were the prey of that Slavonic scourge which ethnologists tell us rooted out the real Hellenes. In 1386, after being the prey of Norman conquerors from Sicily, and a battle-field for the rivalry of Venice and Genoa, they passed under the rule of the great Republic of the Adriatic, and remained hers until her death. When Napoleon, in 1797, annihilated Venice by the Treaty of Campo Formio, he included the Ionian Islands in his own share of the spoils. France did not long enjoy possession of them. A combined Russian and Turkish fleet captured them in 1799, and in March 1800, mirabile dictu, the two most despotic Powers in the world signalized themselves by establishing a republic. "The Seven United Islands," as the new republic was called, was placed under the suzerainty of the Porte, and had to pay the Sultan a yearly tribute of 75,000 piastres. It was to be governed by the notables and principal persons of the country precisely as they pleased, but Russia and Turkey had the right, during the then present war, to put, with the concurrence of the republic, garrisons into the fortresses. Turkey some years afterwards bitterly complained that Russia continually violated this article of the convention by introducing as many troops as she pleased and using the islands as her own. This republic existed seven years; by the Peace of Tilsit Russia then delivered them back to Buonaparte, who incorporated them in the French Empire. England, however, soon took possession of all of them, except Corfu, which she only obtained by the Convention of Paris of the 23rd of April, 1814. The islands were formally placed in her hands by a treaty between Austria, Prussia, Russia, and Great Britain, signed at Paris on the 5th of November, 1815. By this treaty the islands were constituted a republic under the title of "The United States of the Ionian Islands," and placed under the immediate and exclusive protection of Great Britain. The other Powers renounced all pretensions to that protection, and guaranteed the stipulations of the treaty. The Ionians were to give themselves an interior organization; and to give it the necessary consistency and action, it was provided that the King of Great Britain should appoint a Lord High Commissioner invested with all authority necessary for that purpose. He was to convoke a Legislative Assembly, whose operations he was to direct, to prepare a constitutional charter which should be submitted to the King for ratification. The protecting Power had the right to occupy the fortresses of the republic, and its military forces were to be under the orders of the commandant of the British troops. Particular conventions were to regulate, in accordance with the revenues of the republic, the payment by it of the British troops, and their number in time of peace. All ports as to military and boundary rights were declared under British jurisdiction. Only commercial agents or consuls were to be accredited to the republic, and commerce from the Austrian States was to enjoy the same advantages as British commerce.

In accordance with this treaty a Legislative Assembly was convoked, and a constitutional charter duly enacted and ratified by the protecting Powers. The charter left the principal interior administration in the hands of a Senate and a Legislative Assembly; and if the Ionians would have accepted their position, and not have struggled for annexation to Greece, they might have enjoyed the most perfect freedom. But that they would not do. Insurrectionary movements, stimulated by the French revolution of February 1848, and marked by great excesses, were repressed with great severity by Sir Henry Ward, the Lord High Commissioner; but the protecting Power followed the re-establishment of order by very liberal modifications of the Constitution of 1817. Nothing, however, satisfied the Ionians; they grew more and more restive; every meeting of the Legislative Assembly was signalized by protests against the protectorate. At last the famous despatch of Sir John Young, the the Lord High Commissioner, in which he recommended the cession of five islands to Greece, and the retention as British colonies, for military posts, of Corfu and Paxo, determined the Government of Lord Derby to send a special High Commissioner to examine into the grievances of the Ionians. Mr. Gladstone accepted this office. His mission, which was marred not a little by the publication in the Daily News of Sir John Young's despatch, stolen from the library of the Colonial Office, was entirely unsuccessful. The Ionians chose to suppose that he came to announce their union with Greece, and received him enthusiastically; but when he undeceived them, and declared that the abolition of the protectorate was impracticable and impossible, they refused to listen to him, although he offered them a most liberal Constitution. Sir Bulwer Lytton, the Colonial Secretary at that time, took care to state emphatically that England could not renounce the obligations she had entered into to Europe; and the eloquent Mr. Gladstone was followed by a new High Commissioner, in the shape of Sir Henry Storks, who at once gave the Ionians to understand that their wishes would not be granted. Since that time nothing particular has occurred, unless it be the claim which, in the Legislative Assembly, Signor Dandolo based, for the right of the Ionians to unite themselves to Greece, upon Earl Russell's famous despatch to Turin, in which he laid down the doctrine that every people has the right to determine its own destinies, and ought not to be interfered with in the exercise of that right by other nations.

If the English Government has really resolved to give up the Ionian Islands a very great change must have come over its spirit within the last four years. We confess that we can yet hardly bring ourselves to believe that it has come to that determination. In the first place, it is not in its power to make this cession of its own will. England has been entrusted with the protectorate of the islands under certain conditions, and if she is no longer disposed to fulfil these conditions she must restore the trust to the Powers from whom she has received it. Russia and Prussia would probably acquiesce in the transfer of the islands to Greece, but we doubt whether Austria would; and Turkey would certainly, and with great reason, offer a very strong protest. The situation of Corfu and Paxo off the coast of Albania would furnish the greatest facilities for attempts to raise insurrection in the Turkish territory, and their possession by Greece would impose upon the Turkish Government a most costly system of precautions. On the other hand, we can scarcely believe that the English Government would abandon so important a fortress as Corfu, and Sir Bulwer Lytton has expressly declared that England cannot give up the other islands and retain it. Nor can we believe that Lord Palmerston would, in the present critical state of parties, risk the unpopularity which would inevitably be produced by a proposal to surrender any portion of British territory, and as such the Ionian Islands are popularly, and may, with truth, be practically regarded. It is not an English custom to cede any territory unless in exchange for something more important, and John Bull will assuredly be enraged at an innovation which he will rightly believe will furnish a dangerous precedent for the surrender of Gibraltar, Malta, and other military outposts, the possession of which he believes essential to the maintenance of his power and influence.

The Queen's Monument to Prince Albert.

The book* prepared "at the express desire and under the sanction of Her Majesty," and published on the first anniversary of the death of her husband, will be received in every English home with heartfelt sympathy, and abroad with respect and wonder. Surprise will be natural, for there is no precedent for the graceful and womanly act of Queen Victoria. If her sanction had been given to the collection of her husband's speeches and addresses, we must have admired her anxiety to rescue his works from the slightest chance of oblivion; but the memorial just published is much more than a book brought out under Royal patronage. The Queen virtually addresses her subjects, tells them of the worth of him for whom she mourns, and of how deeply she and they are indebted to the devotion, the patriotism, and the self-denial of Prince Albert.

As an orator the late Prince Consort had no opportunity of shining, and yet his speeches display so much individuality and thought, and so much lucidity of diction, that we can readily believe that if his lot had been cast in another position of life he would have become eminent for eloquence. His speeches and addresses are remarkable for their self-abnegation. It is evident he never for an instant sought to parade his learning and to impress his auditors with his intellectual greatness. When he spoke, his sole object was to further the cause he advocated, and when he advocated a cause his heart was in work. The public labours of the Prince—his speeches and addresses, his punctual attendance at commissions, his promoting of the Exhibition of 1851, and attention to the first stage of that of 1862—were light compared to those that devolved on him as the Consort of the Queen. In 1850 the Duke of Wellington proposed that the Prince should succeed him as Commander-in-Chief, and urgently pressed his suggestion. Much was to be said on general grounds in favour of the appointment, for undoubtedly the immediate command of the army ought to be nearly associated with the Executive. The proposed position was sufficiently lofty and influential even to tempt any one in the high station of the Prince, and there were plenty of precedents for such commands being conferred on those who had no military experience. The Prince firmly rejected the offer, and this after listening with much respect to the opinions of the Duke of Wellington, and considering the affair in all its bearings. He gave the grounds of his refusal in the following letter addressed to the Duke of Wellington:—

My dear Duke,—The Queen and myself have thoroughly considered your proposal to join the offices of Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General into one of a Chief of the Staff, with a view to facilitate the future assumption of the command of the army by myself. . . . The question whether it will be advisable that I should take the command of the army or not has been most anxiously weighed by me, and I have come to the conclusion that my decision ought entirely and solely to be guided by the consideration whether it would interfere with or assist my position of Consort of the Sovereign, and the performance of the duties which this position imposes upon me.

This position is a most peculiar and delicate one. While a female Sovereign has a great many disadvantages in comparison with a King, yet, if she is married, and her husband understands and does his duty, her position, on the other hand, has many compensating advantages, and, in the long run, will be found even to be stronger than that of a male Sovereign. But this requires that the husband should entirely sink his own individual existence in that of his wife—that he should aim at no power by himself, or for himself—should shun all ostentation—assume no separate responsibility before the public—but make his position entirely a part of hers—fill up every gap which as a woman she would naturally leave in the exercise of her regal functions—continually and anxiously watch every part of the public business, in order to be able to advise and assist her at any moment in any of the multifarious and difficult questions or duties brought before her, sometimes international, sometimes political, or social, or personal. As the natural head of her family, superintendent of her household, manager of her private affairs, sole confidential adviser in politics, and only assistant in her communications with the officers of the Government, he is besides the husband of the Queen, the tutor of the Royal children, the private secretary of the Sovereign, and her permanent Minister.

How far would it be consistent with this position to undertake the management and administration of a most important branch of the public service, and the individual responsibility attaching to it—becoming an executive officer of the Crown, receiving the Queen's commands through her Secretaries of State, &c.? I feel sure that, having undertaken the responsibility, I should not be satisfied to leave the business and real work in the hands of another (the Chief of the Staff), but should feel it my duty to look to them myself. But while I should in this manner perform duties which, I am sure, every able general officer who has gained experience in the field would be able to perform better than myself, who have not had the advantage of such experience, most important duties connected with the welfare of the Sovereign would be left unperformed, which nobody could perform but myself. I am afraid, therefore, that I must discard the tempting idea of being placed in command of the British army.

Many of the duties undertaken by the Prince were self-imposed, but not less beneficial to the Sovereign and the country. With this incessant occupation, we can understand the Queen's anxiety for his health, and that in 1860 she should have written to Earl Granville, "without the knowledge of the Prince, expressing her earnest hope that he (Lord Granville) would do all that in him lay to prevent the responsibility and labour of conducting the undertaking being thrown in any way on His Royal Highness. The Queen felt deeply the necessity for averting any addition to the heavy work already entailed on the Prince by the assistance and support (every day more needful to her) which he gave her in the transaction of all public business; and Her Majesty was convinced that he could not again undertake the labour he had gone through in conducting the first Exhibition to its successful termination without injury to that health which was not only most precious to herself and his family, but to the country, and even to the world."

We will now quote a passage in itself affecting, but which is peculiarly touching as being dictated by the Queen of England:—

In allowing this memorandum of the Prince to be published, the Queen is also actuated by another motive in addition to those which have already been mentioned. It affords Her Majesty a fitting opportunity for expressing, in the most clear and ample manner, that which for many years she has desired to express. During the Prince's life the Queen often longed to make known to the world the ever-present, watchful, faithful, invaluable aid which she received from the Prince Consort in the conduct of the public business. Her Majesty could hardly endure even then to be silent on this subject and not to declare how much her reign owed to him. And now the Queen can no longer refrain from uttering what she has so long felt, and from proclaiming the irreparable loss to the public service, as well as to herself and to her family, which the Prince's death has occasioned. The position of Her Majesty, for many years accustomed to this loving aid and now suddenly bereft of it, can with difficulty be imagined to the full extent of its heaviness and its sadness. Desolate and sombre, as the Queen most deeply feels, lies the way before her:—a path, however, of duty and of labour, which relying on the loyal attachment and sympathy of her people, she will with God's blessing, strive to pursue; but where she fears her faltering steps will often show they lack the tender and affectionate support which, on all occasions, Her Majesty was wont to receive from her beloved husband, the Prince.

No other monarch could thus address his or her people. Whilst we condole with her heavy affliction and sadness of heart, it is pleasant to learn how Her Majesty depends "on the loyal attachment and sympathy of her people," for those she has most abundantly. Very memorable, too, is the announcement by the Queen that "she fears her faltering steps will often show they lack" their former support. The Queen, by this book, intended to honour the memory of Prince Albert, and she has done so; but at the same time, by her lively gratitude, by the tender confession of the desolation of her widowhood, and by her Christian meekness, she has for ever associated her own name with this enduring monument to the worth of her husband.

The Chair of St. Augustine.

On Friday last, Charles Thomas Longley, Doctor of Divinity, and lately Archbishop of York, was inducted into the Primacy of All England. The place and the ceremony were calculated to remind the spectator of the conservative nature of our institutions, and of the peculiarity of our national character, as well as to impress him with a feeling of solemnity.

Without desiring to enter into an architectural controversy, or to disparage the work of Sir Christopher Wren—which, if it were not so blocked up with warehouses, would be more appreciated—we cannot refrain from remarking that St. Paul's is less suggestive and imposing than Canterbury Cathedral. The former does not carry the mind back to the past, and seems even newer than it is, whilst the latter vividly recalls the past, and seems older than it is. The one is Wren's masterpiece, the other is a monument of national piety. Canterbury Cathedral was first built of wood on the site of the palace of King Ethelbert. On two occasions it was destroyed by fire, and frequently despoiled and injured by the Danes. But having fixed upon Canterbury as the place for their national cathedral, with true insular resolution, or, perhaps we should say, obstinacy, our ancestors cared not for the opposition, but as soon as fire or sword had destroyed their work commenced rebuilding. The Norman Lanfranc rebuilt the cathedral with Caen stone, and after his time it was repeatedly enlarged and enriched. The Puritans, in their zeal for destruction, considerably damaged the building; but, fortunately for England, the Puritan domination was cut short, or the national Church, and the hereditary freedom of Englishmen, as well as Canterbury Cathedral, would have been utterly destroyed. Let any one visit the shrine of the staunch and much-abused Saint à Beckett, and he will be conscious of the antiquity of the building, and that the venerable pile would declare its great age and historical associations if its history were forgotten. In St. Paul's we may be critical—in Canterbury Cathedral the true artist feels that criticism would be little-minded, almost irreverent.

The fact of Dr. Longley being the ninety-second Archbishop of Canterbury is even more significant of our conservatism than the endurance of the Cathedral of the Metropolitan See. The English Church is truly a reformed and Protestant church; but our ancestors, though martyrs for the cause, did not suffer their zeal to outrun discretion, or mistake destruction for reformation. In severing the English Church from the Roman communion, no attempt was made to confound the good with the evil. The authority of the Bishop of Rome, as the supreme head of all Christian churches, was denied; and certain doctrinal errors, and certain practices unauthorized by the Scriptures, were corrected; but these things being done, the Anglican Church was not cut off from communion with the past; on the contrary, the validity of the Romish ordination was insisted on; so that those who attached any value to the Apostolic Succession would perceive that the Bishops of the Church of England are, in that respect, as venerable as the Roman Catholic Hierarchy. The Book of Common Prayer is modelled on the prayers that were in use when the English Church was a branch of the Roman Catholic Church. The ecclesiastical arrangements were as little disturbed as possible. Canterbury had been the Metropolitan See when the chief bishop of our Church owed allegiance to the Sovereign Pontiff, and it continued so when the Sovereign of England became the temporal head of the Church; and when, if it had not been for our conservatism, it might have seemed reasonable to have made St. Paul's or Westminster Abbey the cathedral associated with the office of Primate of All England. But the Church of England was not founded in the reign of Henry VIII. At that era its reformation commenced; but its foundation dates back to the times of the Heptarchy, and Dr. Longley is the successor of St. à Beckett, and, we may say without any great license, of St. Augustine.

The ceremony of induction was free from anything approaching to theatrical display. It was as simple as the circumstances would admit, and if any fault could be charged to it, we might think it would be the want of magnificence in the enthronization of such an important personage as the Primate of All England. The grandeur of the scene depended solely upon its suitableness; and yet, all who witnessed it were impressed with it, and, perhaps, on account of its rigid simplicity. A procession was formed of Schoolmasters, King's Scholars, Grammar Master of Choristers, Choristers, Lay Clerks, Minor Canons, and others. Besides the members of the Cathedral body, there were several hundred clergymen. Another procession was formed of the Archbishop, the Bishops of London, Oxford, Rochester, and Lincoln, all of whom hold offices connected with the Primacy, and to these were added the Dean and Canons. There was nothing extra-ecclesiastical about the assembly.

The introductory music consisted of the 121st and 122nd Psalms, and the Hallelujah Chorus; the instrumental accompaniment to the voice of the choristers being the organ. The morning service then commenced, and at the end of the lesson the Archbishop was conducted to the throne, and the Archdeacon's Deputy read the form of induction. This part of the ceremony was followed by an anthem and the Litany. Then the Archbishop was installed in what is called the Chair of St. Augustine, and again the Archdeacon's Deputy read the form of induction; and after this His Grace was led to the Dean's stall, and a shorter form of induction, or rather recognition, was recited. The Te Deum was sung, a prayer was read, the Archbishop pronounced the Benediction, and the service was over. After this the Archbishop went to the Chapter House, where he took the oath of office and allegiance, and received the usual promise of obedience from the cathedral clergy. Finally a minute or "act" of the proceedings was produced, signed, and attested by a public notary. We do not know what part of the ceremonial could have been more free from pomp than it was, still it was symbolic of the relation of the Church and State in England. The two, so nearly united, have separate and distinct functions, and the enthronization of the Primate was as purely an ecclesiastical celebration as the recognition of an Independent minister by his congregation.

The appointment of Archbishop Longley has given general satisfaction. At the present moment it is very desirable that the Primate should be a man of moderate views, and yet not a member of that Broad Church party which is too ready to sacrifice principles for what are supposed to be the exigencies of a National Church. Dr. Longley is tolerant, but he is a Churchman, and will not, we may be assured, sympathize with the semi-Romanism of the Puseyites, or with the Low Churchism that, equally to the detriment of the Establishment and of Dissent, apes the manners and customs of Nonconformity. Neither have we any reason to doubt that His Grace, whilst countenancing free inquiry and the free expression of opinion, will not tolerate episcopal and clerical scepticism as to the authority of the Scriptures. A bishop or clergyman may, and is bound, to study the meaning of Scripture, and this is what is meant by the right of free inquiry, but he is not justified in casting doubts upon the authority of Scripture. He holds office upon the express understanding that he believes in the plenary inspiration of the Bible. It must not be gathered from these remarks that we are anxious about the safety of the Church of England. An institution that has lasted so long and sustained so many assaults is not likely to be destroyed because some of her ministers are infected with that curious species of infidelity which professes the profoundest veneration for the religion of the Bible, whilst it seeks to discredit the authority of the Bible.

Reviews.

A RETROSPECT.*

The war in Kansas in 1857-8, and the John Brown raid into Virginia in 1859, should have warned all who loved the Union that if it was to be preserved, it could only be by the resolution of a majority at the North to suppress the further agitation of the slavery question, and to deal with all matters in which the interests of the two sections came into conflict in a spirit of moderation, fairness, and compromise. If the South were to be taxed enormously for the benefit of Northern merchants and manufacturers, to be insulted in the most violent language by Northern newspapers, stump orators, and self-styled statesmen, and at the same time to be excluded from the common territories, and to be liable to actual invasion by Northern filibusters, supported by the sympathy of a large portion of the Northern people, and of some of the New England Governments, why should she remain in the Union? How could she continue to act in concert with confederates who made a boast of plundering, affronting, invading her, and denying her the rights secured to her by the Federal Constitution? It was clear that only prudence and moderation of the highest kind in the Congress which met in December 1859, and in the Presidential election of 1860, could avert a civil war which must inevitably end in final and irrevocable separation. But nothing was further from the thoughts of the dominant faction than anything like concession. They conceived that victory was within their grasp; that perseverance would enable them not merely to seize and keep power at Washington, and the spoils of power throughout the Union, but to reduce the South to a condition of political depression from which she would never recover, and to ensure to a mere sectional majority a permanent ascendancy over the whole area of the United States. Few of them believed in secession. The Abolitionist wing of the Republican party, which had for years denounced the Union as a league with death and a covenant with hell, professed to desire nothing better than its disruption, and to fear only that, as their organ expressed it, the South could not be kicked out of the Union. They fully endorsed the emphatic words of one who has since become a staunch Unionist:—

Et I'd my way I hid rather
We should go to work an' part,—
They take one way, we take t'other,— Guess it would n't break my heart;
Man had ought' to put asunder
Them that God has noways joined;
An' I should n't gretly wonder
Ef there's thousands o' my mind.

The mass of the Republicans, who as yet did not profess Abolitionist doctrines, affected to depreciate at once the value, the spirit, and the power of the South; they refused to believe that she was necessary to the prosperity of the North; that she would dare to break away from it; or that if she did she could maintain her resolution for three months. They pretended, too, to speak contemptuously of the Union. "Let it slide," said one of their leaders, while Mr. Seward, who had long preached an irrepressible conflict between the two sections, laboured hard for the fulfilment of his own prediction.

Congress met, and the conflict began. The post of Speaker in America is of much greater power, though of less dignity than in England, and the Republican majority in the House of Representatives were determined to place in that office one of the most violent and least respected of their number. Mr. Sherman was among those who had endorsed Helper's book, a declaration of war to the knife on the men and institutions of the South. His election would have been an intolerable insult, a direct challenge to civil war. Yet it was vehemently pressed by his party, and for two months the organization of the House was delayed in consequence; for, be it remembered, an absolute majority of votes is requisite to a choice. At last Mr. Sherman was withdrawn, and another Republican, less deeply compromised, elected in his stead.

While the Republicans showed themselves thus resolute and aggressive, their opponents were weakened by a division of opinion on the territorial question. Mr. Douglas, who might be considered the leading spirit of the Democratic party, brought up the doctrine of "squatter sovereignty," which would have given to the earliest inhabitants of an unsettled region, on its organization as a Territory, the right to admit or exclude slavery; a right which, according to the orthodox Democratic doctrine, could only be exercised at the time of the acceptance of its constitution as a State. The point in dispute was more important than it seemed; at all events, it sufficed to break up and disorganize the Democratic party. The majority of the Northern Democrats adhered to Douglas, whose doctrines were generally repudiated at the South. The consequences were seen when the Democratic convention met at Charleston, and, by a vote of 165 to 138, refused to affirm the Southern proposition, that neither Congress, nor the Territorial Legislatures which derive their authority from Congress, have any right to exclude from the Territories the citizens of any of the United States, or their property of any kind. On this refusal, the delegates of the cotton States seceded, and they were subsequently followed by the Border slave States-delegations, excepting that of Missouri. The Northern Democrats, adjourning to Baltimore, nominated Douglas; the Southerners, in the same city, selected Breckenridge as their candidate. Bell was nominated by the remnant of the Whigs; Lincoln by the Republicans. Douglas received many Southern votes, and in many States a "fusion vote" was given for electors taken from the three anti-Republican tickets. Giving each of the three his share of this vote, it appears that the popular vote was:—

For Lincoln	1,858,200
„ Douglas	1,276,780
„ Breckenridge	812,500
„ Bell	735,504

Had the Presidential election been a direct one, and yet required, as most American elections do, an absolute majority, Lincoln would not have been chosen. But the division of his adversaries gave him every Northern vote but three (from New Jersey) in the Electoral Colleges, and he was chosen by 180 to 123. The Legislature of South Carolina called a State Convention, by whose act, on the 20th of December, 1860, the Palmetto States ceased to belong to the Union. Five States followed before the end of January 1861; Mississippi on the 9th, Alabama on the 11th, Florida on the 11th, Georgia on the 20th, Louisiana on the 26th. The United States' forts in these States, except those in Charleston Harbour, and Fort Pickens, near Pensacola, were occupied by the State troops. A convention of delegates assembled at Montgomery on the 4th of February, to frame a Constitution for the Southern Confederacy; and they were joined by delegates from Texas, which seceded on the 1st of February. The Provisional Government was chosen on the 9th of February and inaugurated on the 18th.

Meantime the House of Representatives at Washington had passed resolutions in favour of coercion; and the Legislature of Virginia had convoked a peace convention in the Federal capital, which broke up without accomplishing anything. On the 30th of December Major Anderson moved from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumter. Mr. Buchanan refused to order him back, and Mr. Floyd, Secretary at War, thereupon resigned, declaring that the change violated pledges given to South Carolina. On the 9th of January, Mr. Buchanan attempted to reinforce Fort Sumter, in Charleston harbour, and the Star of the West, which carried the troops and provisions, was driven off by the Carolinian batteries. On this Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, Secretary of the Interior, resigned. On the 4th of February a Convention was chosen in Virginia, which contained an anti-Secession majority. North Carolina and Tennessee decided not to call Conventions. Arkansas, however, was lost to the Federal Government before Mr. Lincoln came into power, though she was not admitted into the Confederacy until the 18th of May.

Terrified by an imaginary danger of assassination, Mr. Lincoln hurried in disguise to Washington, and went through the ceremony of inauguration, surrounded by cavalry and infantry—a most unusual proceeding in America. He spoke doubtfully and moderately; talked of “causing the laws to be executed,” promised to “occupy” the forts belonging to the United States, but professed an intention to abstain from armed violence, beyond what might be necessary for these purposes. The Confederate Government expected and prepared for war, but did its utmost to preserve peace. It sent commissioners to Washington to negotiate the withdrawal of Federal garrisons, and the settlement of all claims with regard to public property. Mr. Seward, Lincoln's Secretary of State, declined to receive them officially, but gave them verbal assurances that he was disposed to peace, and that at all events nothing should be changed in the military status of the Federal power in the South. Judge Campbell, of the Supreme Court, conducted these verbal negotiations. Meantime debates went on in the Cabinet as to the practicability of reinforcing Fort Sumter. Mr. Pollard says that the point was decided in the negative, and that it was determined only to make a feint of reinforcement, in order to provoke a collision. We believe otherwise. However, an expedition was secretly prepared and despatched to Charleston. Judge Campbell heard of it, and protested; Mr. Seward having personally promised him that the fort should be at once evacuated. Mr. Seward answered: “Faith as to Sumter fully kept; wait and see.” Meantime the Northern, especially the New England States, were urgent for war, and offering the Government the means of waging it. The Confederates, on their side, with the aid of Southern-born officers, who were resigning their commands in the Federal army, were organizing their forces and making ready for self-defence. On the 8th of April the expedition destined for Fort Sumter—three men-of-war, three steam transports, and above 1000 men—had sailed. The Federal Government threw off the mask, and declared that they would “provision” the fort “peaceably, if they could, forcibly if they must.” General Beauregard, commanding for the Confederate States at Charleston, telegraphed to Montgomery for orders, and received them. The fort was summoned, and refused to surrender. The bombardment began early in the morning of the 12th. It surrendered on the 13th; and on the 14th Mr. Lincoln issued his proclamation of war, calling out 75,000 men to disperse certain “combinations,” in the seven cotton States, and repossess the forts and property seized from the Union. In a word, he, as has been aptly said, read the Riot Act to seven sovereign States. The North was roused to frenzy; even the Democrats, who had publicly and privately declared that there could, would, and should be no war, being as warlike as the Abolitionists themselves—nay, proving themselves much more ready to fight in person than the Abolitionists have ever been.

The consequences of the proclamation were at first disastrous for the North. On the 17th Virginia seceded; on the 6th of May Tennessee followed her example; on the 18th Arkansas entered the Confederacy, and on the 21st North Carolina passed her secession ordinance. Kentucky and Missouri peremptorily refused to assist in carrying out “the wicked purpose of subduing their sister Southern States;” and Maryland, but that her Governor was secretly pledged to Lincoln, seemed to intend to follow the same course. The passage of the Yankee troops through Baltimore was resisted by force, and blood was shed. In St. Louis, Missouri, similar collisions took place. On the 19th of April Mr. Lincoln at once declared the Southerners belligerents and pirates; he proclaimed the blockade of their ports, and he threatened their privateers with the penalties of piracy. On the same day Harper's Ferry was evacuated and partially destroyed; on the 20th the Norfolk Navy-yard shared the same fate. Meantime the organization of the Confederate forces proceeded rapidly. A bill was passed authorizing the President to accept the services of 100,000 volunteers for twelve months. On the 20th of May the Government was transferred from Montgomery, Alabama, to Richmond, Va. The Federal forces were collecting in and around Washington. Maryland was occupied by a force of 30,000 men, the Habeas Corpus was suspended, and military tyranny inaugurated.

War actually began on the 24th of May, when a Federal corps of 8000 men crossed the Potomac and occupied Alexandria, the Confederates falling back on Manassas. Here the first blood was shed. Colonel Ellsworth, of New York, entered an hotel to bear down a secession flag, and was shot dead by Mr. Jackson, the proprietor, who was killed in his turn. To an Englishman, it seems that Ellsworth was a fool, and Jackson little better. The town had not surrendered, and Jackson had therefore a technical right to kill the invader on his own threshold; but in civilized warfare it is considered that citizens not enlisted in the army should remain quiet in the presence of an overwhelming force, where resistance can only provoke the enemy to outrage. However, the North made a hero of Ellsworth, and called Jackson an assassin; the South naturally will always pay a high respect to the memory of the first Southerner who had fallen in defence of his home.

On the 10th of June the first battle took place. A Confederate force of about 1800 men, under Magruder, entrenched at Bethel, were attacked by about 3500 Federals. The assailants were repulsed, losing about 130 killed and wounded. The next engagement ended adversely for the South; the insufficient forces of General Garnet, in Western Virginia, being beaten on the 5th of July at Rich Mountain, and driven back on Monterey, their commander himself being killed. This was the first exploit of General McClellan.

On the 4th of July the Northern Congress met, to receive Mr. Lincoln's demand for 400,000 men and $400,000,000. Both demands were agreed to; and a bill was introduced to confiscate the property of rebels.

On the 18th of July took place the “artillery duel” of Bull Run, in which the Federals were worsted. On the 21st was fought the great battle of Manassas, a detailed account of which, taken from this work, was published in last week's INDEX. The result was the ruin of Generals Scott and McDowell, and the appointment of McClellan to the supreme command. That general busied himself energetically in the work of creating an army out of an undisciplined mob and a beaten militia, and for some time no active operations took place in Eastern Virginia. The chief interest of the war was transferred to the West.

LETTER FROM THE SOUTH.

ON THE EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVES, AND THE DANGERS THAT THREATEN THE SOUTH.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—Your impression of the 7th of August, by some of the many accidents to which our communications with Europe is subject, did not reach me until quite recently. In this number you treat editorially, under the appropriate heading of “The Last Card of the North,” the prospect of an emancipation decree being launched against the South. The article is marked by a clear perception of the true condition of both sections which I had thought impossible in a foreign journal, and the event has thus far verified your predictions, even to the political effects of such a measure in the North itself, as proved by the elections just held. But while I concur fully with the article so far as it goes, I do not think that you have exhausted the subject, or, indeed that you have touched what in my opinion at least, is the most important feature of it. What I should wish to impress upon your European readers and to keep constantly before the public mind abroad, is that this so-called Emancipation threatens our prosperity, not more than it does that of Europe, and that no blow can fall on us which does not equally fall on you.

The genius of modern civilization is commerce. Past ages have marched in their career of progress under different banners and actuated by different impulses. Religion, monarchical ambition, the mere love of adventure, or other influences, more or less distinguishable and well defined, have directed the thoughts of bygone generations of men and coloured their history. In our day commerce sits supreme at the council board of nations, declares wars, and dictates treaties of peace, and inspires their policy both in peace and war. It is for a commercial monopoly that the Northern States of this Continent have attempted the subjugation of their late political co-partners. It is for a commercial policy that they persevere in the attempt. Now, what is this modern commerce which has become the prevailing spirit of nineteenth century civilization, which has become more potent than the kings and emperors of olden times? It took its birth in the discovery of the New World, and it finds its life and growth exclusively in commodities which before that discovery were either wholly unknown or were the rare luxury of a few, but which now are the common necessities of all civilized men. Of these commodities the most important, because the most universally used, is cotton. Imagine the New World to be blotted out from the map, so far as its productiveness or commercial importance is concerned, the shock to commerce, and, therefore, to civilization, would be as great as that from its discovery, but instead of a life-giving, it would be a death-dealing shock. Scarcely less would be the disaster, arising from the permanent cessation of the supply of cotton from the Southern States. Whence, ransacking the whole inhabited globe, could you obtain the four millions of bales to make up the deficiency? or, granting that the stimulus of a great necessity would in time raise up other supplies, how many years must elapse before the new supplies can compensate for those lost? Meanwhile, what would become of the industry which in every country of Europe rests and depends on the basis of Southern cotton? Again, to produce these four millions of bales, a vast amount of capital and labour must be diverted from other pursuits which now feed the great arteries of commerce, and to compensate one loss, another equally as great must be sustained. Experience as well as common sense teach us that any essential change in the current of trade displaces the commercial centres. As Venice ceased to be an emporium when the passage around the Cape of Good Hope was found, so Liverpool would cease to be your great cotton port, when America ceases to be the chief producer. A ruin so extensive, that the imagination fails to compass it, must ensue before out of the fragments a new structure can arise.

The supply of Southern cotton now depends on the regular and well-directed labour of four millions of Africans. I will not prejudice your readers against me by any defence of the system which regulates and directs this labour; but, believing that all things are ordained by an All-wise Providence, have I not the right to infer that Providence, in making such great and universal interests to depend upon this system, warns us not to meddle with it rashly or with unskilled hands. The course of all true progress is slow and gradual, and mankind has suffered more from radical and self-conceited reformers than from the obstinate persistence in time-honoured abuses. We go quite fast enough in this century of ours not to require any accelerating impetus. The problem how two widely differing races can live together in unity and equality is not yet solved. The relative position of different races in the scale of intellectual development is itself a problem. Is the civilized world prepared to risk its vital interests upon a doubtful experiment? Slavery doubtless has many and grievous imperfections; but what earthly institution has them not? I hold it as incontestible that the sudden destruction of any long-established system, whether inherently good or bad, is a remedy far more dangerous than the evil it intends to cure. It is an infallible method of removing a disease to kill the patient; but what would be thought of the physician who advised it? Before, then, vowing the destruction of our social system, would it not be wise to suggest another to take its place? Would it not also be well to ascertain first whether the sum of human misery would be increased or diminished thereby?

You in Europe—and we of the South are largely to blame for your error—have too exclusively considered slavery as merely a question of property. I believe Mr. Davis was the first of our public men who took a wiser and more correct view. In one of his last speeches in the United States Senate he said that slavery was not so much a question of property as a plan of civil Government. It seems to me clear that if the negro would work for wages in money as faithfully as he now does for wages in kind, the community of which he forms a part, and the world at large, would lose nothing by eman-icipation. Individuals, freeing their slaves while their neighbours retain theirs, lose the capitalized value of their slaves' labour; but if all alike free them, nobody loses, since the cost of slave labour is confessedly far above the minimum of the cost of agricultural labour in every other country. But destroy this plan of civil Government for the negro, only a few generations removed from Africa, and what other plan has as yet been devised to make him industrious, provident, self-governing? And had he all these qualities, what plan can you devise to protect him against the inevitable consequences of collision with the stronger, more numerous, and haughtier master race? Will the negro, unassisted and unprotected, be able to compete with, nay, to live by the side of, the white man? You in Europe have been so long taught to regard the master only as a cruel oppressor and a monster of wickedness, that you may find it different to regard him as the natural protector of the slave, yet even the most bigotedly prejudiced against us might well hesitate on reflection, whether it was better for the African to be transferred from the power of a man who as at least a strong self-interest in his welfare, and who belongs to the higher and more cultivated classes of society, to the tender mercy of the roughest and rudest of the community, who look upon him as a hated rival, and who have no other interest than his extermination.

Except through the total annihilation of the Southern people, and the partition of their soil among the Northern invaders, the disaster which I foreshadow cannot come to pass in its worst and most fatal form. But in a less degree it is now occurring, and every day of the war adds to the danger which threatens the South, and, through the South, the commerce of the world. The Emancipation decree, which you predicted in August, has since been launched. To it I attach no importance whatever. It was a silly attempt to enlist European sympathies, and it has only resulted in drawing upon the imbecile executive the condemnation of his own people. Whatever the Decree bids the Federal soldiery do after the 1st of January, was always done by them before the Decree was issued, and they cannot possibly do more. Wherever our invaders have gained a temporary foothold they have attempted to seduce our servants by promises and acts characteristic of themselves. They have endeavoured to bribe them as household spies, they have cajoled them with visions of a lazy freedom, and officers and men have lived publicly with Mulatto women. There are people in England who may call this instilling into the slaves a proper thirst for liberty. Viewing it as a Christian, and judging the tree by its fruits, I call it demoralization and the perdition of body and soul. It must have caused much surprise and shocked many preconceived opinions, that these unremitting and systematized efforts have produced so little results, that the slaves, as a class, have not embraced the unprecedented opportunity, and that disloyalty and treachery have been the rare exception, whilst tried fidelity has been the rule. So it will always be with the mass of our servants, and everywhere where the master's influence is not obliterated by long absence and by the repeated whips of the unscrupulous tempter. You speak of the probability of partial outbreaks along the Mississippi River, and your observation is just, less, however, for the reasons you assign than from geographical causes. On the Mississippi, for a thousand miles, and on its many tributaries for perhaps an equal distance, the plantations are close to the banks, and the residences of the negroes are within a quarter of a mile from the stream. An impenetrable back swamp skirts the plantations in the rear. The width of this swamp, part of the year inundated, averages about fifty miles, with only occasional "bluffs" at long intervals, which are accessible to the river. The narrowest space between the swamp and the river is over thirty, and the widest over one hundred and thirty miles. Thus, the most productive cotton region of the South, resembles a chain of long narrow islands from which there is no, or at least very circuitous, communication with the interior. Thus cut off, and everywhere accessible to the enemy's boats, it is virtually abandoned for the cultivation of cotton. The mass of the negroes have been left to subsist on the grain and meat they can raise, their owners having neither employment nor the means of subsistence for them elsewhere. The negro would indeed be more than human, he would show himself more capable of self-government than any other race of men, if thus left to himself he could for ever resist the wily suggestions which he cannot avoid. If in any other country an enemy had equal facilities for sowing dissatisfaction and sedition among the working classes, the effect in course of time cannot be doubtful. Besides, I know the negroes well, I have lived among them from a child, and have had the direction of their labour, and the charge of their welfare ever since my earliest manhood. The very qualities which bespeak him the servant of the white man, his docility to the teachings of the white man, his instinct of obedience to the superior race, make him as ready an instrument in the white man's hands for evil as for good. Not that he can be trained as a soldier against his former master, no more than his ethnical superior the Sepoy, as you justly remark, but he can be trained to steal, to plunder, and in individual instances to murder. Once he has acquired these habits, it was easier to tame the savage from Africa than to redeem this semi-civilized barbarian.

The demoralization of one-fifth, or one-half of our negro population, would not advance the North one step towards our subjugation. At worst, and as a last alternative, we might cause its own-chosen weapon to recoil fearfully against the hand that attempts its use. But such a demoralization would inflict a fatal blow on our prosperity, and every bale of cotton we produce the less, renders the world so much poorer. Already the waste of property and the individual ruin is on a frightful scale. Vast tracts of fertile lands will soon return to the state of primitive wilderness, leaving the owners without the means of redeeming them again. Let the war progress for a year or two longer, and the destruction from which we now might recover within a reasonable period of repose, will be irreparable for a generation, perhaps for ever. The South has already produced her largest crops. Every day of the war impairs more her productiveness, and this permanently impoverishes commerce. It is not now a question of independence or subjugation, it is a question whether the source of inexhaustible wealth, not to us alone, but to the world at large, shall or shall not be permanently dried up.

Such are a few of the reflections hastily thrown together, for which I ask the aid of your abler pen to impress them upon the consideration of your readers. They are the result of life-long experience, and some thought both before and since this cruel war, upon a problem which still defies human wisdom to solve.

I am very respectfully yours, &c.,

AN OLD PLANTER.

Mobile, November 7.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S MESSAGE TO THE UNITED STATES' CONGRESS.

After a few introductory remarks, Mr. Lincoln discusses the state of foreign relations:—

If the condition of our relations with other nations is less gratifying than it has usually been at former periods, it is certainly more satisfactory than a nation so unhappily distressed as we are might reasonably have apprehended. In the month of June last there were some grounds to expect that the maritime powers, which, at the beginning of our domestic difficulties so unanimously and unnecessarily, as we think, recognised the insurgents as a belligerent, would soon recede from that position, which has proved only less injurious to themselves than to our own country; but the temporary reverses which afterwards befel the national arms, and which were exaggerated by our own disloyal children abroad, have hitherto delayed that act of simple justice. The civil war, which has so radically changed for the moment the occupation and habits of the American people, has necessarily disturbed the social condition, and affected very deeply the prosperity of the nations with which we have carried on a commerce that has been steadily increasing throughout a period of half a century. It has at the same time excited political ambitions and apprehensions, which have produced a profound agitation throughout the civilized world. In this unusual agitation we have forbore from taking any part in any controversy between foreign States and between parties or factions in such States. We have attempted no propagandism and acknowledged no revolution, but we have left to every nation the exclusive conduct and management of its own affairs. Our struggle has been, of course, contemplated by foreign nations with reference less to its own merits than to its supposed and often exaggerated effects, and the consequences resulting to those nations themselves. Nevertheless, complaint on the part of this government, even if it were just, would certainly be unwise.

The treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade has been put into operation with a good prospect of complete success. It is an occasion of special pleasure to acknowledge that the execution of it, on the part of her Majesty's government, has been marked with a jealous respect for the authority of the United States and the rights of their moral and loyal citizens.

A blockade of 3,000 miles of sea coast could not be established and vigorously enforced in a season of great commercial activity like the present without committing occasional mistakes, and inflicting unintentional injuries upon foreign nations and their subjects. A civil war occurring in a country where foreigners reside and carry on trade under treaty stipulations is necessarily fruitful of the complaints of the violation of neutral rights. All such collisions tend to excite misapprehensions, and possibly to produce mutual reclamation between nations which have a common interest in preserving peace and friendship. In clear cases of these kinds I have, so far as possible, heard and redressed complaints which have been presented by friendly powers. There is, however, a large and augmenting number of doubtful cases, upon which the government is unable to agree with the governments whose protection is demanded by the claimants. There are, moreover, many cases, in which the United States or their citizens suffer wrongs from the naval or military authorities of foreign nations, which the government of these States are not at once prepared to redress. I have proposed to some of the foreign States thus interested mutual conventions to examine and adjust such complaints. This proposition has been made especially to Great Britain, to France, to Spain, and to Prussia. In each case it has been kindly received, but has not been formally adopted. I deem it my duty to recommend an appropriation in behalf of the owners of the Norwegian barque Admiral P. Fordehs Riola, which vessel was in May, 1861, prevented by the commander of the blockading force off Charleston from leaving that port with cargo, notwithstanding a similar privilege had shortly before been granted to an English vessel. I have directed the Secretary of State to cause the papers in the case to be communicated to the proper committees. Applications have been made to me by many free Americans of African descent to favour their emigration, with a view to such colonisation as was contemplated in recent acts of Congress; other parties at home and abroad, some from interested motives, others from patriotic considerations, and still others influenced by philanthropic sentiments, have suggested similar measures, while, on the other hand, several of the Spanish American Republics have protested against the sending of such colonies to their respective territories. Under these circumstances I have declined to move any such colony to any State without obtaining the consent of the government, without an agreement on its part to receive and protect such emigrants in all their rights of freemen, and I have at the same time offered to the several States situated in the tropics, or having colonies there, to negotiate with them, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, to favour the voluntary emigration of persons of that class to their respective territories upon conditions which shall be equal, just, and humane. Liberia and Hayti are as yet the only countries to which colonists of African descent from here could go with certainty of being received and adopted as citizens, and I regret to say that such persons contemplating colonisation do not seem so willing to emigrate to these countries as to some others, nor as willing, I think, as their interests demand. I believe, however, the opinion among them in this respect is improving, and that ere long there will be an augmented and considerable emigration to both these countries from the United States.

Reference is then made to various treaties made within that year, and to the prospects for the Atlantic and Pacific telegraphs. With respect to the Territories of the United States, Mr. Lincoln says, that with unimportant exceptions, they have been undisturbed by the war, and that they are so prosperous as soon to be in a condition to be recognized as States. He recommends the development of the mineral resources of the territories.

In reference to finances, he observes:—

The vast expenditure incident to the military and naval operations required for the suppression of the rebellion have hitherto been met with a promptitude and certainty unusual in similar circumstances, and the public credit has been fully maintained. The continuance of the war, however, and the increased disbursements made necessary by the augmented forces now in the field, demand your best reflections as to the best mode of providing the necessary revenues without injury to business, and with the least possible burdens upon labour. The suspension of specie payments by the banks soon after the commencement of your last session made large issues of United States' notes unavoidable. In no other way could the payment of the troops, and the satisfaction of other just demands, be so economically or so well provided for. The judicious legislation of Congress securing the receivability of these notes for loans and internal duties, and making them a "legal tender" for other debts, has made them universal currency, and has satisfied, partially at least, and for the time, the long felt want of a uniform circulating medium, saving thereby to the people immense sums in discounts and exchanges. A return to specie payments, however, at the earliest period compatible with due regard to all interests, should ever be kept in view. Fluctuations in the value of currency are always injurious, and to reduce these fluctuations to the lowest possible point will always be a leading purpose in wise legislation. Convertibility, prompt and certain convertibility, into coin, is generally acknowledged to be the best and surest against them, and it is extremely doubtful whether a circulation of United States' notes, payable in coin, and sufficiently large for the wants of the people, can be permanently, usefully, and safely maintained. Is there, then, any other mode in which the necessary provision for the public wants can be made, and the great advantages of a safe and uniform currency secured?

I know of none which promises so certain results, and at the same time so unobjectionable, as the organization of banking associations under a general act of Congress, well guarded in its provisions. To such associations the Government might furnish circulating notes on the security of the United States' bonds deposited in the Treasury. These notes, prepared under the supervision of proper officers, being uniform in appearance and security, and convertible always into coin, would at once protect labour against the evils of a vicious currency, and facilitate commerce by cheap and safe exchanges. A moderate reservation from the interest on the bonds would compensate the United States for the preparation and distribution of the notes, and a general supervision of the system, and would lighten the burden of that part of the public debt employed as securities. The public credit, moreover, would be greatly improved, and the negotiations of new loans greatly facilitated by the steady market demand for government bonds, which the adoption of the proposed system would effect.

It is an additional recommendation of the measure, of considerable weight in my judgment, that it would reconcile, as far as possible, all existing interests, by the opportunity offered to existing institutions to re-organise under the act, substituting only the secured uniform national circulation for the local and various circulations, secured and unsecured, now issued by them. The receipts into the Treasury from all sources, including loans and balances from the preceding year, for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1862, were $583,885,274 66c., of which sum $49,056,397 62c. were derived from customs; $1,795,231 73c. from the direct tax; from public lands, $162,203 77c.; from miscellaneous sources, $931,787 64c.; from loans in all forms, $529,692,460 50c. The remainder, $2,257,065 80c. was the balance from last year. The disbursements during the same period were:—For Congressional, Executive, and Judicial purposes, $5,989,009 29c.; for foreign intercourse, $1,339,710 35c.; for miscellaneous expenses, including the mints, loans, post-office deficiencies, collection of revenue, and other like charges, $14,129,771 50c.; for expenses under the Interior Department, $3,102,985 52c.; under the War Department, $394,368,407 36c.; under the Navy Department, $42,674,569 69c.; for interest on the public debt, $13,190,324 45c.; and for the payment of the public debt, including reimbursements of temporary loans and redemptions, $96,096,922 09c.; making an aggregate of $570,841,700 25c.; and leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, 1862, of $13,043,546 81c. It should be observed that the sum of $96,096,922 09c., expended for reimbursements and redemption of the public debt, being included also in the loans made, may be properly deducted both from the receipts and expenditures, leaving the actual receipts for the year $487,788,324 97c., and the expenditures $474,744,788 16c.

For further information as to finances, and for the condition of the Army and Navy, Congress has reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, War, and Navy. The report of the Post-Office is financially favourable, stating that the dividend last year $2,112,000, while the year before it was $4,551,000. The sale of bonds has ceased to be a source of revenue. From July 1861, to September, 1862 the debts did not cover the expenses of the land system during that period.

Mr. Lincoln dilates on the insubordination of the Indians:—

The Indian tribes upon our frontiers have during the past years manifested a spirit of insubordination, and at several points have engaged in open hostilities against the white settlements in their vicinity. The tribes occupying the Indian country south of Kansas renounced their allegiance to the United States and entered into treaties with the insurgents. Those who remained loyal to the United States were driven from the country. The chief of the Cherokees has visited this city for the purpose of restoring the former relations of the tribe with the United States. He alleges that they were constrained by superior force to enter into treaties with the insurgents, and that the United States neglected to furnish the protection which their treaty stipulations required. In the month of August last the Sioux Indians in Minnesota attacked the settlements in their vicinity with extreme ferocity, killing indiscriminately men, women, and children. This attack was wholly unexpected, and therefore no means of defence had been provided.

It is estimated that not less than 800 persons were killed by the Indians, and a large amount of property was destroyed. How this outbreak was induced is not definitely known, and suspicions, which may be unjust, need not be stated. Information was received by the Indian Bureau, from different sources, about the time hostilities were commenced, that a simultaneous attack was to be made upon the white settlements between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains. The state of Minnesota has suffered great injury from this Indian war. A large portion of her territory has been depopulated, and a severe loss has been sustained by the destruction of property. The people of that State express much anxiety for the removal of the tribes beyond the limits of the State, as a guarantee against future hostilities. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs will furnish full details. I submit for your especial consideration whether our Indian system shall not be remodelled. Many wise and good men have been impressed with the belief that this can be profitably done.

After referring to the progress of the Pacific railroad; the progress for enlarging the canals in New York and Illinois; the military importance of enlarging the Illinois canal and improving the Illinois River; and the organization of the department of agriculture, Mr. Lincoln enters upon the subject of emancipation, which he treats at great length, introducing it by the following homely platitudes:—

On the 22nd day of September last a proclamation was issued by the Executive, a copy of which is herewith submitted. In accordance with the purpose expressed in the second paragraph of that paper, I now respectfully recall your attention to what may be called "Compensated Emancipation." A nation may be said to consist of its territory, its people, and its laws. The territory is the only part which is of certain durability. "One generation passeth away and another generation cometh, but the earth abideth for ever." It is of the first importance to duly consider and estimate this never-ending part. That portion of the earth's surface which is owned and inhabited by the people of the United States is well adapted to be the home of one national family, and it is not well adapted for two or more. Its vast extent, and its variety of climate and productions, are of advantage in this age for one people, whatever they might have been in former ages. Steam and telegraphs, and intelligence, have brought these to be an advantageous combination for one united people.

After quoting a passage from his inaugural address upon the "inadequacy of disunion" as a remedy for the difference between North and South, he continued:—

There is no line, straight or crooked, suitable for a national boundary upon which to divide. Trace through from east to west upon the line between the free and slave country, and we shall find a little more than one-third of its length are rivers easy to be crossed and populated, or soon to be populated, thickly upon both sides, while nearly all its remaining length are merely surveyor's lines, over which people may walk back and forth without any consciousness of their presence. No part of this line can be made any more difficult to pass by writing it down on paper or parchment as a national boundary. The fact of separation, if it comes, gives up on the part of the sectional obligations upon the seceding section the fugitive slave cause, along with all other constitutional obligations upon the section seceded from, while I should expect no treaty stipulation would ever be made to take its place.

Another difficulty he says is, that the Western States, which he calls "the great body of the Republic," and which in fifty years will have fifty millions of inhabitants—will be cut off from free communication with the ocean.

And this is true wherever a dividing or boundary line may be fixed. Place it between the non-free and slave country, or place it in the south of Kentucky, or north of Ohio, and still the truth remains that none south of it can trade to any port or place north of it, and none north of it can trade to any port or place south of it, except upon terms dictated by a government foreign to them. These outlets, east, west, and south, are indispensable to the well-being of the people inhabiting and to inhabit this vast interior region. Which of the three ways be the best is no proper question. All are better than neither, and all of right belong to that people and their successors for ever. True to themselves they will not ask where a line of separation shall be, but will vow rather that there shall be no such line. Nor are the marginal regions less interested in these communications to and through them to the great outside world. They, too, and each of them, must have access to this Egypt of the west, without paying toll at the crossing of any national boundary. Our national strife sprung not from our permanent past, nor from the land we inhabit, nor from our national homestead. There is no possible severing of this, but would multiply, and not mitigate, evils among us. In all its adaptations and aptitudes it demands union, and abhors separation. In fact, it would, ere long, force reunion, however much of blood and treasure the separation might have cost. Our strife pertains to ourselves, to the passing generations of men, and it cannot without convulsion be hushed for ever with the passing of one generation.

In this view, I recommend the adoption of the following resolution and articles amendatory to the constitution of the United States;—

Resolved,—By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both houses concurring, that the following articles be proposed to the legislatures and conventions of the several States, as amendments to the constitution of the United States, all or any of which articles, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures or conventions, to be valid as part or parts of the said constitution.

Article.—Every State wherein slavery now exists which shall abolish the same therein at any time or times before the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1900, shall receive compensation from the United States as follows, to wit: The President of the United States shall deliver to every such State bonds of the United States, bearing interest at the rate of —, for each slave shown to have been therein by the eight census of the United States, said bonds to be delivered to such State by instalments, or in one parcel at the completion of the abolishment, accordingly as the same shall have been gradual or at one time within such States; and interest shall begin to run upon any such bond only from the proper time of its delivery as aforesaid and afterwards. Any State having received bonds as aforesaid, and afterwards introducing or tolerating slavery therein, shall refund to the United States the bonds so received, or the value thereof, and all interest paid thereon.

Article.—All slaves who shall have enjoyed actual freedom by the chances of the war at any time before the end of the rebellion shall be for ever free, but all owners of such who shall not have been disloyal shall be compensated for them at the same rates as is provided for States adopting abolishment of slavery, but in such a way that no slave shall be twice accounted for.

Article.—Congress may appropriate money and otherwise provide for colonizing free coloured persons with their own consent, at any place or places without the United States.

I beg indulgence to discuss these proposed articles at some length. Without slavery the rebellion could never have existed; without slaves it could not continue. Among the friends of the Union there is great diversity of sentiment and of policy in regard to slavery, and the African race amongst us. Some would abolish it suddenly and without compensation; some would abolish it gradually and with compensation; some would remove the freed people from us, and some would retain them with us; and there are yet other minor diversities. Because of these diversities we waste much strength in struggles amongst ourselves; by mutual concessions we should harmonize and act together. This would be a compromise among the friends and not with the enemies of the Union. These articles are intended to embody a plan of such mutual concessions. If the plan shall be adopted, it is assumed that emancipation will follow, at least in several of the States. As to the first article, the main points are—First, the emancipation; secondly, the length of time for consummating (37 years); and thirdly, the compensation. The emancipation will be unsatisfactory to the advocates of perpetual slavery, but the length of time should greatly mitigate their dissatisfaction. The time spares both races from the evils of sudden derangement, in fact from the necessity of any derangement, while most of those whose habitual course of thought will be disturbed by the measure, will have passed away before its consummation. They will never see it. Another class will hail the prospect of emancipation, but will deprecate the length of time. They will feel that it gives too little to the now living slaves. But it really gives them much. It saves them from the vagrant destitution which must largely attend immediate emancipation, in localities where their numbers are very great, and it gives the inspiring assurance that their posterity shall be free for ever. The plan leaves to each State choosing to act under it power to abolish slavery, now or at the end of the century, or at any intermediate time, or by degrees extending over the whole, or any part of the period, and it obliges no two States to proceed alike. It also provides for compensation, and generally the mode of making it. This it would seem would further mitigate the dissatisfaction of those who favour perpetual slavery, and especially of those who are to receive compensation. Doubtless some of those who are to pay, and not to receive, will object, yet that the measure is both just and economical is certain.

The liberation of the slaves is the destruction of property—property acquired, by descent or by purchase, the same as any other property.

It is no less true for having been often said, that the people of the South are no more responsible for the original introduction of this property than are the people of the North, and when it is remembered how unhesitatingly we use—all of us use—cotton and sugar, and share the profits of dealing in them, it may not be quite safe to say that the South has been more responsible than the North for its continuance. If then for a common object this property is to be sacrificed, is it not just that it be done at a common charge? And if with less money, or money more easily paid, we can preserve the benefits of the Union by this means than we can by the war alone, is it not only economical to do it? Let us consider it then. Let us ascertain the sum we have expended in the war since compensated emancipation was proposed last March, and consider whether, if the measure had been promptly accepted by even some of the Slave States, the same sum would not have done more to close the war than has been otherwise done. If so, the measure would save money, and in that view would be prudent and economical. Certainly it is not so easy to pay something as to pay nothing. But it is easier to pay a large sum than it is to pay a larger one, and it is easier to pay any sum when we are able, than it is to pay it before we are able. The war requires money at once: the aggregate sum necessary for compensating emancipation of course would be large, but it would require no ready cash, no bondsmen, any faster than the emancipation progresses. This might not, and probably would not, close before the end of the thirty-seven years. At that time we shall probably have 100,000,000 people to share the burden, instead of 31,000,000 as now, and not only so, but the increase of our population may be expected to continue for a long time after the period as rapidly as before, because our territories will not have become full. I do not state this inconsiderately. At the same rate of increase which we have maintained on an average from our first national census in 1790 until that of 1860, we should in 1900 have a population of 103,208,415—and why may we not continue that ratio far beyond that period? Our abundant room, our broad national homesteads, is an ample resource. Were our territory as limited as the British Isles, very certainly our population could not expand as stated, and instead of receiving the foreign born as now, we should be compelled to send part of the native born away; but such is not our condition. We have 2,963,000 square miles. Europe has 3,800,000, with a population averaging 73 and one-third persons to the square mile. Why may not our country at some future time average as many? Is it less fertile? Has it more waste surface, by mountains, rivers, lakes, deserts, or other causes? Is it inferior to Europe in any natural advantage? If then we are at some time to be as populous as Europe, how soon?

He then quotes from the census of 1850 to show the possible increase of the population

The proposed emancipation would shorten this war, perpetuate peace, insure this increase of population, and proportionately the wealth of the country. With this we should pay all that emancipation would cost, together with our other debts, easier than we should pay our other debts without it. If we had allowed our old national debt to run at 6 per cent.

per annum, simple interest, from the end of our revolutionary struggle till to-day, without paying anything on either principal or interest, each man of us would owe less upon that debt now than each man owed upon it then, and this because our increase of men through the whole period has been greater than 6 per cent., and has run faster than the interest upon the debt. Thus time alone relieves a debtor nation so long as its population increases faster than unpaid interest accumulates on its debt. This fact would be no excuse for delaying the payment of what is justly due, but it shows the great importance of time in this connexion, and the great advantage of a policy by which we shall not have to pay until we number a hundred millions what by a different policy we would have to pay now when the number is but 31,000,000. In a word, it shows that a dollar will be much harder to pay for the war than will a dollar for emancipation on the proposed plan. And then the latter will cost no blood, no precious life. It will be a saving of both.

As to the second article, I think it would be impracticable to return to bondage the class of persons therein contemplated. Some of them, doubtless, in the property sense, belong to loyal owners, and hence provision is made in this article for compensating such. The third article relates to the future of the freed people. It does not oblige, but merely authorizes, Congress to aid in colonizing such as may consent. This ought not to be regarded as objectionable on the one hand or on the other, inasmuch as it comes to nothing unless by mutual consent of the people to be deported and the American voters, through their representatives of Congress. I cannot make it known better than it already is, that I strongly favour colonization; and yet I wish to say there is no objection urged against the coloured persons remaining in the country which is not largely imaginary, if not sometimes malicious. It is insisted that deportation would probably enhance the wages of white labour, and very surely would not reduce them. Thus the customary amount of labour would still have to be performed. The freed people would surely not do more than their old proportion of it, and very probably for a time would do less, leaving an increased part to white labourers, bringing their labour into greater demand, and consequently enhancing the wages of it. With deportation even to a limited extent, enhancing wages of white labour is mathematically certain. Labour is like any other commodity in the market—increase the demand for it and you increase the price of it. Reduce the supply of black labour by colonizing the black labourers out of the country, and by precisely so much you increase the demand for and wages of white labour. But it is decided that the freed people will swarm forth and cover the whole land. Are they not already in the land? Will liberation make them any more numerous? Equally distributed among the whites of the whole country, there would be but one coloured to seven whites. Could the one in any way greatly disturb the seven?

Is it true, then, that coloured people can displace any more white labour by being free than remaining slaves? If they stay in their old places they jostle no white labourers. If they leave their old places they leave them open to white labourers. Logically there is neither more nor less of it. Emancipation even without their presence would injure and displace white labour and white labourers. If there could ever be a proper time for mere arguments, that time surely is not now. In times like the present men should utter nothing for which they would not willingly be responsible through time and eternity.

There are many communities now having more than one free coloured person to seven whites, and this without any apparent consciousness of evil from it. The district of Columbia and the States of Maryland and Delaware are all in this condition. The district has more than one free coloured to six whites, yet in its frequent petitions to Congress I believe it has never presented the presence of free coloured persons as one of its grievances. But why should emancipation South send free coloured people North? People of any colour seldom run unless there be something to run from. Heretofore coloured people, to some extent, have fled north from bondage, and now, perhaps, from both bondage and destitution; but if gradual emancipation and deportation be adopted, they will have neither to fly from. The old masters would give them wages, at least until new labourers can be procured, and the freed men in turn will gladly give their labour for the wages till new homes can be found for them in congenial climes and with people of their own blood and race.

This proposition can be trusted on the mutual interests involved; and in any event cannot the North decide for itself whether to receive them. Again, as practice proves more than theory in any case, has there been any irruption of coloured people northward because of the abolishment of slavery in this district last spring. What I have said of the proportion of free coloured persons to the whites in the district is from the census of 1860, having no reference to persons called contrabands, nor to those made free by the act of Congress abolishing slavery here. The plan consisting of these articles is recommended, not but that a restoration of the national authority would be accepted without its adoption, nor will the war, nor proceedings under the proclamation of September 22, 1862 be stayed because of the recommendation of this plan. Its timely adoption, I doubt not, would bring restoration, and thereby stay both. And notwithstanding this plan, the recommendation that Congress provided by law for compensating any State which may adopt emancipation before this plan shall have been acted upon, is hereby earnestly renewed. Such would only be an advance part of the plan, and the same arguments apply to both. This plan is recommended as a means, not in exclusion of, but additional to all others for restoring and preserving the national authority throughout the Union. The subject is presented exclusively in its economical aspect. The plan would, I am confident, secure peace more speedily than it can be done by force alone, while it would cost less, considering amounts and manner of payment, and times of payment, and the amounts would be easier paid than will be the additional cost of the war if we rely solely upon force. It is most likely—very likely—that it would cost no blood at all. The plan is proposed as permanent constitutional law. It cannot become such without the concurrence of, first, two-thirds of Congress, and afterwards, three-fourths of the States. The requisite three-fourths of the States will necessarily include seven of the Slave States. Their concurrence, if obtained, will give assurance of their severally adopting emancipation at no distant day, upon the new constitutional terms. This assurance would end the struggle now, and save the Union for ever.

The Message concludes by wishing Congress to adopt the Presidential scheme.

Other means may succeed. This could not fail. The way is plain, peaceful, generous, just—a way which, if followed, the world will for ever applaud, and God must for ever bless.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

AMERICA.

The operations in Virginia were the subject of much speculation in the North. It was not so much a question as to whether Burnside was on the north or the south of the Rappahannock, for that at some point or other he could cross that stream was certain; but the question anxiously discussed was whether the Federal army having crossed will be able to advance; and whether a battle-field nearer to Richmond will be to the advantage of the invader. It is manifest that if the advance is persisted in a battle must be fought before a junction of Federal forces is effected in the peninsula, and it is not less clear that the nearer the Federals are to Richmond the further they are from the base of their operations, and from their source of supplies. The people of the North are learning to appreciate the difficulties incident to campaigning in Virginia, and are not so sanguine of success as formerly. It seems as if the very elements were warring against the invader. The last Army of the Potomac was decimated by heat; the present army is suffering from intense cold. Some soldiers have died from exposure; and the transport of stores to Aquia Creek has been hindered by the ice.

According to the latest reports from Washington, General Burnside had crossed the Rappahannock and taken possession of Fredericksburg—the Confederates having retired to their line of works outside the city. The Confederates having constructed their defences on the south side of the city, we can perceive why the Federals occupied the city without much opposition. It is also rumoured that on the 11th inst. General Franklin's division crossed the river three miles below the city, and General Sigel had marched to join Burnside, and that the junction had been effected. We are informed that "the Federal losses have been slight." According to the usual meaning of Northern telegrams, for "slight" read "considerable."

The destination of General Banks's expedition was still a mystery. Some say it will co-operate with the Army of the Potomac, and others, that it will attack Wilmington.

The Confederate victory at Hartsville, Tennessee, was, as we expected, signal and important. The Federal brigade which was captured consisted of three entire regiments—the 104th Illinois, the 106th Ohio, the 108th Ohio; and of Nicklen's battery, and a small detachment of the 2nd Indiana Cavalry. The Northern accounts state that General Morgan accomplished this with three regiments of cavalry, and two of infantry. We presume the numbers were nearly equal, or that the Federals were more numerous, for the Associated Press speaks of the affair as a surprise, and says, "Our arms are again disgraced;" and the New York papers call upon the Government to institute inquiry. Several other captures have been made lately by General Morgan, including three Federal officers and thirteen waggons. As usual, we have the information that the Federals are in "hot pursuit" of their gallant enemy, of whose movements they only become acquainted by their own disasters.

A battle was fought at Cronfordsville, Arkansas, on the 7th of December, between the Confederates under General Hindman and the Federals under Generals Herron and Blunt. According to the Northern accounts the fight lasted from 10 a.m. till dark, and at 9 p.m. the Confederates retreated, taking with them all their guns and stores, which the Federals had made several ineffectual attempts to capture. The Federals confess to a loss of 600, and add, "The rebel loss was 1500 by their own admission." Was General Hindman so obliging as to send an account of his loss to the enemy before he left the field? Details generally give an air of probability to an account, but to do so they must be ingeniously and not clumsily introduced. The Confederates must, according to the Federal story, have "admitted their loss" before they had had time to ascertain it.

On the 10th of December the Confederates drove in the Federal pickets before Nashville at every point, and great excitement existed in the town.

Captain Wilkes has written to his Government to complain that the Governor of Martinique would not allow him to enter the harbour to watch the Alabama.

The reported Federal occupation of Grenada, Mississippi, is now considered doubtful.

The Richmond Enquirer of the 3rd inst. says that deserters from Washington report that Banks's expedition was at Newbern, and that Wilmington was to be attacked. The Enquirer publishes the following resolutions unanimously passed by the House of Commons of North Carolina:—

Resolved,—That the Confederate States have the means and the will to sustain and perpetuate the Government they have established, and to that end North Carolina is determined to contribute all of her power and resources.

Resolved,—That the separation between the Confederate States and the United States is final, and that the people of North Carolina will never consent to reunion at any time or upon any terms.

Resolved,—That we have full confidence in the ability and patriotism of His Excellency President Davis, and that his Administration is entitled to the cordial support of all patriotic citizens.

Resolved,—That we heartily approve the policy for the conduct of the war set forth by His Excellency Governor Vance, in his inaugural address and message to the General Assembly, and that he ought to be unanimously supported in the manly and patriotic stand he has taken for our independence.

There has been a serious military riot in east New York. A soldier named Stellfax, encamped at Centreville, Long Island, obtained permission to visit the city, and after drinking at various houses, called with a companion at an hotel kept by a man named Schellein, situated at the corner of Vermont Avenue. Here a dispute arose about the measure of some whisky, and after some scuffling the Federal soldiers left the place. Stellfax insisted upon returning to the house. The door was partially opened to him, and he was fired at, but ineffectually. He ran across the street and was fired at three times in succession, one of the shots hitting and killing him. The affair became known to the soldiers, and the officers could not restrain the rage of the men. They went in a body to wreak their vengeance on Schellein, whom they could not find, but they burnt the hotel to the ground. In the crowd assembled a dispute arose between a German and an American soldier, which resulted in the latter being shot in the leg.

General Butler's Sequestration Committee continue their confiscation measures at New Orleans. Immense quantities of goods and contents of splendid mansions are daily being sold by auction. General Butler occupies a house vacated by Dr. Campbell, who left when the Federals occupied the city, closing his house and leaving everything, including his plate. General Butler has extended his confiscation order to all that part of the State of Louisiana east of Mississippi River, except the parishes of New Orleans, St. Brener, and Plaque Mines.

The New York World publishes an article strongly denouncing General Butler, and which may show his few European admirers how richly merited is the universal censure pronounced upon him.

There are American journals so ignorant or so base as to praise the administration of General Butler at New Orleans. The fact is that he not only disgraces the Union cause—he disgraces civilization and humanity itself. He would be without apologists in Algiers. He ought to be without eulogists in America. Silence concerning his abuses of power and malfeasanances in office, his brutality, and the peculations at which he winks, if he does not share their profit, might be tolerated by the consciences of those who, hopeless of moving the mind of Mr. Lincoln, were unwilling to really obstruct the Government or even seem to encourage disloyalty. But when that silence is misconstrued into approbation,—when presses are found which, like most of our contemporaries in this city, actually praise General Butler, dwell upon the cleverness of his rhetoric and the efficiency of his rule, which laud the safe brutality of his intercourse with Secessionists, as if that were the best means of bringing them to reason,—when presses exist which have the effrontery or the ignorance to represent the number of those who have taken an enforced oath of allegiance as the number of those whose hearts have been constrained to loyalty, then silence becomes a lie. The truth concerning this basest and most unprincipled man should then be told, and his misconduct be denounced as it deserves, that the shame of the loyal and honest millions whose Government Mr. Lincoln has sent him to represent may at least be undeserved. The Administration presses will act wisely not to praise him. They should be thankful if their own silence secures his immunity from public odium. Neither they nor Mr. Lincoln can secure him against the infamy of history.

From all quarters there is abundant testimony of the terrible demoralization of the Federal troops. The following private letter from an officer in one of the South-Western armies has been published in the New York Times:—

If I should tell you the state of demoralization of many of our old regiments in the Valley of the Mississippi you would not believe it. They have no respect for man or woman, and are guilty of offences that, if committed at home, would send them to the penitentiary for life. Similar representations are made in so many other quarters that it is no longer possible to doubt that portions of our army have become greatly demoralized. It is not a pleasant fact, but it is criminal to shut our eyes to it. Every loyal organ of opinion in the land should raise its voice against it and demand its suppression.

The Governor of New Hampshire has ordered the draft to be enforced in those towns which have not filled up their quotas. This is a remarkable comment on the alacrity for enlistment which Mr. Seward boasts of in his despatch to Mr. Adams after the battles of June.

At the trial of General Porter, General Pope was examined at great length. The accusation mainly had reference to the following order, dated the 29th of August:—

Major General F. J. Porter,—The General Commanding, immediately on the receipt of this order, the precise hour of which you will note, requests that you will march your command to the field of battle to-day, and report to him in person for orders.

You are to understand that you are to comply strictly with the order, and be present on the field within three hours after its receipt, or by daybreak to-morrow morning. Signed by

COMMANDING-GENERAL POPE.

Upon being asked in what particular General Porter had failed to act in accordance with these instructions, General Pope replied:—"I thought he failed to obey it because two of the brigades of his command were not brought up with him, but by some means or other had straggled from it and were at Centreville." This seems to us rather a poor excuse for such a sweeping accusation. General Pope is not the first inefficient general who has been troubled with "stray" and "straggling" regiments, though perhaps he is the first to allow his temper to so far master his discretion as to admit his utter incapacity.

General McClellan gave evidence before the Court of Inquiry as to the conduct of General McDowell. It was strongly in favour of the accused. General McClellan censured the policy of separating McDowell's corps from the Army of the Potomac, and further stated that it would have been of great service if it had joined him by the way of Honour Court House. He does not hold General McDowell responsible for not joining him on either occasion. His evidence must be very distasteful to the Lincoln Cabinet.

In the Federal Senate a resolution, that the call upon the Secretary of War for the correspondence relating to the Army of the Potomac be extended so as to embrace all operations of the army since the first movement, was adopted. If this correspondence is published we may expect some curious revelations.

The Committee of Ways and Means has introduced a bill into Congress, providing for an issue of $1,000,000,000 in bonds, similar in amount and form to those authorized by the Act of February 1862, with the interest payable in United States' lawful money, and the principal payable in twenty years in gold or silver coin of the United States; also, the issue of legal tender notes, the amount not to exceed, with those already authorized, $500,000,000, in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to call in all 5-20 and 7-30 Treasury bonds now in circulation, and to cancel them, and authorizing the Secretary to redeem legal tender notes held as loans and bearing interest. The Committee has further proposed that the law authorizing the payment of interest on United States' bonds in gold should be repealed.

The Federal House of Representatives has passed a Bill to indemnify President Lincoln and his Cabinet for suspending the Writ of Habeas Corpus. The Republican press approve of this measure. Mr. Lincoln's friends are evidently afraid of what will happen when the new Congress assembles."

The House has also passed a Bill admitting Western Virginia as a State, by a majority of 96 to 55. The Bill provides for the gradual abolition of slavery in the State. It had previously passed the Senate.

Several fresh captures by the Alabama were reported in New York.

It is "semi-officially" stated that the Federal Government has received information that France will not further prosecute her proposal for an armistice or mediation." Rather in contradiction to this is a special despatch to the Boston Journal, dated Washington, December 9: "Our relations with France are the prominent topic of conversation here, and many anticipate trouble with our Gallic friends."

The Mexican Minister at Washington "is making arrangements to accept the services of Federal officers who have volunteered to assist the Mexicans." This is, of course, intended as an insult and menace to France. We should have thought Federal officers would have found enough to do at home. Perhaps Mr. Lincoln hopes by these means to get rid of several of his unsuccessful generals—General Pope, for example; and if so, Mexico will not have much cause for gratitude.

A resolution has been proposed in the Federal Congress, that an American war vessel should accompany any ship carrying provisions for Lancashire, to protect her from pirates. This has reference to the Confederate war steamer Alabama. If by any means merchantmen laden with Southern cotton could be insured against Federal "pirates," the distress in Lancashire might be effectually obviated, and the English cotton industry saved from threatened ruin, or, at all events, years of depression.

In the House of Representatives the resolution condemning President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation as unconstitutional and unauthorized was laid on the table by a vote of 95 to 47.

The Hibernian brings us a piece of intelligence that is much better than nine-tenths of the jokes that will be uttered this Christmas. "The Confederate Governor of North Carolina has sent a Message to the General Assembly. The Message shows no union sentiment whatever." This is a smart sarcasm.

Mr. Seward has published a mass of diplomatic correspondence. Below we give a summary of the principal despatches:—

In June Mr. Adams writes that the darling desire of the governing classes that America may be divided, though subdued in expression by events, remains as strong as ever.

Mr. Adams writes, in October, that he has had an interview with Earl Russell, in which, referring to Mr. Gladstone's speech, Earl Russell said it was not for him to disavow anything on the part of Mr. Gladstone, but that Mr. Gladstone had no idea, in saying what he had, that there was serious intention to justify any inferences of a disposition of the Government to adopt a new policy. Earl Russell stated as guardedly as possible that Lord Palmerston and the other members of the Cabinet regretted Mr. Gladstone's speech, but it was still their intention to adhere to perfect neutrality, and let the struggle come to its natural end without the smallest interference, direct or otherwise. Earl Russell, however, could not say what circumstances might happen from month to month in the future.

Mr. Seward's recent communications to Mr. Adams are summarized thus:—

In June Mr. Seward writes that a list of purchases made for the Confederates in England, which list had fallen into the hands of the Federals, shows that the complaints made to Earl Russell fell short of the real abuses of neutrality committed in England in the very face of the British Government. "The rebellion," says Mr. Seward, "is now approaching its end, and it is just at this moment proof becomes irresistible that if it had succeeded its success would have been due to the assistance derived from the English people." Mr. Seward says the President thinks it desirable that the English Government should consider before the war closes what are likely to be the sentiments of England and America towards each other after its termination.

In August Mr. Seward writes that a war with England could not fail to unite North and South.

In November Mr. Seward writes that while European parties are more hostile than ever to America, America herself is stronger to resist intervention than at any former period. Intervention would only afford an additional motive for America to sustain her resolution to remain united. Less than three years ago all England showed itself desirous of friendship with America, and a similar desire may before long recur.

On the 3rd of the same month Mr. Seward states that the President is compelled to regard the destruction of ships by the Alabama as having been made by British subjects in violation of the law of nations. "It is presumed," says Mr. Seward, "you have already brought the subject before the British Government in that light. Legal proofs to support indemnity claims will be collected and transmitted as soon as possible."

France has a right to make war against Mexico, and to determine for herself the cause. We have a right and interest to insist that France shall not improve the war she makes to raise up in Mexico an anti-Republican or anti-American Government, or to maintain such Government there. France has disclaimed such designs, and we, besides reposing faith in the assurance given in a frank and honourable manner, would in any case be bound to wait for and not anticipate a violation of them. Circumstances tend to excite misapprehensions and jealousies between this Government and that of France in spite of all the prudence we can practise on our part. We studiously endeavour to avoid them. You will therefore be fully authorized in assuming that this Government does not inspire and has no responsibility for the assumptions of a different character made by the press. When we desire explanations from France, or when an occasion shall have arrived to express discontent, we shall communicate directly and explicitly with M. Thouvenel, through your good offices.

Mr. Dayton writes to Mr. Seward in March that at an interview with the Emperor he stated that the opinion of Americans was that if France and England would withdraw their recognition of the Southern insurrectionists as belligerents the rebellion would collapse at once. If this recognition were withdrawn, Mr. Dayton believed that as an equivalent the blockade would be raised at an early date.

The Emperor replied that the recognition of the Southerners as belligerents was made upon an understanding with England; that some legal questions were originally involved, and that he must consult M. Thouvenel. When the insurrection broke out the Emperor did not suppose the North would succeed, and it was the general belief of European statesmen that the two sections would never come together again. This belief was the principal reason why the concession of belligerent rights was granted.

The correspondence from Russia is only remarkable from the tone assumed towards England. Mr. Cassius M. Clay writes to Mr. Seward in January last:—

Union with us, with equal rights, should be offered the Canadians, and the life and property of friends secured. Men and money should be sent into Ireland, India, and all the British dominions all over the world, to stir up revolt. Our cause is just, and vengeance will sooner or later overtake that perfidious aristocrat.

No one will be surprised at this outburst from Mr. Clay, but its publication is an insult to this country such as was never before offered to any Power, great or small, and no insult half so coarse has ever yet been suffered to pass with impunity.

Next to Mr. Clay's contribution one of the choicest morsels in the whole of the published correspondence is a letter from the French Consul at New Orleans to the French Minister at Washington. He says General Butler used extraordinary language in addressing him; that his first words were almost always, "I will hang you, or I will send you to Fort Jackson." All the world knows that Butler is a ruffian, but he is not many degrees worse than his Government, who, being aware of his ruffianism, retain him in office.

A despatch from the American Minister at St. Petersburg states that Prince Gortschakoff told him in October last he thought the hope of reunion was daily growing less, and impressed upon him that Russia would regard a separation as the greatest misfortune. The Prince stated that Russia would refuse to aid in intervention, but was most anxious for some means to be adopted to prevent separation.

ENGLAND.

This week we have to record the first sign of improvement in the condition of Lancashire. Pauperism is actually diminishing. The weekly report of the Poor Law Board exhibits the following results:—

(a). Seven unions have more:—

Paupers.		Paupers.
Ashton-under-Lyne	70	Salford	320
Bolton	179	Wigan	190
Chorlton	250
Liverpool	190	Total	1,920
Manchester	730

(b). Two unions are in respect of the amount of pauperism the same as in the previous week—Macclesfield, Stockport (no return this week).

(c). Twelve unions have less:—

Paupers.		Paupers.
Blackburn	290	Preston	30
Burnley	290	Rochdale	150
Bury	40	Saddleworth	140
Chorley	430	Todmorden	70
Glossop	70	Warrington	90
Haslingden	2,740
Oldham	890	Total	5,230

It will be seen that while Manchester and its suburbs—if suburbs they be—of Salford and Chorlton, which at first suffered as little as any manufacturing towns, show an increase of 1300, Wigan and Ashton have only a trifling increase, while in Blackburn, Burnley, Oldham, and Preston, which suffered severely at first, there is an actual decrease. We shall not attempt an explanation of this phenomenon with our present information on the matter; we are satisfied to note it as a hopeful symptom.

The Mansion-house Committee granted £40,000 last week, besides £18,000 for Christmas dinners. They have distributed altogether £250,000. They continue to receive letters expressing a hope that they will retain all their functions as distributors, from those local committees whose applications have been deservedly refused by the Central Executive at Manchester.

The example of the county meeting of Lancashire has been followed in Cheshire. The proprietors, merchants, and manufacturers of that county assembled on Saturday in the Volunteers' Armoury at Stockport, under the presidency of the High Sheriff. The Marquis of Westminster stated several cases of distress; and enumerated several instances of large benefactions on the part of the manufacturers—one firm having actually given £14,000; others £2000, £5000, and £7000. The Bishop of the diocese described in moving terms the condition to which the working classes had been reduced. Lord Stanley of Alderley (no connection of the family whose chief is Earl of Derby) vindicated the conduct of the manufacturers, and expressed an unlimited belief in Surat—much his lordship knows about it. Lord Grosvenor, son of the Marquis of Westminster, expressed his satisfaction that there were no cries for a war with America, of which no one could foresee the result, and which would be far more costly than the cotton famine. (The result would be that the North would be forced in six months to make peace on any terms, at about the cost of the last six months of distress.)

Mr. Potts, the Clerk of the Peace, read a long list of subscriptions which had been promised at this meeting. The list included the following:—The Marquis of Westminster (in addition to a former subscription), £2000 (loud cheers); the Marchioness of Westminster, £50; the Marquis of Cholmondeley, £500; the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, £1000; Lord Berners, £500; Earl Grosvenor, £100; Viscount Combermere, £100; Lady Combermere, £50; Lord H. Cholmondeley, £200; Lord de Tabley, £50; Sir P. Egerton, £100; Major Egerton Leigh, £100 (in addition to local subscriptions); Mr. R. H. Greg, £200 (besides three local subscriptions); Mr. R. Barbour, £100 (in addition to former subscriptions); Lord Crewe, £100; Mr. J. Tollemache, £300 (in addition to a former subscription, and £2000 in works); Sir E. Cust, £100; and the Bishop of Chester, £100. There were several other subscriptions of £100, and a large number of smaller sums.

The Central Executive Committee held its usual weekly meeting on Monday. A bad fit of the gout prevented Lord Derby from taking the chair. A correspondence was read referring to certain charges made by a certain Rev. Mr. Williams at Ashton relative to the "partiality" shown by the Committee. The history of the case is very simple. A Committee was formed in Ashton, which included all the leading men of the place. A few malcontents got up a rival organization. The Central Committee tried to mediate, in vain; and finally determined to entrust the distribution of its funds to the only body in Ashton which could be considered responsible. The opposition is now sustained entirely by remittances from London, as the Mansion-house Committee will insist on judging for itself on matters of which it is wholly ignorant, instead of abiding by the judgment of those who are better informed; and

Mr. Williams has busied himself in circulating throughout the country complaints against the Central Committee, which are not merely false, but obviously absurd; with no other apparent purpose than to damp the charity of those who have hitherto given largely through the Central Committee. We trust that the severe rebuke he has received in the publication of the facts will put a stop to his disreputable intrigues.

Mr. Farnall read his usual weekly report, which is more cheerful than his previous communications have been:—

Manchester, Dec. 22.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report for the week ended Saturday, the 13th inst., will show you that there is a decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week of 2403. This decrease of 2403 is explained as follows:—There is a decrease at Barton-upon-Irwell of 11; Blackburn, 292; Burnley, 163; Bury, 115; Chorley, 426; the Fylde, 3; Glossop, 70; Haslingden, 2998; Lancaster, 3; Preston, 26; Rochdale, 152; Todmorden, 81; Warrington, 94;—total 4434. There is an increase at Ashton-under-Lyne of 73; Bolton, 16; Chorlton, 255; Garstang, 76; Leigh, 68; Macclesfield, 11; Manchester, 732; Prestwich, 197; Saddleworth, 93; Salford, 320; Wigan, 190;—total, 2031, making a net decrease of 2403. I have received no returns from the clerks of the Unions of Clitheroe, Oldham, and Stockport for the week ended the 13th inst., and I have therefore inserted in my tabular report their figures for the week ended the 6th inst., and I am unable to state whether there has been an increase or a decrease in either of these places. The figures entered for the Fylde represent a decrease of pauperism as compared with the week ended the 29th ult., and those for Haslingden are also compared with the same week. There were on the 13th inst., 269,580 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 59,482 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 210,098 persons in receipt of parochial relief, or 353.2 per cent. The total weekly cost of outdoor relief on the 13th inst. was £18,638 4s. 1d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2,940 7s. 11d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £15,697 16s. 2d., or 534.6 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism in the population of these unions on the 13th inst. was 13.6; in the corresponding week of last year it was 3.0. The average amount of outdoor relief per head per week, both in money and kind, in these unions on the 13th inst. was 1s. 5½d.; the lowest was 1s. 0½d., and the highest 1s. 11½d., at Glossop. Of the 269,580 persons receiving parochial relief on the 13th inst. 12,522 were indoor paupers. I have returns from 98 local committees, formed for the distribution of charitable aid in the cotton manufacturing districts; and I am able to state that at the date of those reports they were aiding 190,794 persons, who were not receiving parochial relief from the guardians of the poor, and that the weekly expenditure of the 98 committees was £24,908 18s. 4d. The total number of persons, therefore, included in this report who are either receiving parochial relief or who are aided by local committees of charity, is 460,374, or 23.2 per cent. on the population. The present total weekly expenditure by the guardians, on 257,058 outdoor paupers is £18,638 4s. 1d.; and by the 98 local committees, on the 190,794 persons aided by them, is £24,908 18s. 4d.; making together £43,547 2s. 5d., or 1s. 11½d. to each recipient. The amount of money in the hands of the treasurers of the above union on the 13th inst. was £89,631 1s. 3d.; in the previous week the amount was £55,453 19s. 5d.—I am, my lords and gentlemen, your obedient servant,
H. B. FARNALL, Special Commissioner.

P.S.—Since writing the above report I have received a return from the clerk of the Stockport union which enables me to inform you that there was on the 13th inst. a decrease in the pauperism of that union of 1040, so that I have now to report that the total decrease of pauperism on the 13th, as compared with the 6th inst., was 3443.

Mr. M. Ross dissented from Mr. Farnall's conclusion that more workpeople being employed than last week it was probable the crisis was passed. Mr. Ross stated there was nothing in the statistics of a future cotton supply to warrant the supposition.

His views were adopted by Mr. Edmund Ashworth; both stated that they hoped in a few weeks to establish their opinions by undemable statistics.

Several members of the Committee expressed their opinion that the reported diminution in the number of unemployed people this week was only apparent, and occasioned probably by the fact that the many cases heretofore relieved by both the guardians and relief committees, and included in the returns from each, were now being thrown entirely upon the care of one of these relieving agencies. They saw no probability of any material lessening of the pressure of distress for some considerable time to come.

The O'Donoghue and other "mannikin traitors" have been getting up disturbances at meetings intended to express the sympathy of Ireland with the distress of Lancashire. At Tralee the O'Donoghue carried a resolution that the subscriptions of Ireland were needed for some imaginary Irish distress, and broke up a meeting convened by the Sheriff for the purpose of collecting aid for the victims of the cotton famine. A Mr. O'Brennan endeavoured, but without success, to imitate his example at Galway. It would be gratifying if any repetition of the cabbage-garden affair should afford an opportunity for obliging these gentlemen "to leave their country for their country's good." Only let them be sent not to Australia, but to New York; perhaps a few of them may find courage to enlist under Captain Meagher or Colonel Corcoran, and signalize themselves in some new Bull Run.

On Thursday last the Members for Birmingham met their constituents in the Town-hall. Mr. Scholefield, as the senior gentleman, pressed them first. He thought the Government ought to introduce a Reform Bill which would do justice to the non-electors, and to make such reductions of expenditure as might be made without impairing the efficiency of the army and navy. He had thought the secession of the Southern States an act of inconceivable folly. But if they chose to secede they had a right to do so; and the North had no right to coerce them. The North had no right to go to war to emancipate the slaves, and as a matter of fact it had done nothing of the kind. He thought that the Confederate Government ought to be recognized by the European Powers. Mr. Bright assailed the Indian Government, which he accused of having discouraged the growth of cotton; and proposed that lands growing cotton should be exempted from the Indian land-tax. He then turned to the American question, and repeated all the oft-refuted falsehoods and fallacies current among the little knot of Americanized Englishmen of whom he is the leading spirit. He said the South had revolted without cause. The United States' Government was not an expensive one. It had not a great army, a great navy, a great debt, or a burdensome foreign policy. Therefore it was impossible that the Southern States could have had any real cause of complaint against it. When they attacked Fort Sumter the North could not help going to war. The North might not be fighting to put down slavery; but the South certainly was fighting to maintain it, and for no other purpose whatever. He abused the aristocracy, the Government, the Alabama, Mr. Davis, the Confederate leaders generally, everybody and everything, and concluded as follows:—

I do not blame any man who takes the restoration of the Union to be hopeless; you have the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that point; he is as a speaker unsurpassed by any man in England; but, unfortunately, he made use of expressions in the north of England nearly three months ago, and seems ever since then to have been engaged in trying to make people understand what he meant. He is, however, quite welcome to think the struggle hopeless for the North. I do not hold that opinion. The leaders of this revolt oppose by their Constitution this simple thing—that over a territory some forty times as large as England the blight and bondage of slavery shall be for ever perpetuated. I cannot myself believe in such a fate befalling that fair land, stricken though it now be by the ravages of war; I cannot believe that civilization in its journey with the sun will sink into endless night to gratify the ambition of the leaders of this revolt, who seek "to wade through slaughter to a throne, and shut the gates of mercy on mankind." I have another and far brighter vision before my gaze. It may be but a vision, but I will still cherish it. I see one vast confederation stretching from the frozen North in one unbroken line to the glowing South, and from the wild billows of the Atlantic to the calmer waters of Pacific main, and I see one people and one law and one language and one faith, and over all that wide continent the home of freedom and a refuge for the oppressed of every race.

The South is fortunate in Mr. Bright's hostility. He never fails to damage any cause which is disgraced by his support.

At the meeting of the Blandford Agricultural Society the Members for Dorsetshire delivered their views on things in general. Mr. Portman criticised Mr. Bright's speech at Birmingham, as the most angry he had ever read, and supposed that the speaker had lost his temper with the vexation of seeing the ruin of his model Democracy. He thought that the "tall talk" of the Northerners about the invasion of Canada and war with England was all bluster, and that the blusterers knew better than to attempt to put their threats into execution. Mr. Ker Seymour vindicated his consistency as a conservative in domestic, and a liberal in foreign politics. He thought our institutions good, wished to maintain them; he thought those of some foreign countries very bad, and was glad to see them amended. He spoke in favour of Italian unity, and the withdrawal of the French army from Rome. But he thought Austria had as good a right to Venetia as we to Gibraltar. It was a pity that she governed it so badly, but she was perfectly justified in her determination to keep it by the sword. Turning to America, he expressed great fear of wounding the morbid sensitiveness of the Northern people. Still if he did not feel bound to speak of American matters in England, it was not the fault of those indiscreet friends of America who had been continually holding up that country as a pattern which we were to follow. For a long period there had been a certain class of politicians in this country who seemed to think everything English bad and everything American good. Even to this day Mr. Bright talked of our costly monarchy, and of our aristocracy being supported and living by patronage. He did not know how much Mr. Lincoln cost, but however little it might be he was sure that he was dear at the money. People talked about the army and navy in this country being a kind of outdoor relief for the aristocracy, and pointed out how small a standing army was necessary in America. All that we then could do was to prophecy, and say, "Wait until the time comes, and see what will happen. America is not bordered by great monarchies like England; but, supposing that a war occurs, how will they come out?" The case had occurred, and we had seen how America had come out. For himself, he believed that during the last two years there had been more extravagance, more speculation, and more promotion of incompetent men to high office in the United States than there had been in England during the last half century. However, we must not say too much, or the Americans would be sending over a battering-ram to destroy our whole fleet. He observed from the papers of to-day that there was a "friendly" message for them, and that there was some talk of patching up their differences to have a "go" at the old country; but if they did so they might have reason to repent their step. He concluded by finding fault with the lightness of our prison discipline, and referring to the extreme laxity of the law relative to the confinement of lunatics on medical certificate. Mr. H. Portman, a member of the Canadian Legislature, asserted the loyalty of Canada, and declared that, backed by the army and navy of England, the Canadians were prepared to resist and repel any invasion from the United States.

The following paragraph is copied by the London papers from the Liverpool Journal of Commerce. We can hardly suppose it to be true. If it should prove so, the neutrality of the British Government is indeed a perfect farce.

THE ALABAMA.—The Liverpool Journal of Commerce of yesterday says:—"We have been informed that Her Majesty's Government have issued orders to their agents, at the various ports of the western islands, that if the Confederate steamer Alabama, or '230,' should enter any of these ports, she is at once to be ordered off, and not allowed to take in coal or provisions. The order further states that if the Alabama should call at Fayal or other ports they are to inform Captain Semmes that if, after this notice, he should destroy any merchandise which may be consigned to British merchants in neutral ships, Her Majesty's Government will, at once take steps to destroy the steamer under his command."

The Yelverton case has reached another stage. Its history will be familiar to most of our readers. A Miss Theresa Longworth contrived to force herself upon Major Yelverton, went through the form of marriage with him before a Catholic priest in Ireland, and afterwards lived with him as his wife or mistress in Ireland and in Scotland. An Irish jury decided that the Irish marriage was valid, but did so by finding a verdict which was obviously false on the point of Major Yelverton's religion. In the meantime the Major had married a respectable Scotch lady. Miss Longworth is labouring to deprive this lady of her rights by proving that a marriage "by cohabitation and repute" took place in Scotland. One of the judges of the Court of Session decided against her. She appealed; and two of the other three pronounced in her favour, the President dissenting. As the judge who had given the decision appealed against was absent on the appeal, this results in a decision that she is Mrs. Yelverton. An appeal lies to the House of Lords. The Times of Monday had a very severe article on the advantage given to the "adventuress," by this Scotch decision; saying, with great truth, that if that decision remains undisturbed no woman can be safe in marrying any man who has ever lived in Scotland, and with whose life there she is not intimately acquainted.

The following letter to the Times records the success of a new experiment in co-operation, of no small interest and value:—

Sir,—The interesting article from your "Own Reporter," dated Rochdale, respecting co-operative societies, induces me to trouble you with a few lines on the same subject. About 30 years ago, upon a small farm in Suffolk becoming vacant, I called together 20 labourers and offered to lend them capital without interest if they would undertake to farm it, subject to my rules and regulations. They gladly availed themselves of my offer. In the course of 10 years they paid me back my capital, so that I was induced to let another farm of 150 acres to 30 men upon the same terms. These have also nearly paid back the capital lent to them, and, instead of eating dry bread, as I regret to say many of the agricultural labourers are now doing, each man has his bacon, and numberless comforts that he never possessed before; thus the rates are reduced, as these 50 families are no longer burdensome. The farmers are sure to meet with honest men, as conviction of crime would debar them of their share, and the men themselves have become much more intelligent, and present happy, cheerful countenances. If every country gentleman would follow my example, distress among the agricultural poor would not be known. I merely add that I have no land so well farmed. I shall be happy to send you my plan, rules, and regulations, if required.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant.

Assington Hall, Suffolk, Dec. 19. JOHN GUDON.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—M. Prevost Paradol has published in the Courier du Dimanche a criticism on the composition of the Chamber of Deputies, which is, he affirms, filled with officials, 200 members out of 260 being "mayors," who, in France, are officers of the Central Government, and appointed by the Ministry of the Interior.

ITALY.—The Parliament has been prorogued. A Committee had been appointed to inquire into the brigandage which desolates the Neapolitan provinces,

"This time last year it was the cry at the North that they would starve us out. Those who joined in it knew but little of the resources of our 'Sunny South,' or of the energy of our people.

"Thanks for the homage paid by the great Powers to the Lincoln Government and his paper blockade, we now have enough and to spare. It is highly gratifying to our young pride as a nation to find in this practical way how rich and diverse are our resources, and how independent of the rest of the world we may be if necessity so require."

NO SIGNS OF PEACE.

(From the Charleston Courier of November 11.)

Though some see signs of an early peace, to our gaze the cloud of war covers all the sky, and we cannot discover a rift in the black mantle. The beginning of the end is not visible to our eyes. And while in our judgment the war cannot last another year, our opinion, though grounded on strong and solid reasons, may be thrown into ridicule by the march of events, and this unnatural, wicked, and ruinous strife may be prolonged far beyond that period. But there is an evil of terrible complexion and vast proportions which we will be exposed to, whether the strife be brought to an end in a twelvemonth, or moisten with tears and redden with blood years that are to come. And it behoves us to protect ourselves against that great calamity.

The Yankees have made but small progress in their attempts to invade the South. They have organized and equipped vast armies, and constructed an immense navy, and their operations on land and water have cost them an incredible sum of money. They have succeeded in obtaining possession of a few square miles of territory embraced in the Southern Confederacy, but their successes bear no proportion to their efforts and outlay, and at the present time they who were to have subjugated the recalcitrant States, or exterminated their audacious and wicked inhabitants, have not begun the impossible undertaking. And before they accomplish that brave purpose, they will have to defeat and utterly destroy armies that have worsted theirs whenever they have met them on the red field of war. We have no fear that they will accomplish their direful devices. But we are anxious concerning the invasion we are threatened with after the war is over. That is the real evil that excites our deepest apprehension.

The people with whom we are now fighting can inflict greater evils upon us after peace is declared than they are capable of doing during the continuance of the existing strife. We have shown ourselves fully able to defend our homes and our honour, and in the midst of our struggles we have acquired a renown whose lustre has attracted the admiring notice of the whole civilized world. But while we have prevailed over the Yankee people by the mere skilful and courageous use of sword and cannon, we fear that the people of these Confederate States will suffer grievously at their hands, when they come against us armed with the weapons of deceit and falsehood. They are superior to us in craftiness and ingenuity, in shamelessness and enterprise. They are destitute of honour, self-respect, and conscience. And as by their oily tongues and secret professions, they retained us in bondage so many years, in like manner will the mean race endeavour, after the war is ended, to circumvent us with their cunning arts and profit by our simplicity.

If before this contest was waged the hateful Yankees were able to impose upon our credulity and to blind our eyes to their true character, they are now greater adepts in the vile art of lying and deceiving, and unless we turn our knowledge to good account after the roar of battle has ceased, we shall again fall victims to their insatiable avarice. For they have cast aside every moral restraint, seared their consciences with a hot iron, wiped out the last vestige of honour, discarded every principle of justice, destroyed every feeling of humanity, and clothed themselves in a garment of lies.

Perfectly qualified are the Yankees to carry on against us a more harmful war in the days of peace and prosperity than they are waging at the present time. They will flock in vast numbers to our fair and fertile South, with their clocks, and shoes, and fabrics, and nutmegs, and with everything our necessities and comfort require, and not the truest and most amiable friend we have will smile more blandly upon us, and shake our hands with a more pleasing cordiality, than the men who are now endeavouring to overthrow our liberties and despoil us of land, home, and honour. The faces of the thousands of tradesmen, and artisans, and pedlars, will not redden with the blush of shame at the mention of the cruelties and outrages committed upon the old men, and women, and children, by the base hirelings of the despot; for of all who come into our territory to carry on gainful pursuits, there will not be one who ever raised his voice against our cause during the war. These seekers after money will affirm, with fluent tongue and emphatic utterance, that they were among the few who stood out against this unrighteous war, and exhibit, with beaming countenances, the marks of the harsh treatment they received for stoutly opposing and resisting the unconstitutional measures enforced by their Government.

If we permit them to impose upon us again, with their false professions, the Yankees will do us infinitely greater injury after the war is terminated than they can do us while the conflict is going on.

CONFEDERATE BONDS.—A Washington correspondent of the New York Times says that Confederate bonds are being bought wherever they can be obtained, at 50 cents for the dollar. Also a considerable quantity of Confederate currency finds its way North.

NEW YORK, December 9.

All nerve appears to have left Wall-street; its inhabitants can stand hard shocks, but the monstrous falsehoods of Mr. Chase are even more difficult to bear than the monstrous amounts known to be due by the Washington Government. Bankers and merchants are the easiest-going people in the world as long as they have confidence; they will credit an insolvent if they believe him to be honest, but the moment they ascertain that he endeavours to deceive them they let him drop, and "close on him." Such is the condition of Mr. Chase just now; it would have been much better for him to have exhibited a true state of his affairs than to have practised the frauds he has enacted by his report to Congress. A Government desiring to borrow money has no more right, and, in fact, no more power to behave in an improper manner than an individual; and if it does so, the consequences it will encounter must be the same. Even Bennett, of the Herald, blushes at Mr. Chase's manifesto; he says: "The probability is, that on the 1st day of July, 1864, the Federal debt will be $1000,000,000; the ascertained and audited debt is no criterion of the real debt, and those who desire to prolong the war, either to make money out of the calamity of the country or to abolish slavery, have an interest in concealing the truth from the people who will have to bear the burden."

In addition to the civil war that is raging between Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis, there is a very uncivil conflict going on between the bank presidents and Mr. Salmon P. Chase, which will soon come to blows; there will be bloodletting, and a stoppage of the circulation of the "greenbacks."

In military affairs there is nothing of moment; as in matters financial; the action of Banks occupies the public mind; no one expects that he will redeem his promises; at all events, his movements are in a state of "suspension."

PARIS, December 23.

Once more there are rumours abroad of a proposal for mediation in America, in which all the great European Powers would join. The Presidential Message has produced the impression here that the North is on its last legs, and would be glad to avail itself of any opportunity to extricate itself from the fearful difficulties in which its own recklessness and folly of the Republican party have involved the country. We shall, however, soon know what foundation there may be for these rumours, as in little more than a fortnight the Emperor will deliver his speech on the Opening of the French Chambers when some clue to the policy His Majesty means to pursue with regard to the great American struggle may be expected. En attendant it is impossible to pass over the almost general impression that prevails, that the close of the war is at hand, and to that impression Mr. Lincoln's admissions have not a little contributed.

In their comments on the Presidential Message the French papers appear to have been guided solely by their party bias. The Debats, the Temps, and the other journals whilst they attack despotism on this side of the Atlantic, uphold it on the other, praise it for those very qualities of which to all impartial minds it is utterly destitute. The Debats, would you believe it, praises it for its "dignity"—the Temps admires it for its wisdom!

Illic prævertantur amatores quod amici, Turpia decipiunt cæcos vitia aut etiam ipsa hæc Delectant—

In short, none of the New York prints approaches the French admirers of Mr. Lincoln, in their sham enthusiasm. The Constitutionnel alone seems to appreciate the Message with fairness, and draws from it the inference which it has led to everywhere in England—that he is completely puzzled and bewildered at the dreadful position of affairs, and feels himself unable to cope with the crisis which he has had the greatest share in bringing about. The Constitutionnel, in replying to attacks from the Debats, and the Siècle, points out with much truth that the cause of the South is that of individual liberty—but its opponents do not venture to enter into a controversy on that delicate ground, and retaliate by upbraiding it with supporting slavery.

The relations between France and the Federal Cabinet, are, it is said, rather more than cool, and every mail from America is likely to increase the coolness. It does not appear that the victims of Butler's spoliations in Louisiana have appealed to France for protection, but this petty tyrant's persecution of French subjects, has, I have reason to believe, given rise to an animated exchange of notes between the two Governments.

The news from Italy continues very unsatisfactory. There are apprehensions—too well founded I am afraid—of another ministerial crisis, owing to dissensions in the Cabinet. Meanwhile, it would seem that the French Government is about to give Italy a practical mark of ill-will, by refusing the forthcoming Italian Loan to be quoted at the Bourse.

Within the last day or two, there have been rumours of a diplomatic rupture between France and Spain, in consequence of a speech of M. Calderon Collantes in the Cortes on the Mexican question. According to the Moniteur, the difficulty has been smoothed over; M. Collantes having declared that he had been incorrectly reported when he was represented as having charged the French Minister with wilfully misrepresenting the intentions of the Spanish Government, as expressed by himself in conversations with M. Barrot.

The Emperor's visit to Ferrières, the seat of Baron Rothschild, has afforded the town what it very much wanted—something to talk about—it is a relief now and then to turn aside from politics—dulce est desipere in loco—and the town has talked about it with a vengeance. Want of imagination has never been a French failing, and both the financial baron and his illustrious guest would be not a little surprised were they to hear all the smart things they said, and the wonderful amount of business they contrived to transact, during a short December afternoon. The makers of epigrams, and other good-natured souls

Skilled with a touch to deepen scandal's tints;
With all the kind mendacity of hints, have actively employed their talents in finding out a motive for the visit, but such gossip, amusing though it be, is too decidedly personal a character to find its way into print anywhere save in the latitude of New York. If the description of Ferrières given by the papers be correct, its splendour is quite sufficient to account for the honour paid to its owner—you must not expect a detailed description of all its marvels, a task which would tax the combined powers of the great George Robins, and the immortal Jenkins, and moreover, I confess my total incapacity to describe upholstery, be it ever so splendid. The great feature at Ferrières is its central hall—a room, which I believe, has only its parallel in some of the ancestral mansions of England. It forms a square of 160 feet, and is 60 feet high. In this noble apartment, pictures, cabinets, statues, tapestry from the gobelines, and all the artistic treasures that money could purchase and taste select, were grouped in picturesque profusion. The rest of the mansion is on a corresponding scale, and I can readily believe that not one of the Imperial palaces presents such a combination of magnificence, luxury, and comfort. The reception was worthy of the occasion, but it would appear from all accounts that the Baron fell into the great mistake of overdoing it, but the Emperor admired everything, and made his host feel in ecstasies with himself. His Majesty was asked to plant a tree to commemorate his visit and for this purpose, a golden spade, with an ivory handle, was put into his hands! The Emperor inquired would the tree grow fast? The gardener (there is always a gardener by on such occasions to manage the practical part of the business) replied, "Very fast, your majesty," whereon the Baron, in his comical German-French,—"Il aura beau grandir vite il ne sera jamais aussi grand que votre Majesté." Apropos of M. de Rothschild's bad French, the Figaro tells a story that will bear repetition. On handing the Emperor into the carriage on his return, the Hebrew banker is reported to have said—"Sire, je ne perdrerai jamais, le mémoire de ce jour." Your readers all know French well enough to be aware that "la mémoire" means memory, whereas le mémoire simply means the bill. Some people say that the mistake was intentional, and that considering that le mémoire is said to have amounted to £50,000, it is not likely that even a Rothschild would forget it in a hurry. £50,000, however, is a large sum to get through in a few hours' entertainment, consisting exclusively of a breakfast and a shooting party. Therefore, I do not think that the carte à payer could have amounted to any thing like that sum, even though the game included China and Japan pheasants, mandarine ducks, and even a wonderful parrot who squeaked "Vive l'Empereur," as he fluttered, mortally wounded to the ground. Even such courtly game could not account for such a sum unless, M. de Rothschild took a hint from a well-known Genoese banker in the last century, who had the honour to entertain the then Emperor of Austria, Joseph II., at breakfast. The meal was a very plain one, but it came out in due time that the only fuel used in its preparation had been Austrian bank-notes, and that 5,000,000 of florins (about £100,000), had thus been consumed. The cheapest, and at the same time, the most sumptuous entertainment given by a subject to a sovereign, was that offered by Prince Narishkin to the father of the late Czar. It was got up with such magnificence that the Czar was fairly astounded, and requested to know what it had cost. Narishkin hemmed and hawed—"Really, your Majesty," &c. The Czar insisted; when Narishkin replied, "The fact is, sire, I am only twenty silver roubles (about £5) out of pocket." The Czar was amazed. Narishkin continued, "That is the sum I paid for stamps for the bills I have had to give." It is added that the bills were never taken up.

The Emperor's speech to the Chambers on the 12th proximo will dit on be very pacific.

M. Gramer de Cassagniac's new paper will be called La Nation, which he has about as much claim to represent as the celebrated Tooley-street tailors. The Independence states that the policy of the paper will be aggressive, and that he means to attack everybody.

M. Grandguillot, ex-editor of the Pays, is about to bring an action against the management of that paper.

As he has selected for his counsel M. Emile Ollivier, one of the opposition leaders, curious revelations are expected.

A VOICE FROM PHILADELPHIA.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

New Philadelphia, November 27.

Sir,—Your journal, which is regularly received by me, is read with much interest; you have done much to enlighten Englishmen concerning America and the Union of the States. American institutions have been but little understood by them, and it is only now that their own interests are opening their understandings to the truth. It has amazed many that your countrymen should for so great a length of time have neglected American affairs, and that with all their natural fairness they have prejudged, without knowledge, Southern society and Southern institutions in general. But when we see around us here the great mass of the Northern people exhibiting the most profound ignorance of the Constitution which is the bond of union between sovereign States—ignorant, too, of the fact that it is the State governments which protect, or should protect, the people in their rights of property and person, and that the central Government, as it is called, has but little to do with either the property or persons of its own citizens, which may be made evident to any who will examine the acts of Congress (the acts prior to the Lincoln usurpation, now attempting centralization and the ruin of State rights), and those of the State Legislatures, and the proceedings of the Courts, State and Federal—when we witness this ignorance exhibited at home, we are unreasonable to be amazed at the ignorance of foreigners on these same subjects.

Your views, and those of the English in general, discussing the war question and its probable duration, have not yet penetrated to a solution of the question.

The duration of the war will be found to be dependent on one of two events; first, decided and fruitful victories of the Southern armies; second, the financial ability of the Administration at Washington to conduct the war. As to the first of these, it would be idle to discuss their probability here; suffice it to say, however, that the Northern people fully believe in their own invincibility, and in the success of numbers; and if their armies should be defeated, but their own soil remain uninvaded, there are such vast and wide-spread interests interwoven with and dependent upon the war and the army, with its enormous corps of officers, the majority of whom are sprung from the lowest and most ignorant classes of the community; now receiving high pay; with the hundreds of thousands of rank and file also from the poor and labouring classes; together, also, with the legion of contractors and plunderers from all classes, but chiefly from the so-called "white kid upper-ten-dom," that with simple defeat, new recruits would soon be pressed forward to fill the thinned ranks and fresh contracts would be readily had to replenish lost and wasted supplies. These interests are so overpowering, being full present substitutes for the lost Southern trade, that as long as the sinews of war are unbroken, so long will Northern public sentiment sustain the war measures of whatever Administration may be in power. But these sinews of war, what are they? Not gold nor silver, for of the precious metals none are to be had; but Government credit, or, as it is termed, paper money; of such are the sinews of war.

The Administration at Washington, from the great resources of the country, can supply itself with all the munitions of war, and every necessary, without going abroad; and inasmuch as the people are still satisfied with its ability to redeem its credit, this is, under such circumstances, as exhaustless as the paper upon which it is printed, and at home it answers every purpose.

Now, this faith in the ability of the Government to pay its debts is based upon a faith in its ability to conquer the South and restore the seceded States to the Union, and then to exact by taxation and confiscation the means to meet a large part, if not the whole, of the debt. And the Administration, by means of its supporters, chiefly constituted of the press, the pulpit, and the plunderers and their dependents, is applying all its spare energies, together with deceit and falsehood (so freely practised), to persuade the people that this enormous debt, reaching at this time to at least the sum of two thousand millions of dollars, will be redeemed chiefly by the taxation and confiscation of property in the restored States; the North, they are told too, will be in a great measure relieved from the burthen, and the stimulus of present spoils keeps the war spirit alive; it is found necessary, also, to lull the people with the belief that the North is invincible; that the South is poor, starved, exhausted, and also full of Union sentiment; and last and most important of all, that the European Powers will never recognize the Southern Confederacy as a nation.

As long as the credit of the Government is untouched, the temptation of plunder and profit will hold the people to their faith in their invincibility, and in the exhaustion of the South; but once let it be known that European Powers have recognized the Confederacy as a nation, then will the interests of the people here at home bring into play their judgments; then will reason resume its sway; the North alone cannot and will not pay the debt; the veil will be rent asunder; every one will wish to realize on his 7-30 bonds; then no longer will greenbacks be received as legal tender; then will the bankruptcy of the old Government be immediate; then will come the revolution at the North.

It seems as though, stimulated by the demands for the vast armies and navy, every trade and occupation is now flourishing, not even excepting the clergy and physicians, and, indeed, I may say the strong-minded women, for these last find full occupation in superintending hospitals and supplying bureaus; the preachers are, some, nominally regimental chaplains, and if good Christians (?) they are exterminators of their Southern fellow-countrymen, and therefore favourites; they can draw their pay while sitting in their easy chairs at home; or many others eke out a respectable living as the agents of relief (job) committees, &c. The physicians are everywhere in demand, either for the army or hospital service. Iron, cotton, woollen mills, coal mines, ship yards, machine shops, are humming away at contract jobs, and prosperity seems to reign triumphant, and so it will continue to be until payment stops, which will be with European recognition.

The end will be, as regards the North, identical with that of the original Confederacy; each State of the North will resume its sovereignty; the remnant of the Union will be resolved into its original elements; each will renounce the concern at Washington, and each State will repudiate its share of the stupendous debt contracted by the central Government. Thus it will be realized where the real Government lies; persons and property will then be protected by State laws now on the statute books; but which by usurpers at Washington have been set aside; and as long as the State Governments exist, we will be saved from anarchy. At this moment there is ample power in the States to protect their citizens from the reign of terror enacted by the Administration at Washington, but the executive power of all the States, North, being in alliance with the central despotism, the minority whose rights are trampled upon are powerless to save themselves, they have no appeal. The great majority of the people finding it to their interest, as shown above, to side with the powers that be, either sustain them in their abuse of power, or, not being themselves the sufferers, are, as it were, passive aiders and abettors.

The minority here are subjugated not so much by the Lincoln Administration, as by the unscrupulous and ignorant majority. In short, a fraction of the people, who sympathise with the sufferings of their Southern fellow-countrymen, are rendered powerless by the most terrible of all despotisms, that of the mob.

Your obedient servant,

M. D.

THE BENCH AND BAR OF ENGLAND.—In the trial of Hudson v. the Benchers of the Middle Temple, Serjeant Shee, who was leading counsel for the defendants, ended his address in the following eloquent terms:—

Lord Plunket, once said the people of this country look to the Inns of Court as the portals through which their children may enter in the hope of inheriting honour and distinction. There, the highway is open to all—to the son of the peasant as to the son of the peer. Of all the institutions of the country—independent of the Crown and of the Government—there is none so truly in the possession of the people, and the citadel of public freedom, as the institution of our Inns of Court. Any man may take his son there and place him on an equality with the sons of the noblest and most distinguished in the land, and give him the opportunity of rising to the highest eminence in the country. Only once in the last hundred years has the second place in the councils of the realm—that proud place (after that of the blood Royal), next after the Primate of the Church—only once in a hundred years has that place been held by one not of the people; only once again, from the time of Lord Mansfield to my Lord, has that high seat (of Lord Chief Justice of England) been held by one for whom the tide of hereditary blood has not been driven back to its source in the fountain head of honour—obtained by professional distinction! I implore you, as you value the freedom of your country—as you wish well to your children, and your children's children, who may hereafter rise to the highest honour and distinction in this profession—I beseech you not to disparage, by a careless or hasty verdict, in favour of a gambler in character and in shares, one of the noblest institutions of the realm! Gentlemen, I leave the case with all confidence in your hands, and I trust that I have satisfied you I am entitled to your verdict."

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1862.

Amenities of American Diplomacy.

American gratitude is likely to become as proverbial as Punic faith. The part which England has acted in the present quarrel has been remarkably consistent and straightforward; and the only fault which any impartial observer could find in it is that of over-anxiety to keep the peace, and a consequent tendency to concede to the wishes of the North more than justice and fairness towards the South would have allowed; a tendency which is observable only in the action of the Government, and not at all in the feelings of the people, but which has been of substantial service to the Federal cause. The obvious policy of this country, at the beginning of the war, was one of jealous and hostile watchfulness against the North. A Minister who had consulted only the interest of Great Britain would have insisted on the strictest construction of every belligerent privilege claimed by the aggressors. He would have disputed, while it was something more than disputable, the validity of the blockade of the Southern ports. He would have exacted the most ample indemnification for every wrong or injury done to British subjects. He would have insisted on the immediate restoration of every British ship illegally seized, and would have treated with supreme contempt, the decisions of American Prize Courts, so long as the judiciary was kept in submission by despotic threats and actual military violence. He would have strengthened to the utmost our squadrons in the West Indies, and he would have given such orders to the Admiral in command as were given by the Captain-General of Cuba when the Blanche was burned in Spanish waters. He would have taken advantage of the foolish outrage of Captain Wilkes to demand such reparation for the crime, and the restitution of the kidnapped men under such circumstances, that Mr. Lincoln must have chosen between instant war and abject humiliation. He would have insisted on the recall of the American Ambassador, who, in a public speech at Paris, denounced this country, and expressed an anxious desire to be at war with her. He would have proclaimed neutrality; but he would have interpreted it as suited English and not American convenience. He would have admitted the war-ships of both parties, with their prizes, into British ports, and thereby at once ruined the commerce of the Northern States, and conferred an inestimable advantage on the Confederates. He would have ordered the Federal cruisers out of British waters on pain of instant destruction, after the first insult offered to a British port. He would have shut his eyes to all violations of the Foreign Enlistment Act, as was done when Garibaldi declared a war—legally piratical, however morally justifiable—against the tyrant of the Two Sicilies. All these things he would have had a perfect right to do; most of them he would have been perfectly right in doing. The Federal Government would have had no tenable cause of complaint; if it had been foolish enough to complain, its complaints might have been disregarded or answered contemptuously, in the certainty that they could not be prosecuted by war, and that if they were, war with the North would be a blessing to England. This is the course which the British Government might lawfully have pursued; the course which other Governments have taken under similar circumstances; the course which America pursued towards us during the Crimean war; the course which Mr. Seward would certainly pursue if we were at war with France or Russia now; the course which Lord Palmerston would have followed had he been guided simply by a desire to maintain the selfish interests of England so far as the rules of international law would allow. Had he done so, the Northern people would have had a right to hate us, but the Northern Government would have had some difficulty to discover a plausible casus belli. And in return for the hatred of the North we should have secured the friendship and alliance of the South; we should have turned the scale in favour of our friends and against our enemies; we should have done much to relieve the sufferings of Lancashire, and still more to secure for ever the safety of Canada.

We should have acted lawfully; but let us grant that such action would hardly have been honourable; that it would have been more worthy of America than of England; that it would have involved an amount of diplomatic sharp practice which would not be congenial to the feelings of the British nation. Still, had we done nothing more than abstain from pursuing our own interest to the utmost, had we so interpreted our neutrality as to give no advantage to either party, we should be entitled to the gratitude and admiration of the North. We should have made a great sacrifice—a sacrifice which they would not have dreamed of making—for their advantage. But this is not all our title to their good-will. In our anxiety to conciliate an enemy whom we could have crushed in a week we have done great injustice to a friend in sore need. We protected Northern commerce by closing our ports against the prizes of both parties. Had we not done this, the sea would have been so utterly unsafe for Federal vessels that the shipowners of New York and Boston would have been almost ruined. Our action in this matter, concerted with France and imitated, as a matter of course, by all other Powers, deprived the Confederates of a weapon which would have been of the greatest service to them; which might ere now have brought their enemies to terms. But we went yet further; on the demand of the Northern envoy, we made such regulations as practically deprived the Confederate cruisers of shelter in our ports—an unusual act, and one peculiarly hard upon a country whose own ports were under blockade. We endured with the extremest patience such wrongs to our subjects, such insults to our flag, as no other nation would have suffered. When an outrage was offered which, in the face of the world, we could not possibly allow to pass unatoned, we demanded in the most courteous possible form the least satisfaction that honour would permit us to claim. No other nation would have failed to demand the punishment of Captain Wilkes; Spain asked and obtained such reparation for a much smaller offence. Thanks to our gentleness, the commander of the San Jacinto has been sent again and again to blockade our colonial ports, fire on our vessels, and insult our flag with impunity. Nay, our Government has gone so far as to interfere—though abortively—with the shipment of arms for the South, though it has made no pretence of stopping their export to the North. It has refused to recognize the Confederate States; it has stood between the Government at Washington and the interposition of France. It has done all it could to conciliate the North, without absolutely committing acts of hostility against the South. And what is the reward of the partiality of the Cabinet and the forbearance of the nation? The Northern people swear to hate us till the last American now living has descended to his grave; the Northern Government insults us as no civilized Government has ever dared to insult us since the days of Charles II.

Englishmen forgive and pity the railing of an angry rabble; they cannot condescend to resent the impertinences of a press the least respectable and the least respected in the world. But Ministers and Ambassadors, American though they be, must be held accountable for language deliberately uttered and yet more deliberately published. When we find the Ambassador to Russia suggesting to his Government that they should offer to annex Canada, and send money and men to stir up revolt in India, and when we read this suggestion in an official Blue-book presented to Congress by the Secretary of State, we cannot consider it a mere piece of popular nonsense, unworthy of official notice. When Mr. Seward warns the British Government to consider what are likely to be the feelings of the American people towards Great Britain at the close of the present war, we feel that he has been guilty of an impertinence which ought to have been promptly and severely rebuked. But as if this were not enough, Mr. Seward has actually dared to write that “a war with England would be sure to unite North and South”—in other words, plainly and distinctly to threaten us with war as soon as he shall find it convenient to wage it. We are curious to know whether Mr. Adams read this despatch to Lord Russell; and if so, whether (as George III. inquired of the envoy sent to demand the surrender of the Danish fleet), he was received on the ground floor or in an upper chamber? It must have taken all the meekness of which the Foreign Secretary is capable, and all the warmth of his friendship for the North, to save him from some outrageous violation of the rules of diplomatic decorum.

Mr. Seward is apparently as ignorant as ever of international law and international courtesy. In June he wrote to complain indignantly of the purchases made by the Confederates in England, which he said afforded proof that the British Government did not enforce its professed neutrality. We should like to know what right the British Government would have to prevent the Confederates from buying whatever British subjects choose to sell; unless, indeed, from some reason of British policy, it choose to prohibit altogether the export of munitions of war. Is Mr. Seward so ignorant of the business of the War Department as not to know what large purchases have been made in England on Federal accounts? or, has he so faint a smattering of public law as to imagine that one belligerent may be allowed by a neutral country a privilege refused to the other?

If so, he is likely ere long to receive—perhaps has now received—an unpleasant enlightenment. He has, it appears, instructed Mr. Adams to demand from the British Government indemnification for the destructive exploits of the Alabama, “as having been made by British subjects in violation of the law of nations.” Now if it be true that there are British subjects on board the Alabama, it is also true that there are British subjects in the Federal army; and Mr. Davis might as reasonably demand from us an indemnity for the losses inflicted on Virginian citizens by the invading hordes of the North. The Alabama is a Confederate cruiser, commanded by Confederate officers, as much a Confederate man-of-war as the San Jacinto is a Federal man-of-war; and England has no more concern with her doings than with those of Russian or French ships. She is of British manufacture; so are vessels in the service of twenty different nations. Her guns are British; so are tens of thousands of Federal muskets. She was not armed or fitted out in England; we do not believe that she has broken any English law; but if she have, that rests between the Attorney-General and Mr. Laird. Suppose her builder, captain, or crew have contravened, as Americans allege, the Queen's proclamation of neutrality—what then? That is an offence against a municipal regulation, not against international law. The Queen's proclamation does not affect any but the Queen's subjects; it directs their conduct as her subjects, and for any disobedience they are answerable to the laws of their country. It imposes on England no new obligations towards America; it gives the Federal Government no rights which are not implied in the mere fact of English neutrality. And no neutral obligations have been violated in the case of the Alabama, which is as much within the ordinary privileges of neutral trade as the shipment of arms to New York. Mr. Seward's claim for indemnity is therefore as absurd as it is insolent; and it will cost the British Ministry dear if their countrymen should discover that it has not been answered as it deserves.

Mr. Seward does not reserve all his insolence for England. He has thought fit to inform France that she is not to think of setting up a monarchical or "anti-American" Government in Mexico; a piece of dictatorial folly for which France will care about as much as for the protests of M. Juarez. He has, it appears, caused Mr. Dayton to remonstrate at Paris against the recognition of the Southern States as belligerents; thereby eliciting from the Emperor his opinion of the utter impossibility of reunion; and he has succeeded in obtaining the assurance that "nothing would happen" even if France should propose mediation and the North should refuse. At least, this is the report Mr. Dayton gives of a conversation with M. Thouvenel on that head. As M. Thouvenel's successor, in spite of Mr. Dayton's assurance that it would be refused, soon afterwards proposed to England a tender of mediation, we are inclined to question the strict accuracy of this despatch. It may be that Northern Ministers, like Northern generals, are forbidden to report defeats or "reverses;" it may be that Mr. Seward's brag-gart insolence is softened to the ears of European Powers, and brought out in full force only for the benefit of his countrymen. If he have really written all that he has published, he must have an unlimited trust in the contemptuous patience of European diplomatists, and an almost heroic indifference to his own character with foreign nations and with posterity, to the credit of his Government and the honour of his country.

The Federal Balance-Sheet.

The people of Europe, after eighteen months' experience, have learned how to translate Federal telegrams, and extract the truth from the dross of falsehood which they contain. These despatches are made up from the intelligence contained in the Northern journals, which, as is well known, have not much character for veracity. It was expected, however, that serious State Papers, emanating from the War and Treasury Departments, would at least give unvarnished statements of the true condition of those branches of the Government; but our hopes have not been verified.

Mr. Stanton boldly declares that he has 800,000 men under arms, and 200,000 being equipped, making a million of persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five who have entered the service; this is more than half the number who voted for Mr. Lincoln in the entire Union, and those above forty-five far outnumbered those between eighteen and twenty-one years. Surely there is some mistake here. The Government may have a million of men under pay, but they are certainly not in the field or preparing to enter it. Bad as Mr. Stanton is, Mr. Chase is worse, because his figures are calculated to do more harm. Up to 1843, all the accounts of the Treasury were made to end with the calendar year. By the Act of August 26, 1842, the Secretary was required to furnish, at the December meeting of Congress, a complete report of the monetary affairs of the Government, making the fiscal year to end on the 30th of June, thus giving him five full months to prepare his accounts. Mr. Chase says that the public debt on the 30th of June, 1862, amounted to $514,211,371.⁹²/₁₀₀; but that "this amount of course does not include claims, but only that debt the evidences of which exist in the Treasury, upon its books, or in the form of requisitions in favour of creditors, or of disbursing officers. It is not probable that at the date named these claims will much, if at all, exceed the balance in the Treasury—namely, $13,043,546.⁸¹/₁₀₀." Now, when it is known that in peaceful times the Washington Government owes more in unsettled accounts than the funds in hand, what must we think of Mr.

Chase's remarks when he has full opportunity, between July and December, of ascertaining the "probable" aggregate of the unascertained indebtedness at the close of the fiscal year? On the 1st of July, 1860, the United States had an issue of bonds of $64,769,703.⁰³/₁₀₀, with unaudited claims of $10,000,000, and cash in hand $3,629,206.⁷¹/₁₀₀; in 1861, the figures stood by the books $90,867,828.⁶⁸/₁₀₀, in open account $30,000,000, the war having only existed sixty days; and funds in the Treasury $2,257,065.⁸⁰/₁₀₀. Yet we are told that $13,043,546.⁸¹/₁₀₀ will "probably" cover any unknown bills. The fact is, that the Government is now six months behind hand in its payments or settlements; the classes of securities afloat that do not reach Mr. Chase's portfolio, are "colonels' certificates" issued to the soldiers, who sell them at a discount, or pass them off to sutlers for their requirements; then comes quarter-masters' vouchers for goods delivered, which are followed, in the course of a few months, by "orders for certificates of indebtedness," and after a time the twelve months' notes are given in exchange. There have been emitted since the 1st day of July last the following securities and these have just been sufficient to pay the then outstanding demands. The expenditure since that period, which has been at the rate of $100,000,000 a month, has been met by the minor classes of scrip alluded to. In order to get a clear idea of the state of the finances on the 1st of July, 1862, it will be necessary to add to this $780,000,000 of paper paid out since that time, the bond notes, &c., that were acknowledged by Mr. Chase:—

And this frightful amount leaves nothing for bounties and other expenses that will appear upon the closing of hostilities. It will be observed that only a small amount has been funded, and as the "certificates of indebtedness" mature, they will have to be paid, and in the second year, the first season's cost will have to be settled for over again. Nearly all the channels of currency and credit have been filled up, and a few more issues will cause an overflow. During the Revolutionary war the Americans came very near returning to their allegiance to the British throne, in consequence of financial exhaustion, but the States stepped forward and pledged their individual credit; and, in the second conflict with Great Britain, Mr. Munroe, the Secretary of War, found the finances in such a condition just before the battle of New Orleans, that he had to guarantee a portion of the public debt by giving liens against his private property. It is not at all likely that the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, with Democratic Legislatures, will extend facilities to the Washington Government; indeed, they are debarred from doing so by clauses in their Constitutions placing restrictions in dealing with the credit of their States.

Mr. Chase says that the aggregate circulation of coin, bank notes, and United States' notes in the "loyal" States on the 1st of November, 1861, prior to the suspension of specie-payments, was $355,140,000, [coin $210,000,000, bank notes $130,000,000, and United States' notes $15,140,000], and after gold and silver were displaced, the entire circulation of Government and bank notes touched $377,101,000—viz., the former $210,101,000 and the latter $167,000,000—and that "the whole, or nearly the whole, increase in the volume of currency which has taken place was, it is believed, legitimately demanded by the changed condition of the country in the year between the two dates." No wonder that this should be the case when so much "currency" was disbursed among the masses. Since the 1st of November there have been issued another $100,000,000 of United States' notes, which must have forced in a corresponding amount of bank paper, and hence the remonstrances now being made by those institutions. It seems, too, that the deposits in the banks increased in the same twelve months from $261,000,000 to $344,000,000, and the loans made by them from $607,000,000 to $677,000,000.

At last advices, the Federal Treasury was nearly empty, the most pressing demands were made upon it; the limit of United States' notes had been reached; less than $100,000,000 of the twenty years 6 per cent. bonds had been disposed of; although the Act of Congress authorized an issue of $500,000,000; but the people would not purchase, notwithstanding they were in every broker's hands for sale; the whole of the 730-100ths notes due on October 1st, 1864, had been paid out, and nothing was left but the postage stamp currency. It is proposed now to issue more bonds; but if they did not find a market a year ago, how can they be placed at this time? It is also suggested that a further amount of United States' notes should be put in circulation; certainly, they cannot more than occupy the space of the bank notes now out ($67,000,000) and when that currency disappears, there will be nothing but "greenbacks," which must at once become worthless; at present they are assisted by the credit of banking paper, which has private property as security for its redemption. As to the idea thrown out that the corporate institutions should be compelled to invest their capital in Federal securities, and deposit them with the Government against their issues, it is not only unconstitutional, but absurd; in order to do so the banks would have to dispose of their State Stocks, now pledged for the same purpose, and where are the customers to be found for these securities? The amount also, as is shown by Mr. Chase, would be very inconsiderable. In connection with these ridiculous propositions, it is remarked that the domestic exchanges would be regulated; this is equally fallacious, the $300,000,000 of Mr. Chase's notes have failed to effect the balance of trade between the States. It is as impossible to avoid discounts and premiums on bills of exchange, in a country of such large geographical proportions as the United States, as it is between nations. A Bank of England note is worth what its face calls for anywhere in these islands, because they are limited in their area, and from the fact that all large sums are made payable in London. New York, to be sure, is the financial centre in America, but all the commercial transactions of the country are not retired there. The Bank of the United States did not accomplish such a result, except in a partial manner, and that was done sometimes at great loss to itself, and at other times by suspending or increasing its line of discounts at particular branches, to the annoyance of the mercantile community.

It is very inexcusable in Mr. Chase withholding the truth in reference to the condition of his department, and more outrageous in his attempting to estimate the expenditure for the years 1863 and 1864 upon the basis of his partial figures for 1862, particularly when, according to Mr. Stanton, the army is now double what it is stated to have been on the 30th of June last. The Federal debt in 1864 will be, if the war goes on, at the lowest estimate $4,000,000,000.

The only sensible portion of Mr. Chase's voluminous report is the suggestion that the half-eagle

Catholic Church. If we are to allow the quibble about the Major's faith to set aside that marriage—a ceremony publicly performed by an authorized minister, and with due ecclesiastical licence—what security is there in any marriage performed in Ireland? How do we know that some paltry quibble may not be started to prove it invalid? Did Major Yelverton intentionally deceive her, and did he kneel with her at the altar and knowingly take false vows? Then how can we take this man's oath, that he did not at that time profess to be a Catholic? If he did not intend to deceive her the marriage is morally, if not legally, binding. It would be a cruel thing to declare that Theresa Longworth is not his wife, though if such is the law no consideration of pity will interfere with the decision. We are not surprised at the public sympathy with the unfortunate lady.

But what of Mrs. Forbes? Her case is, if possible, even more heartrending. She was guilty of no act of imprudence; she, the mother of a young family, a lady of fortune, holding a high and honoured position in society, is asked in marriage by the Honourable Major Yelverton, and she marries him—according to a form and ceremony which is indisputably binding in Scotland. Is she to be told that the man she had lived with as his wife is not her husband?—that what children she may have by him are bastards? If so she will have cause to curse the secret marriage system of Scotland, and the sham marriages that are permitted in Ireland. However this case may end it must seal the misery either of Theresa Longworth or of Mrs. Forbes (we are obliged thus to name the ladies, for we know not which is the Major's wife), and even she who is declared the wife, might, we should think, almost envy the disgrace of the other.

And what of the Honourable Major Yelverton? What does the author of so much misery and woe suffer? Nothing. Say what we will, there is to some extent in this country a more lenient law for the rich than for the poor. If instead of being an "Honourable" he had been in an obscure position, he would long ere this have had to answer to the charge of bigamy, and we much question whether he would have been able to escape punishment by asserting that he intended a deception in Ireland, and that he took false oaths at the altar to please or quiet the conscience of Theresa Longworth. Every person punished for bigamy who is not well up in the subtleties of the Scottish law, and the peculiarities of the law as sanctioned in Ireland, may reasonably think himself hardly dealt with whilst Major Yelverton is not called to any account for conduct that has made two respectable ladies miserable; that has made one or the other of them a mistress when she thought herself a wife.

Reviews.

THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT IN AMERICA.*

Most visitors to Niagara Falls must have noticed a small daguerrean's shop in a spot whence one of the best views is obtained. The "artist's" specialty, judging from the display in the windows, appears to be, to make the mighty cataract do duty as background to the portraits of his patrons. The harmless vanity which delights in having insignificant little self set-off by one of nature's sublimest spectacles is the more amusing from the obvious unconsciousness of the irresistible effect of the contrast thus challenged. Of nothing so much do the two volumes before us remind us. The reader, on turning the last page and endeavouring to define the general impression produced on his mind, is confronted by a full-length portrait of William Howard Russell, L.L.D., the photographic minuteness of which is brought into striking relief by an imposing spectacle of warring nations serving as the background.

It is impossible to conceive circumstances more favourable than those under which Mr. Russell visited America. The representative of the most influential press in Europe—a power, in Mr. Lincoln's opinion, greater than that of any potentate "except, perhaps, the Mississippi River"—he was certain of the most cordial reception at the hands of both parties, both equally eager to propitiate this great power, both convinced that on the manner in which their cause was represented to the people of England depended in no small degree success. It was a time, too, of profound agitation, when things appeared on the surface which lay at fathomless depths before—a period of transition, when old forms of thought had passed away and new ones had not yet become stereotyped; when men were changing their life-long creeds and speaking of yesterday as of the history of a remote past—a period, in brief, when the hearts of the two American nations lay, as it were, bare to the scrutinizing gaze of the historical psychologist.

Mr. Russell passed from the capital of Washington to that of Montgomery, met President Lincoln to-day, President Davis on the morrow; he crossed and recrossed freely the lines of contending armies, spent an evening with the general conducting a siege, the next day discussed the plans for defence with the commander of the beleaguered fort. In a circuit of several thousand miles he visited the most important towns North and South, making the personal acquaintance of most of the prominent citizens. Generals and naval commanders were eager to go with him over their maps and charts, to reveal to him their most hidden intentions, to explain the range and bearing of their batteries and the precise significance of each separate position. The Federal Secretary of State breaks off a friendly game of whist to read to Mr. Russell the draft of his next despatch to the British Government; the Confederate Under-Secretary of State in vain solicits Mr. Russell's advice as to the form of making out the commissions of privateersmen.

From a man so favoured with opportunities for observation, a man who could move, as if some Gyges' ring rendered him invisible, to and fro between countries at war, and assist at the counsels of rival diplomatists and antagonistic commanders—from such a man we might expect a work that should comprise and reveal all the world wishes to know about this gigantic struggle, its mysterious origin, and its probable termination. We have a right to expect that he has thought much and thought deeply upon all these subjects, and that as the result of this thought he would make clear to us not only the scenery and properties of the stage on which the tragedy is enacting, but the whole mechanism of the plot and the precise part assigned in it to each of the actors. Placing in a higher sphere, at an immeasurable distance above the excited bustling swarms of human pignions, as the Correspondent of the Times evidently felt himself, we have a right to look to him for the comprehensive views of the eye that surveys at one glance the vast area and sees each part in its true proportion to the whole. By a few bold masculine strokes of the pen we expected to find sketched off the national differences, whether inherent or the result of circumstances, and the incompatibilities of temper which have impelled two great and seemingly prosperous societies of British race, not only into political divorce but into the frenzy of self-destruction. Under the concentrated rays of light from every light-giving source, we hoped that the tangled subtleties of this complicated and contradictory quarrel would arrange themselves into intelligible tangible propositions. As under the magic touch of the sculptor's chisel, the living figures in the diorama would be made to stand before us in sharp and distinct outlines, singly and in groups, each in its appropriate dimensions and position.

Alas! for a still benighted world, Mr. Russell has disappointed these great expectations. What he has beheld from a distance he has seen through an inverted telescope; what he has approached closely he has examined through a magnifying glass. As well might we expect to read a man's character or take his intellectual measurement through a microscopic study of his epidermis, as through Mr. Russell's minute and often comic descriptions of peculiarities of appearance, dress, or speech. Punch's caricatures of social foibles and follies would form nearly as good material for a philosophical treatise on English manners and customs as Mr. Russell's photographic miniatures of men and scenes for a moderately correct conception of the national characters of either North or South. His reflections and deductions never rise above respectable commonplace, and are those of a mind which cannot seize more than one feature of a subject at one time. Were Mr. Russell modest we should not quarrel with him for a fault which is not more noticeable in him than in other travellers, and we should gladly accord him full credit for a merit with which few atone this fault in an equal degree—vividness and accuracy of description. But the figure in the foreground struts with such an offensive stride, talks so constantly and so flippantly, and has such a supercilious estimate of its own importance, that one does not know whether to be amused or angry, and forgets the background of the picture. The polite attentions bestowed upon the Correspondent of the great London newspaper are received by Mr. Russell as the just meed of his own transcendent abilities. He swallows with delightful credulity the more or less gross and often sarcastic flatteries of which he is the victim, and writes himself down in the evening into his Diary blissfully insensible of the quiet rebuff, the keen irony, or the scarce concealed contempt with which his superiors in age, station, or wit, have met his obtrusive impertinence. To one who knows personally some of the prominent figures in the piece—the quick intuitive reading of character and practised self-control of the life-long gambler in the most desperate games of politics, the cold haughtiness of the man of stern command, or the wily unctuousness of the man of counsels and shrewd devices—this diary of interviews and conversations is as good as a broad farce, in which Mr. Russell does not perform the dignified part he flatters himself. It would have been rather too cruel a blow at Mr. Russell's bump of self-esteem could he have heard or read the spoken and written versions of some of those very interviews he details. Long before he had completed his tour, his portrait had preceded him, and it was not such a one as Mr. Russell would have pronounced a likeness. In the South, at least, Mr. Russell was treated by gentlemen as gentlemen are wont, from self-respect, to treat strangers, even when they are not the correspondents of an influential foreign journal at a critical juncture of affairs; but we need not go beyond Mr. Russell's own narrative to discover that, in too many instances, he has been unscrupulously and mercilessly quizzed. Towards a man who meets others with the idea ever uppermost of enriching his Diary by a sprightly paragraph for future publication, and who, so to speak, draws a caricature of his hostess under the table, while she is talking to him, the proceeding is not, perhaps, altogether inexcusable.

Mr. Russell, as a military critic, is not the least curious feature of the book. He censures or praises, ridicules or approves, with a complacency and reliance on his judgment, which must have excited the unqualified admiration of officers by training and profession. His command of the technical vocabulary which he acquired in the Crimea betokens the veteran commander, and the glibness and profuseness with which he showers and scatters its terms cannot fail to duly impress the profane reader. In this capacity the public is already accustomed to admire him outside of his Diary, and we may remark en passant that his predictions are usually good omen to those against whom they bear. Apart from the fact that the works about which simple, confiding General Bragg could not help betraying his anxiety withstood, a few months later, with incredibly small loss of men, a four days' combined bombardment of fleet and fort, we have since found that the Confederates were on the eve of some of their greatest victories precisely when Mr. Russell's pen had doomed them to utter annihilation.

Mr. Russell's unconscious frankness as regards his individual self in a manner disarms hostile criticism. He himself naively tells us how he insulted the Confederate President at the first meeting by asking him for a safeguard, as if he were the despot over some Turkish pachalic, issuing firmans to travel safely through his dominions, and how the President quietly reminded Mr. Russell that he was in a civilized country; how he disputed with the Confederate Attorney-General the probability of England's recognizing the belligerent rights of the Confederates; how he suspected three inoffensive travelling companions to be spies about to be smuggled into the enemy's stronghold under his (Mr. Russell's) sheltering wings by a cunning functionary; and how, on divers occasions, it was attempted to extract from him—cautious, wide-awake Mr. Russell—military secrets to the prejudice of those whom he had visited as a neutral. He tells us how he stood in hourly dread of assassination among the Yankees, and how he felt scarcely more safe from the revolvers and bowie knives of the fire-eaters. He tells us how he refused an introduction to "Stonewall" Jackson, "a tall, lean man, ill-dressed, in a slouching hat and wrinkled clothes, standing, with his arms folded and legs wide-apart, against a wall, looking on the ground." In a word, he describes himself morally and intellectually with the same graphic power and fidelity of detail that he describes the physique of others. In this power of description he has indeed few equals and probably no living superior. The reader follows him as he would the wand of a showman at a moving panorama. It is impossible to mistake, once seen, a person or a landscape which he conjures up to the imagination. A book that has this merit cannot be otherwise than entertaining. Instructive in a higher sense we cannot pronounce it. The limner who paints a blacking-brush on the floor so truthfully that his friends stumble over it, is not thought to have given the highest evidence of art, nor employed art for those great purposes it is destined to subserve. Indeed, too servile an imitation of the reality of detail is seldom consistent with the reality of truth. Truth in writing, as in painting, consists in the selection of characteristic features and the representation of their correct proportions. Imagine a man's idea of a cheese or a drop of water, if his eye saw in either that world of mites and infusoria which, we are assured by the curious in such matters, form the bulk of both. Vulgarly and oddities of character abound in the ingredients of every nation, and to find them it is not necessary to travel across the Atlantic; but a gallery of specimens, no matter how cleverly drawn, would teach nothing of the tendencies, the qualities, or the capabilities of the nation from which they were selected. This is equally true of individuals. The more expressive a face is the more readily does it lend itself to a caricature. The most exalted intelligence is clad in a garb of mortality upon which the flippant seeker after trifles may indulge his propensity. The exaggerated importance attached to detail is Mr. Russell's forte and foible. To read his account of Bull Run, of which he saw only the rout, and not the battle, one is disposed to consider all the Northerners as arrant cowards. To read his descriptions of the other side of Mason and Dixon's line, one is tempted to believe that all the Southerners are swaggering bullies. The events of the last eighteen months have shown that though the type of both characters may be found in perfection, they are in neither case the representative types. The fact is that Mr. Russell is the king of reporters. Whether it be a review, a battle, or a landscape, his report thereon is perfect as a description. To this calling he is faithful, and wisely so. His mind does not expand with his subject, however sublime. He photographs the spectacle. Why should we exact from him to reason upon it as well.

We have endeavoured to judge this book in no partizan spirit, and in such a manner as a close acquaintance with many of the men and things it treats of compelled us to do. As the warm friends of the South, we should have many reasons to praise it; for Mr. Russell, while he evidently has no love for either the countrymen of Mr. Lincoln or those of Mr. Davis, has a lurking kindness for the South, and no doubt wishes it success. On the subject of slavery he shares the views of most Englishmen, and if he cannot rise above the hacknied cant which in certain quarters is received instead of a manly sound philanthropy, at least his observations and inferences are not glaringly unjust or absurd. In this respect the Diary is a remarkable indirect testimony that this subject was not uppermost in men's minds, either North or South, at the outbreak of the war, and that fears of a servile insurrection never entered into the calculations of the Southern leaders. And as we have felt called upon to say severe things about Mr. Russell's book, it is but common justice to recognize in it the one great redeeming virtue—that however faulty be his judgment, the author never pretends to describe what he has not seen, and even where he draws a caricature it is from an actual sitting.

The fate of the war in the West depended mainly on the part to be played by Missouri and Kentucky. In both States the people were much divided in feeling. Northern Missouri is to a great extent German and Abolitionist, though even there the Southern party were strong; Southern Missouri, a country of considerable estates, and suited for slave labour, was always attached to the South. Governor Jackson and the State Legislature were in favour of Secession, and the Confederates had counted on Missouri. But the action of the Federalists was too prompt and decisive to allow time for the execution of any Secessionist plans. The German soldiery of General Lyon and other Northern officers established a reign of terror at St. Louis, dispersed the State militia at Camp Jackson, near that place, and forced the Governor to quit the State capital, and betake himself to Boonville, whence he issued orders for the organization of a State army, appointing General Price to the chief command. That officer, a man of experience in war, and of great influence among his fellow-citizens, was unfortunately taken ill soon after his appointment, and the first engagement near Boonville took place in his absence. It ended in the orderly retreat of 800 ill-armed Missourians before 7000 Federals under command of General Lyon. This was on the 20th of June. On the same day the Governor, with a portion of these troops, quitted Boonville, and moved towards the south-west. Being joined by Colonel O'Kane, who had just dispersed a Federal detachment, and inflicted on it a very heavy loss, and by other reinforcements, he approached Carthage on the 5th of July, with 3600 men, of whom some 600 were unarmed, and the rest armed only with hunting rifles or fowling pieces; the only proper weapons being about 350 muskets taken from the enemy. At Carthage they were met by General Sigel with 3000 men. After a sharp encounter, the Federals were driven back on Carthage, whence they were compelled to withdraw by night, losing some 500 or 600 men, and several hundred muskets. The Missourians were next day joined by General Price, with General McCulloch (who, as a Confederate officer, soon afterwards took the command) and 2000 Arkansans. Marching on Springfield, they encountered the enemy under Generals Lyon and Sigel, on the 10th of August, at Oak Hill, where, after an obstinate resistance, the Federals were routed, losing 2000 men, among them

General Lyon, six guns, several hundred muskets, and several standards. Soon after this, the Missourians and Confederates fell back to the frontier of Arkansas. Thence, towards the end of August, General Price and the Missourians again marched northwards, and after one or two minor successes, on the 13th of September he reached Lexington, and drove the Federal troops there within their entrenchments. On the 18th he attacked the town, and on the 20th, after two days' hard fighting, the enemy surrendered. General Price took 3500 prisoners, 5 guns, 3900 muskets, and a quantity of other trophies. But Fremont was approaching with an overwhelming force, and General McCulloch declined to send reinforcements or supplies, which were likely to fall into the enemy's hands, so that General Price had no choice but to fall back towards the south. At Neosho he joined McCulloch; and here the State Legislature, convened by the Governor, passed an ordinance of secession. Again he was compelled to withdraw, and at Pineville he awaited the approach of the enemy. The removal of Fremont, however, paralyzed the movements of his army, which was withdrawn towards the north, pursued by Price, who occupied Springfield. It was not till the 12th of February that the enemy were able to resume the offensive against him; but their approach then compelled him to fall back into Arkansas, where he joined McCulloch. General Van Dorn took the command of the combined forces; and on the 7th of March gave battle to General Sigel. This encounter, called by the Confederates the battle of Elk Horn, had no decisive results; but it cost McCulloch his life, and Price a severe wound. The first year of the war closed, leaving Missouri in the hands of the Federalists.

Kentucky professed a determination to remain neutral. Her people were divided in sentiment, and she was anxious, if possible, not to become the battle-field of the West. And the Confederates were fully disposed to recognize her neutrality, which would have been to them at least as valuable as her alliance, covering, as it would have done, the northern frontier of Tennessee and a part of the western frontier of Virginia. But the Federalists were not disposed to tolerate the pretension of any State to such a degree of independence as would be implied in neutrality during a war for the maintenance of the Union. Nor could it well be expected that they should do so; for if this principle had once been admitted, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri might, by proclaiming themselves neutral, have made the invasion of the South almost impossible, and reduced the war to an absurdity. It is probable, therefore, that the purpose of the Northern party in Kentucky, in accepting the proposal of State neutrality, was simply to further the ends of the Federal Government, and prevent the State from declaring itself for the South before a Federal force could be collected to overawe it. At all events, this was the actual result. Several arrests of prominent Southern sympathizers were made or attempted in September 1861; recruiting for the Confederate armies was as far as possible prevented, and camps were formed in which levies from Ohio and Illinois, as well as Kentuckians of the Northern party, were drilled, armed, and organized for the invasion of Tennessee. Meantime, finding that the enemy were about to occupy Columbus, General Polk resolved to anticipate them; and he occupied that town at the beginning of September, and refused to withdraw on the demand of the State authorities, unless the Federals abandoned their menacing positions. On similar grounds General Zollicoffer entered Kentucky on the 14th of September, and some encounters took place, in which the Federals were disgracefully worsted; making, on one occasion, a "stampede" more scandalous than that of Manassas. On the 7th of November the forces of General Grant, from Cairo, assailed Belmont, near Columbus, on the Missouri side of the river. General Pillow was sent across with his division, and succeeded in beating them back after a desperate struggle, in which both sides sustained heavy loss. On the 20th of November a Convention of Secessionists assembled at Russellville, in Southern Kentucky, declared the State connection with the Federal Government dissolved, and negotiated its admission into the Confederacy. On the 17th of January, finding themselves in danger of being starved, and perhaps of being surrounded by the enemy, Generals Crittenden and Zollicoffer gave battle to a considerable Federal force near Mill Springs. At the critical moment the latter general fell; and his fall dismayed his troops, and caused the loss of the battle. This is called by the Federals the Battle of Somerset. Abandoning his camp, artillery, and baggage, General Crittenden retreated into Tennessee.

Bowling Green, in Kentucky, had been made the headquarters of the Southern army in the West, commanded by General A. S. Johnston. The enemy had collected large forces in that quarter, while General Johnston had not 25,000 men of all arms. He was unable, therefore, to prevent the capture of Fort Henry, which opened the Tennessee River, and was obliged to weaken his force most perilously in order to strengthen Fort Donelson, where on the 13th of February Generals Floyd, Pillow, and Buckner, with 13,000 men, were assailed by about 30,000 Federals, with gunboats and heavy artillery, commanded by General Grant. For the first two days the advantage rested with the garrison. But the great superiority of the enemy, and the hopelessness of reinforcement, made it appear impossible long to hold their position, and they resolved to make an attack on the enemy, with a view of opening a retreat. They were beaten back, after nine hours' fighting, with frightful loss. Generals Floyd and Pillow, with a part of the force, escaped in the night; General Buckner surrendered the place the next day, with 5000 men. President Davis evinced his displeasure at the conduct of the two former by relieving them from command; a course not at all approved by the historian of the "First Year of the War," but which appears just in the eyes of most who consider the effect which their conduct was likely to have on the discipline of a half-organized army. In the meantime General Johnston had fallen back on Nashville, which the fall of Fort Donelson forced him to abandon, to the great distress and terror of the inhabitants. Partizan bands continued to harass the invaders after they had occupied the city, while General Johnston retired on Murfreesboro' and organized a line of defence for the protection of the Valley of the Mississippi and the railroad system of the South-west. Of this position the key was Island No. 10 on the Mississippi. That island was defended by General Beauregard for above a fortnight, under a terrific bombardment, which effected scarcely any mischief. But on the 5th of April his presence was required elsewhere; on the same night the enemy succeeded in getting in the rear of the island, and on the 7th it was abandoned with a disgraceful and disastrous haste. Generals Johnston and Beauregard had fallen back, and concentrated all their troops on the junction of two of the principal Southern railroads, where they received large reinforcements. General Grant followed, and established himself with about 45,000 men, the flower of the Federal armies, at Pittsburg Landing, on the west bank of the Tennessee. General Buell was hastening, by forced marches from Nashville, to join him. On Sunday, the 6th of April, the Confederates attacked the enemy's camp at Shiloh, taking him completely by surprise. While he was forming line the assailants, about 38,000 in number, were coming up in all directions, and drove the Federals from one position to another by a series of desperate charges. Leading on one of these, General Johnston received a wound which severed a small artery in the thigh. He took no notice, but went on giving orders till, exhausted by loss of blood, he fell from his horse and died. But by that time the victory was secured, and gradually the enemy was pushed back until his dispirited and demoralized forces were crowded within a circle of half or three quarters of a mile around the landing, expecting the final charge which should drive them into the river. But General Beauregard, unaware of their condition, and apparently believing that they had fortified this position, drew off his troops, which were weary with long marches and twelve hours' fighting. In the night Buell's forces crossed the river; and at six next morning the battle was resumed by them. At one General Beauregard resolved to withdraw, and retired in excellent order to Corinth. His loss in killed and wounded was about 9600; in missing nearly 1000—proportions which testify to the skilful generalship of the commander, and the excellent discipline maintained by the troops on the retreat.

By land, the Federals had not won a single important victory; their only successes in the West had been achieved by the overwhelming numbers which had prevented the Confederates from keeping the field in Kentucky and Tennessee, and the gunboats which had reduced their fortresses on the rivers. The latter arm had been doing terrible execution elsewhere. On the 29th of August the Federals had taken the forts at Hatteras Inlet, North Carolina, with 600 prisoners; on the 7th of November they seized Port Royal, in South Carolina. A more important disaster occurred in the beginning of February. Roanoke Island, North Carolina, was attacked on the 7th, by an expedition under General Burnside, and compelled to surrender the next day. The disaster was so serious as to provoke inquiry in Congress; and a Committee reported in a sense which conveyed a severe censure on the Secretary for War; a censure which, however, President Davis thought it his duty to disregard. The inculpatated Minister was shortly afterwards appointed to the higher but perhaps less important office of Secretary of State. General Burnside's expedition captured Newbern, North Carolina, on the 4th of March; Fort Pulaski, the defence of the Savannah River, Ga., surrendered on the 11th of April; and on the 25th Fort Macon, North Carolina, commanding the entrance to Beaufort Harbour, yielded after a twelve hours' bombardment. But a greater disaster—the greatest of the war—was the next consequence of the enemy's naval superiority. On the 24th of April a powerful Federal squadron engaged Forts Jackson and St. Philip, at the mouth of the Mississippi, and in a few hours succeeded in passing them. The rafts and other obstructions which were to have detained the assailants under the guns of the forts had been washed away by a sudden and unusual rise in the river; and by the same cause the rifle pits established along the shore were submerged. The water defences of New Orleans—gunboats, steam rams, and floating batteries—were either unfinished or insufficient, and the Crescent City was pronounced indefensible. General Lovell withdrew the garrison to save the town from bombardment; and on the 25th, when the hostile fleet appeared in sight, cotton, ships, and other property were committed to the flames; the first article alone being worth over £300,000. The enemy appeared before the city, and demanded its surrender. A correspondence went on for several days, during which the citizens began to fancy that there was yet a gleam of hope. But the news that the forts had surrendered dispelled all such delusions; and on the 1st of May the infamous General Butler entered and took military possession of the unhappy city. The Mississippi Valley was now at the mercy of the Federal flotilla; and the greater part of Louisiana was practically, for the time being, lost to the Confederacy.

We return to the operations in Virginia, which had not been of much importance during the latter months of 1861, and the beginning of 1862. An indecisive campaign resulted in the abandonment of North-Western Virginia and the Kanawha Valley in the beginning of the winter. One event only disturbed the autumn rest of the two armies that watched one another along the Potomac. On the 20th of October General Stone crossed the river about six miles from Leesburg, with some 7000 or 8000 men; the advance being led by Colonel Baker, Senator from Oregon. The Confederates under General Evans, about 1800 in number, attacked them soon after their landing, before the whole of their force had crossed, and after a good deal of hard fighting, drove them back upon the bluffs that rise from the river, and there routed them completely. In such a position, driven down steep heights into a broad river, the losses of the Federals were, of course, terrible. Colonel Baker had fallen earlier in the engagement; and 1300 men were killed or wounded, and above 700 taken prisoners, with 1500 muskets and three guns. The Confederates lost 150.

On the 22nd of February the permanent Government of the Confederate States was organized. On the 8th of March, the Virginia iron-clad ram left Norfolk to attack the blockading fleet in Hampton Roads. We need not tell over again in detail the story of that memorable engagement, so familiar and so startling to all the world; the sinking of the Cumberland, the burning of the Congress, the disabling of the Minnesota, and the retreat of the Monitor. No event of the war created half so much excitement in the North or in Europe. The merchants of New York, in their terror, prepared to block up their harbour in order to save the city; and the politicians of all European countries were full of questions, doubts, and discussions concerning the comparative efficiency of different forms of iron-clad vessels, and the effect which the lesson of Hampton Roads might have in revolutionizing naval warfare.

Soon afterwards the line of the Potomac was abandoned by General J. E. Johnston; and General Jackson, after a brilliant but not successful dash at General Banks's force near Kernstown, retired towards Richmond. It was on this occasion that General Ashby (then Colonel) signalized for the first time his brilliant qualifications as a cavalry officer. The enemy did not follow either retreating force. McClellan had made up his mind; and before long his army was landed on the Yorktown Peninsula. With his arrival there ends the history of the "First Year of the War." To his record of that history, however, Mr. Pollard has appended a sketch of the Seven Days' Battle on the Chickahominy, which is not the least interesting portion of his book.

For that book, as a whole, we cannot say much. It is written in bad style and bad temper; it is censorious without knowledge, and clumsy beyond endurance; diffuse about trifles, and concise where fulness is most desirable; careless, hurried, and puzzling; altogether as unreadable a book as prejudice, self-confidence, and reckless haste can enable a man to write on so interesting a subject.

SHORT NOTICES.

Marion Leslie: a Story. By the Rev. P. BEATON, M.A. (London: Hurst and Blackett.)

This will be considered a very good story by those who understand the art of skipping, that is, who can pass over the pages devoted to description and reflections, without missing any incidents of the tale. Mr. Beaton is undeniably tedious, but he has not written for the purpose of filling up space. It is evident he thoroughly understands the scenes he describes; and his pictures, though too full of details to be effective, are, nevertheless, taken from life. Marion Leslie is brought up with "Stormy Jack," a boatman, residing in a Scotch fishing village. The son of this worthy is enamoured with her, and the course of his true love is interrupted by the death of the son of a Laird, her uncle, which event makes Marion an heiress. She is removed to the Castle, and sent to Paris for her education. Nimian, her lover, in order to render his condition more suitable, proceeds to a Scotch University for the purpose of studying for the ministry. The young couple correspond, but in a style very different from that which we are accustomed to see when love letters are read in "breach of promise" cases. Marion is not faithful, but marries a Laird Nairn, who makes a terribly bad husband, and dies, leaving his widow in poverty, for in the meantime the Laird has lost his fortune. After a series of exciting adventures, Marion marries her first love, who comes into an ample fortune. This is a mere outline of the plot, of which the interest is well sustained.

The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson. By the Author of "The Recreations of a Country Parson." (London: Strahan and Co.)

This is a volume of essays, not sermons; but preachers might adopt the style with advantage. Sermons are generally dull, which is much better than the comic compilations which have lately been somewhat popular; but of all sermons, that is best which is interesting without being humorous. A "Country Parson" has the happy faculty of making common things pleasant, and of giving expression to thoughts and feelings in which his readers thoroughly sympathize. The charm of his essays consists in that conversational mannerism which, though sometimes prolix, is never wearisome. He also has the art of being egotistical without being offensive. His essays are always fresh and vigorous; and even when they are paradoxical they are instructive as well as amusing. We know no author who identifies himself so thoroughly with the thoughts and feelings of his readers as does a "Country Parson."

Bacon's Guide to American Politics. (London: Sampson Low and Co., and Bacon and Co.)

This is a useful compilation, containing many official documents and statements which will enable those who are not quite au fait with American politics to understand and follow the present course of events. The Constitutions of the Confederate States and the United States are given at length, as well as the ratifications of the latter, which are exceedingly important in properly appreciating the articles of the Constitution. Amongst the differences between the two Constitutions, it is noted that in the Confederate Constitution,

The importation of negroes of the African race from any foreign country, other than the slave-holding States or territories of the United States, is forbidden, and Congress is required to pass such laws as shall effectually prevent the same.

According to the census of 1860, the population of the nineteen free States was 18,907,753, and of the fifteen slave States 12,243,293. In the former, the assessed value of real estate and personal property was $6,541,027,619, and in the latter, $5,465,808,957; that is, having only a population equal to two-thirds of the former, its worth is only one-sixth less. The number of live stock in the free States was 39,873,263, and in the slave States 40,506,730. We may learn from these returns why the North is so anxious for reunion.

THE POSITION OF MARYLAND.

A citizen of Maryland writes to the Columbia (South Carolina) Guardian as follows, defending his State against the suspicions cast upon her that her people had wantonly neglected the opportunity to rise and join the Southern cause:—

(To the Editor of the Columbia Guardian.)

COLUMBIA, October 10, 1862.

A sense of duty to my native State induces me to make an effort to controvert the false impressions produced by the recent movements of our army into Maryland.

I regret very much that many persons seem to have lost confidence in the State because her people failed to flock to our standard during the few hours it waved over her territory. I have been provoked to a painful extent by the unjust and unreasonable remarks from the lips of intelligent men, who have so readily and hastily made up their judgments in the case.

I propose to prove that Maryland is as much entitled to their confidence now as at any previous time; that she is devoted to the Southern cause, and anxious to assist in the accomplishment of Southern independence.

I profess to know the sentiments of the people, and I unhesitatingly say that seven-tenths of them are anxious to dissolve the connection between their State and the Federal Government, and unite with the people of the South.

Maryland has not been allowed to exercise the rights of a free and sovereign State since the Federal Government has taken military control of her soil.

For the purpose of arriving at the true and legitimate position of the people, we should go back to the period when they were free to express their views and sentiments, and before the State was occupied by Federal troops; when they exercised the rights of freemen, and were not subject to the control of military law, and kept down by the power of an armed and brutal soldiery.

The people of Maryland believed that the election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency of the United States would result in the destruction of the Union, and they regarded that act as sufficient to justify the Southern States in withdrawing from the Federal compact, and they not only cast the full vote of the State against the candidate of the Republican party, but elected by a large majority a Legislature composed almost entirely of Secessionists. And when Mr. Lincoln assumed the duties of the high office to which he had been called by the sectional party of the North, he found the State of Maryland in the hands of a people hostile to his Administration.

The city of Baltimore, embracing nearly one-half of the population of the State, was in the hands of the Southern Rights party—the Mayor, Police Commissioners, and members of the municipal Government being all Secessionists, and were elected by majorities, ranging from 8000 to 10,000, and their State and city officials represented the sentiments and reflected the opinions of the people, having been properly, legally, and constitutionally elected for that purpose. By their acts in behalf of the Southern cause, and their sufferings on that account, let the State be judged.

As soon as it was known that South Carolina had withdrawn from the Union, and the great question of dissolution was, by this act, presented to the people of the States, petitions from all sections of Maryland were sent to the Governor, T. Holliday Hicks, urging him to convene the Legislature for the purpose of enabling that body to meet the great issue thus presented.

This he refused to do for several months, although a large majority of the people had joined in the petitions referred to, and it was not until the Massachusetts troops on their way to the Federal capital, were attacked in the streets of Baltimore, and the blood of our people had been shed, that he consented to do so, fearing the indignation and wrath of an outraged populace would visit him with the punishment he deserved, if he longer refused to grant their prayers.

On the same day that the fight took place with the Massachusetts regiment, two Pennsylvania regiments were driven back to the city of Philadelphia, and it was the determination of the people to prevent the passage of troops at all hazards; and the fact was exhibited in the destruction of the bridges, cutting off the communication between Baltimore and the North, and for many days the Federal Government was prevented from marching a single armed soldier to the protection of the national capital, through the city of Baltimore.

The troops from the North were forced to reach Washington by the way of the Potomac River and the Annapolis Railroad, during which time the citizens of Baltimore, aided by large numbers from the counties, were standing in an attitude of defiance to the Government.

To show with what pertinacity and determination they maintained the bold position thus assumed, it is only necessary to point to the fact, that 10,000 Pennsylvania troops, under General Wynecop, having reached Ashland Furnace, fifteen miles from Baltimore, on their way to Washington, were compelled to return to Harrisburg; 20,000 citizens of our State being in arms to dispute their passage; and it was not until Lincoln had assembled 50,000 troops in Washington, by the indirect route mentioned, and covered the Potomac River with his "gunboats," thereby cutting off the communication between Maryland and the South, and all hopes of assistance from our Southern friends, and when longer resistance under such circumstances would have been madness, that he undertook to march his troops through Baltimore, and commenced to perpetrate the outrages upon the people of Maryland which he has continued to practice up to the present hour. He now claims that Maryland is a Union State. He has converted her to the cause of the Union, and under the protection of Federal bayonets she now votes the Union ticket.

There are a certain number of men in Maryland, as elsewhere, sufficiently degraded to vote under such circumstances, and from these only has there come an approval of Mr. Lincoln's policy—an approval given not by the respectability and intelligence of the State; that is to be sought in Forts McHenry, Lafayette, and Warren, or in homes turned into prisons, or at best, in disgusted abstinence from elections, which have become mockeries.

By such outrages has the State been placed in the hands of Union men. The Administration now in power is not the one elevated by the people; its principles are not those which they sustain, and its members were never honoured with their confidence, and this once proud State no longer stands erect and free at the altar of constitutional liberty, but lies bleeding and suffering at the footstool of tyranny. She no longer enjoys the rights and privileges bequeathed to her by our fathers, purchased by the blood of her children, and guaranteed by the Constitution of her adoption; but, chained and fettered, breathes out her miserable existence.

Her voice is no longer heard in communion and harmony with her sisters of the South, pleading for justice and equality, but is hushed to silence by the boasted advocates of free speech quartered upon her soil in opposition to the wishes of her people.

Sad is her fate, and pitiful indeed the condition of her gallant but oppressed children. The harp has fallen from their trembling fingers and lies shattered and broken around decayed and ruined altars, dedicated to a freedom and independence they no longer enjoy.

How long she must continue to suffer beneath this yoke of a military despot, God alone can tell. But we pray that the day of her redemption is at hand, and that ere long, clothed in her robes of purity, stained though they may be with the blood of her brave sons, she will rejoin her sisters of the South, and with them swell the anthem of deliverance.

I respectfully call attention to the following facts, representing the sentiments of the people of Maryland as exhibited by the action of the Legislature of their choice:—

On the 9th day of May, 1861, and after the Federal troops had been quartered on our soil, the Mayor of the city, the Police Commissioners, and many other prominent citizens arrested and sent to prison on the charge of treason, and our own city and State under the control of Federal bayonets, a report from the committee on Federal relations was presented, "declaring that the war waged by the United States upon the people of the Confederate States was unconstitutional, repugnant to civilization and sound policy, and subversive of free institutions, and protesting against the military occupancy of the State as unconstitutional, oppressive, and illegal." Said report was adopted by a vote of 49 ayes to 11 nays in the House of Delegates, and a vote of 16 ayes to 5 nays in the State Senate.

And on the 5th day of August, 1861, the following Act condemnatory of the Lincoln Administration, for incarcerating the Police Commissioners, &c., was passed by both Houses, and by a vote equally as decisive:—

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That we solemnly protest in the name of the State and her people against the proceedings aforesaid in all their parts, pronouncing the same, as far as they affect individuals, a gross and unconstitutional abuse of power which nothing can palliate or excuse, and in their bearing upon the authority and constitutional powers and privileges of the State herself, a revolutionary supervision of the Federal compact.

Resolved, That we appeal in the most earnest manner to the whole people of the country, of all parties, sections, and opinions, to take warning by the usurpations aforesaid, and to come to the rescue of the free institutions of the country; so that whatever may be the issue of the melancholy conflict which is now covering the land with sacrifice and sorrow, and threatens to overwhelm it with debt and ruin, there may at least survive to us when it is over, the republican form of Government bequeathed to us by our fathers."

For such action in defence of the constitutional rights of the State, and in opposition to the outrages of the Federal Administration, a large majority of the members were arrested without process of law, and by a hired soldiery from other States, and sent to prison, where many of them still remain.

The principal object I have in view, and I must here crave your pardon for the length of this communication, is to place my State right on the record, and as I have no means to accomplish it without the assistance of the press, I beg you to bear with me.

In answer to the gentlemen who are under the impression that the people of Maryland failed to embrace the opportunity to redeem their State, I deny that such an opportunity has been presented, and assert that it has not been as yet in the power of her people to flock to the Southern banner, in consequence of the insurmountable difficulties and obstacles by which they are surrounded, and to which I shall hereafter particularly refer.

I am aware of the great pains that has been taken to make it appear that the State of Maryland is still for the Union. This has been done for effect in the Northern market, and to create the impression at home and abroad that Secessionism is fading away before the brilliancy of the Republican Administration. I know that Mr. Lincoln made the claim, and I shall show that it is not only groundless, but false. I shall, therefore, introduce some very important testimony, and shall leave my readers to judge of its reliability. I shall present the testimony without further comment than may be necessary to point out discrepancies, firmly believing that it will be sufficient to prove every point I have in view, and result in the complete vindication of my gallant, but much abused and misrepresented State, from the calumnies of her unprincipled traducers.

In Mr. Lincoln's Message of December 1861 I find the following remarkable passage. Speaking of Maryland, he says:—"She already gives seven regiments to the cause of the Union, and none to the enemy, and her people at a regular election (God save the mark!) have sustained the Union by a large majority."

So much for Mr. Lincoln's opinion, but let us hear "T. Holliday Hicks" upon the same subject. He was Governor of the State at that time, and his testimony should have some weight, for he has tried to outdo the President in his futile efforts to drive the people to the cause of the Union. In his Message, bearing the same date as the President's Message—December 1, 1861—to the General Assembly of Maryland, he says:—

"It is undoubtedly a strict duty, and also due to the pride and honour of the State, that you make immediate provision for raising and equipping Maryland's quota of the 500,000 volunteers called for by the President under the Act of Congress authorizing him so to do. I believe that quota can be raised without difficulty so soon as you shall advance the money to pay the expense of recruiting and equipping the troops."

President Lincoln says seven regiments have been furnished, &c.; Governor Hicks believes they can be raised.

In what manner the Honourable President and the worthy Governor will be able to reconcile the wide difference between them, which is at once so glaring and so palpable, I certainly am at a loss to know; but as one has the aid of the wily magician "Seward," and the other the services of the political juggler and renegade Virginian, "Henry Winter Davis," I presume they will devise a mode satisfactory to themselves, at least.

I also introduce as pertinent the testimony of Mr. Stephens, member of Congress from Pennsylvania. Shortly after the President's Message had been presented to the House, a debate took place on the bill authorizing the raising of a volunteer force for the better defence of Kentucky and the Border States, and Mr. Stephens used the following language:—

"I believe that the Secessionists would rise again to-morrow in Maryland if we withdrew our troops from there. I do not believe in the semblance of loyalty there, or that even that semblance would continue a day in the absence of the army. I do not know how Maryland can have seven regiments in our service, and none in that of the Confederates. I don't know how the President gets his facts, but I don't believe it myself. I believe the President is misled in the matter. I believe he is labouring under a fatal hallucination—unwillingly, no doubt—but as grievous as that under which Samson laboured with regard to the Philistines, when he was under the manipulation of Delilah."

In answer to Mr. Lincoln's assertion that "the people of Maryland at a regular election has sustained the Union by a large majority," I deem it necessary to say that there has not been a regular or proper election in the State since the Presidential election, at which time the vote in the city of Baltimore was over 32,000. At one of President Lincoln's regular elections, held in the city of Baltimore a few weeks ago, the vote polled was 4700, made up of the Germans, the contractors, the office holders, and the Yankee squatters. The General commanding in the State always gives orders just before an election for the arrest of all voters "suspected of sympathy with the Confederate States," that is, of every one likely to vote against the Union ticket; apart from which our people have no desire to participate in such farces as "regular elections" in Maryland are known to be under Republican military rule.

It is due to my State that I should say that she has not furnished the troops claimed by Mr. Lincoln, and I am satisfied she will never furnish one-fourth of her quota.

I take pleasure in stating that in December 1861 it was a matter of record in Richmond that she had 8000 young men beneath the Confederate flag. I have heard lately the number is at this time much greater, estimated at about 12,000, embracing four splendid field batteries and a number of excellent cavalry companies.

In this connection I submit the following from the Washington despatches in the New York papers, dated 5th instant.

"Another evidence of the sturdy treason of Lower Maryland is found in the fact that a large exodus of male population there is taking place into Virginia. The lower counties of the State will not be able to furnish more than a fourth part of their quota under the draft. If every male individual of Charles and St. Mary's counties were to be impressed, still the quotas of these two counties would remain unfilled. Most of the young men of this region are now serving in the rebel army."

The portion of the State visited by our army is the Union section. By reference to the map, it will be discovered that Frederick and Washington counties are embraced in the narrow neck of land lying between Pennsylvania and the disaffected portion of Virginia, and it is worthy of remark in this connection, that Governor Hicks, when he feared longer to resist the appeals of the people to convene the Legislature after the April riots, summoned them to meet in Frederick City, instead of Annapolis, the capital of the State, and the proper place, assigning as a reason, in his Message already referred to, that "he assembled them in the midst of a loyal population."

It is extremely unfortunate that our army crossed the Potomac into this portion of the State. It has not relieved the people, but has undoubtedly resulted in their being more closely watched and cruelly oppressed.

T. Holliday Hicks is no longer Governor of Maryland, nor the master of the people. I have not heard of him since he so magnanimously refused the commission of Brigadier-General in the Federal army, and so patriotically signified his determination to "take the musket instead of the sword."

I know, however, that he has retired to the shades of private life, and I must confess that I am convinced that this will result in "public good."

I rejoice that he has left on record the evidence of the disposition of our people to withdraw from the Union, and the despotic and outrageous manner by which he prevented them from so doing. To prove this it is not necessary to frame sentences for him. His own words are the best evidences of his despotism and treachery, and I propose to let him speak for himself. In his last Message to the Union Legislature, he says:—

"It was urged with great zeal, that the people of Maryland should have an opportunity of saying whether they would remain loyal to the Government framed by our fathers, or join the seceded States in their mad crusade against the continuance of the Union."

"It was alleged that if the Legislature should be convened, it would either call a Sovereign Convention, or submit to a vote of the people the grave question whether they desired such a Convention to assemble."

"I believed that I was thoroughly acquainted with the proclivities of a majority of the members of that Legislature. I was perfectly convinced that they desired Maryland to leap, no matter how blindly, into the vortex of secession. I believe the same to be true of the most of those citizens who so persistently urged the assembling of the Legislature. I was, therefore, unwilling to allow that body an opportunity so to misuse its great power, not doubting that, in imitation of the Legislatures of the then seceded States, it would exert that power to the great detriment of the people of Maryland."

"I was sure that through some juggle Maryland would be forced to secede. I need not speculate here in regard to the mode by which this would have been accomplished—whether by the bayonet or by some equally cogent or persuasive process. I merely assert that I believe the plans of the Secessionists would have been accomplished, if they had had the great power of the Legislature to aid them."

If the above extracts are insufficient to prove that the people of Maryland were favourable to secession, and anxious to unite with their sisters of the South, in their great and glorious struggle for freedom, then I respectfully invite attention to the following extract from the inaugural Message of his successor, Augustus Bradford, the present Governor. He is an old line Whig—Henry Clay was his political god. He worshipped him while living, and no doubt considers he is following his teachings and obeying his injunctions now that the great Union advocate and compromiser is no more. The Secessionists did not participate in the election, and Mr. Bradford was, of course, elected. His opinion of the State, and the sentiments of her people are not only interesting, but prove their Southern character and tendency.

"I trust that no consideration of the repose that we enjoy, nor any apparent acquiescence of the Secessionists in the result of our election, will prevent you from providing by every proper means against any contrivance they may be expected to adopt."

A CURIOUS STATEMENT OF GRIEVANCES.

The New York Times, the most temperate of the Republican organs, thus editorially delivers itself of a statement of "Our Real Complaint against England," the cause of that "detestation and disgust" which it admits to exist generally throughout the loyal States.

(From the New York Times, December 9.)

Now that it is settled that magnificent contributions of food will soon be sent from our shores toward the relief of the British operatives, Englishmen can afford to make a little effort to understand the real state of American feeling toward them and their Government. There is a great deal of misapprehension on the other side of the water in regard to this; and it has had the effect of causing multitudes of well-meaning men to think us extravagantly exacting and unreasonable.

What, then, is the real American complaint?

It is not, as Englishmen generally assume, against the official action of the British Government. With that action, thus far, we have no very great fault to find. It has been confined to four procedures:—First, the acknowledgment of belligerent rights; second, the proclamation of neutrality; third, the demand for the surrender of Mason and Slidell; and, fourth, the refusal to join France in intervention.

As to the first of these, it is true that we believe the raising of the rebellion to the level of a belligerent Power was improperly hasty—taking place as it did within a fortnight after the intelligence of the fall of Sumter. At least common courtesy, it would seem, should have dictated a postponement until the arrival of the new American Minister, Mr. Adams, which occurred immediately afterward. Yet, whatever we may think of the time chosen, the recognition in itself was proper. It relieved both England and our own Government from many embarrassments; particularly in giving unquestionable validity to our blockade, which, it is held, is a right that can exist only between belligerents, and in ridding our Government of all responsibility for the depredations of rebel privateers. To get free from other embarrassments, we have ourselves been obliged since to make substantially the same recognition of belligerent rights to the rebels.

The second procedure, the proclamation of neutrality, was commendable. No loyal American either expected or desired the British Government to be anything but neutral. True, the proclamation has not been faithfully carried out. It prohibited the supply of arms and ammunition to either belligerent, and yet they have been supplied to both in great quantities. We have perhaps derived as great an advantage, relatively, from this as the rebels, and do not complain on this score. In respect to the Alabama built, equipped, owned, and manned by British hands, to prey upon our commerce, we do not as yet understand that the vessel sailed with the actual consent of the British Government. It is said, on the other hand, that the Admiralty undertook to prevent that sailing, and failed only through mistake; and that effectual measures have been taken to avert a similar misfortune hereafter. We trust this is so. The wrong is undeniable. The counsel of the Crown has already decided this case of the Alabama to be a violation of international law. It is certainly contrary to what has always been our own construction of that law. When, during the Crimean war, the British Government complained that Americans built and sold vessels for Russia, our Government replied that, while it was allowable to sell and transport munitions of war, it was not allowable "to fit out, within the limits of the United States, a vessel to commit hostilities against any State with which the United States are at peace, or to increase the force of any foreign armed vessel intended for such hostilities against a friendly State."

In regard to the surrender of Mason and Slidell, Americans are content. Their own Government decided that international law, strictly construed, required it. That is enough. Whatever displeasure may have been occasioned by England's insisting upon the summius jus, under the peculiar circumstances, is more than balanced by our satisfaction that she has thereby committed herself irrevocably to the high American doctrine of the rights of neutrals, in denial of which she fought her last war with us.

The fourth act of the British Government—its recent refusal to unite with France in an attempt to press upon us an armistice—of course is well liked. Whatever may have been the motives of the Ministry in separating themselves from the French Emperor in this matter, the act itself is welcome; and it shall go, as it ought to go, to their credit.

If, then, the official action of the British Government thus far has done us no great injustice or harm, what have we to complain of? How happens it that there is all through the loyal section of the United States, such an intense hardness of feeling towards England? The answer is easy. It comes from the fact that the great body of the upper and middle classes of England have, from the outset, through almost every organ of their opinion, not ceased to defame, malign, and damage the sacred cause to which we have pledged our lives and fortunes. The Foreign Secretary, Earl Russell, took early occasion, in a public speech, to stigmatize the conflict on our part as a struggle for "empire," while the rebels fought only for "independence;" and, in his seat in Parliament, he did not hesitate to express his "trust that the North will at last consent to a peaceable separation." Other members of the Ministry have, time and again, used similar language. Nine out of ten of the members of Parliament, and other public men of England, have sided with the rebels in their public addresses. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of the publications of the kingdom—reviews, magazines, and newspapers—have unceasingly directed against us their sophisms, their sneers, and their invectives. From that source there has been from the start but one constant stream of misrepresentation and abuse. Because we have felt such abuse we have been only the more taunted. We should have been despicable if we had not felt it. No man worthy of the name will quietly endure a vilification of the cause he deems sacred. There never was a holier object than that which has moved the loyal twenty millions of these United States to maintain this struggle. They cannot composedly see it belied and maligned. It is impossible not to consider this protracted abuse but as an exponent of the feeling which animates the hearts of the ruling classes of England. It is so taken, and it will be so remembered. The insults and the injuries that are dealt in the day of misfortune are precisely those which rankle longest in the memory.

It is not the official action of the Government that has offended us; for that action has as yet done us no material injury. Nor is it the official inaction of the Government; for we would not have accepted its aid in any form had it been offered. Nor is it the withholding of business accommodations, even though Russia could borrow money in London to help her in the work of crushing Hungary, while loans were refused the United States that would have helped to save its free institutions. Every man, the world over, has a right to manage his business as he chooses. Nor is it the withholding of moral sympathy, even though it might have been expected that a nation so closely allied to our own in blood, language, literature, law, and religion—a nation which originally forced slavery upon us, and which afterwards made peculiar professions of hatred to slavery. Nor is it the contraband traffic which has been kept up with the rebels from the start, though Frenchmen and Belgians and Prussians and all other people have abstained from all such operations; remembering that Englishmen manufacture idols for the heathen, and tinge the Chinese for the privilege of selling opium, we know how to make great allowance for English greed. It is none of those things that disturb us. It is the studied, systematic, persistent reviling of our cause, which is to us as grand as liberty, as sacred as the memory of our fathers, as priceless as the national life itself—it is this chiefly which has filled us with detestation and disgust. Among the labouring classes of England there has been little or nothing of this. They have instinctively appreciated the real merits of our struggle, and under great trials have acted nobly. They are remembered. The other portion of England will also be remembered.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES, SUPERINTENDENT.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

On the 11th of December, twenty days after he had demanded the surrender of Fredericksburg under the penalty of being bombarded in sixteen hours, General Burnside ordered his forces to cross the Rappahannock. The Federals placed their batteries, mounting 176 guns, in position to command the passage of the river opposite the city, and at 5 o'clock in the morning the construction of the bridges opposite Fredericksburg was commenced, and at the same time, about three miles below the city, General Franklin proceeded to lay the bridges for the passage of his division. The works near the city were interrupted by the fire of the Confederates, and the pontoons had to be withdrawn. A second attempt was not more successful, owing to the deadly fire of the Confederate sharpshooters. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon the Federal batteries opened upon Fredericksburg, the Confederate pickets were withdrawn, a detachment of the Federals crossed in boats, and the bridges were completed. Forthwith, General Burnside transported the whole of his forces to the south side of the river, those under General Franklin having crossed a few hours' earlier. The Federal commander was pleased with the success of his movement, and does not seem to have been suspicious of the slight opposition that had been offered to the passage of his troops. The rejoicings in the North were very great, and newspaper correspondents gave glowing accounts of the clever manner in which Burnside had deceived the Southern commander. The New York Times' correspondent remarks: "There seems to be good ground to claim that General Burnside has succeeded in out-generalling and outwitting them. His decoys to make them believe that we were about to cross our main force at Port Conway, seem to have succeeded admirably. Completely deceived by these feints," &c. The unopposed crossing of the Rappahannock was evidently looked upon as a considerable triumph.

When General Burnside had obtained possession of Fredericksburg he found his further progress stopped by the Confederate army strongly posted and fortified on the south side of the city. It was now evident that if Burnside determined to cross the Rappahannock it had not been the intention of the Confederates to oppose him, or to prevent him occupying Fredericksburg, but to confront him when his large force would have to operate in a confined space, and when he would have a river in his rear and fortifications in his front. To remain inactive where he was would have been fatal to Burnside, and all that remained was to force the Confederate position, and compel the Southern army to retreat. The movements attempted on the 13th of December brought about the bloody battle of Fredericksburg, which a Northern writer describes as a "black day for the United States," and which the New York World says was the "frightfullest disaster of the war." At present we have no detailed accounts of the battle, except the Northern, which are, as usual, manifestly and utterly unreliable. Before the engagement we were told over and over again that the Federal forces were vastly superior to "the disorganized and beaten forces of the South," and that Burnside had an army scarcely inferior in numbers to the old Army of the Potomac. After the battle it is coolly stated that Burnside had only 40,000 men in action to oppose 200,000 Confederates strongly posted and commanded by the best generals of the South. If there were a particle of truth in this statement, which appears in the New York Herald, Burnside must have been mad, or a traitor, to fight against such odds. This estimate of numbers is, however, only an extraordinary specimen of Yankee misrepresentation. Burnside had more than 100,000 men under his command. What the Confederate force was we do not know, but there is no reason for supposing it exceeded 40,000 men, and some estimate it at much less. After the official declaration that the Federal force amounted to 800,000 men, it is supremely ridiculous to be told that the advance to Richmond was undertaken with 40,000 men. We direct special attention to this as a warning that not the slightest reliance is to be placed on the Northern narratives of the battle.

The fight commenced at daybreak; before noon the entire line was engaged, and the contest was maintained till dark. General Franklin's division, on the left, is reported to have advanced nearly a mile, but towards the close of the day it had to retreat. The main part of the Federal army was engaged in endeavouring to take the Confederate position on the heights commanding Fredericksburg. To approach the Confederate entrenchments the Federals had to cross a plateau, and, according to the Richmond Examiner, "our artillery had been brought into a position covering and completely commanding the open space upon which the enemy's troops would deploy in crossing." The Federals were mowed down by the artillery, and those that survived to charge, and who never got to within eighty paces of the entrenchments, were decimated with the deadly fire of the Confederate small arms. Several such charges were made in the course of the day with the like disastrous result. The Federals were repulsed at every point.

The loss of the Confederates is reported to be 1800 killed and wounded. The official report of the Federal loss gives 1100 killed, including two generals and a large number of officers, and 8000 wounded, including five generals. The Federal loss is unofficially estimated at from 20,000 to 30,000 killed and wounded, and the events subsequent to the battle show that the official report is understated. So frightfully had Burnside's army been cut up that on the 15th of December the Federal general issued orders to recross the Rappahannock, and this movement was effected in darkness and amid a shower of wind and rain. As soon as the army was on the north of the river the bridges were removed, and great satisfaction was expressed that the waters were rising so as to insure it against an attack from the Confederates. In another column we give General Lee's official report of the battle, dated the 17th of December, addressed to the Confederate Secretary of War.

The defeat at Fredericksburg produced great indignation in the North. Burnside is blamed for acting contrary to his judgment, and Mr. Lincoln is called upon to dismiss General Halleck and Mr. Stanton. It was rumoured that General McClellan had been sent for, and later, that General Burnside had offered to resign his command, and his resignation was refused. Washington and New York were panic stricken by the news of the defeat, and gold advanced to 33 premium. It seems probable that Mr. Lincoln will have to dismiss his Cabinet, but it is not likely that a change of Ministers will do more for the North than has been done by the frequent change of generals. A public meeting was called in New York, at which the leading merchants were announced as speakers, "to inform the Administration in regard to the people's sense of their misconduct of the war." The meeting has been postponed until the report of the Committee of Inquiry of the Senate has been published. Mr. Lincoln himself does not escape severe censure, and if he could be dismissed constitutionally, his term of office would be short. The defeat at Fredericksburg is the severest blow the Lincolnites have had. The failure of Burnside greatly encourages the Democrats, who have prophesied evil consequences from the removal of McClellan. The resignation of Mr. Seward has been spoken of in Washington.

Misfortunes seldom come alone. On the 14th of December the Federals, with 15,000 men and nine gunboats, attacked Kingston, North Carolina, and after some hours' fighting were beaten and driven back to their gunboats. This news is taken from Southern sources, and is not the less true because "it is semi-officially announced that the Federal Government has no news to warrant a belief in this report."

On the 9th of December the Confederates drove the Federals out of Plymouth, North Carolina, and damaged a Federal gunboat which was lying off the town.

The Confederates have also sunk the Federal gunboat Cairo, with torpedoes, on the Yazoo River.

It is now generally supposed in New York that Banks' expedition had gone to the Gulf, and will rendezvous at Ship Island. One transport has been wrecked, and two disabled vessels were found to be totally unseaworthy, and five vessels had put into Port Royal for repairs and supplies. This is not a very promising beginning. An inquiry is to be made into the contracts of these unseaworthy vessels, and if the inquiry is published, the public may have another proof of the official corruption in the United States.

President Davis has visited the army in Tennessee, and has made a speech at Knoxville, in which he spoke with the utmost confidence of the pending movements in Virginia. The President left Tennessee on the 16th of December to visit Mobile and the Army of the Mississippi.

On the 12th of December a troop of General Stuart's cavalry dashed into Dumfries, Virginia, captured some prisoners, and cut down the telegraph wires. What makes this affair somewhat significant is that Dumfries is between Burnside's headquarters and Washington.

Another brilliant cavalry exploit took place on the 14th of December. A body of Major White's cavalry went to Poolesville, Maryland, and captured some Federal soldiers.

In the Federal House of Representatives Mr. Conway (representative of Kansas) proposed a series of resolutions against the reconstruction of the Union upon the former basis, and further, that if the "rebellion" were not put down within a reasonable time, the "best interests of the country and humanity will require a cessation of hostilities." On the motion of Mr. Maynard, who correctly described the resolutions as "the first formal propositions asserting the dissolution of the Union and the recognition of the Southern Confederacy," the resolutions were tabled by 132 yeas to 1 nay, Mr. Conway being the only member who voted in the negative.

The Federal Senate has passed the Army Appropriation Bill, amounting to $731,000,000, for the support of the army until June 1864. This power of voting supplies a year and a-half in advance makes the Cabinet to some extent independent of the new Congress, and is a dangerous system.

Mr. Seward announces that he has enough diplomatic correspondence to fill another large volume, and if the unpublished volume is as comic as the published volume, it will, if given to the world, be highly amusing. Among the last extracts printed in the American papers, is a communication in which Mr. Seward deprecates the idea of England expecting to conquer the United States.

But what warrant have the British Government for expecting to conquer the United States, and to subjugate and desolate them, or to dictate to them terms of peace? A war waged against us by Great Britain could not fail to reunite our people. Every sacrifice that their independence could require would be cheerfully and instantly made, and every force and every resource which has hitherto been held in reserve in a civil war, because the necessity for immediately using it has not been felt, would be brought into requisition. I shall not willingly believe that Great Britain deliberately desires such a war, as I am sure that every honourable and generous effort will be made by the United States to avoid it.

On another occasion he indulges in a blasphemous observation about the scepticism in England with regard to the restoration of the Union.—

The account of public opinion and public feeling in England concerning our affairs which it contains harmonizes in all respects with Mr. Dayton's report that the statesmen of France, including the Emperor, are no less sceptical about the restoration of the Union since the capture of New Orleans than they were before. You tell me that in England they still point to the delays at Richmond and Corinth, and they enlarge upon the absence of displays of Union feeling in New Orleans and Norfolk. Ah, well! scepticism must be expected in this world in regard to new political systems, inasmuch as even Divine revelation needs the aid of miracles to make converts to a new religious faith.

ENGLAND.

There is very little news of importance in England or on the Continent this week. The distress in Lancashire does not increase; there has been a diminution of about 2600 in the number of paupers; and several of the Relief Committees also report a withdrawal of some hundreds from the list of those dependent on them. The poor-law return is a follows:—

(a). Eight unions have more:—

Paupers.		Paupers.
Chorlton ..	720	Saddleworth ..	90
Liverpool ..	390	Warrington ..	40
Macclesfield ..	110	Wigan ..	150

(b). One union is in respect of the amount of pauperism the same as in the previous week—Bolton.

(c). Twelve unions have less:—

FREDERICK PURDY, Statistical Department.

Poor Law Board, December 26.

It will be observed that again the chief increase is in the Manchester unions, while in some of the places which have suffered most severely, and notably in Ashton, Blackburn, and Stockport, trade seems to have undergone a faint revival. Well-informed men, however, affirm that the resuscitation is only galvanic, and will not last for many weeks; and the Economist seems disposed to retract its sanguine anticipations of coming plenty.

Lord Derby is still prevented by ill-health from taking the chair at the meetings of the Central Executive Committee. The last was held on Monday, when the following report was read:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my tabular report for the week ended Saturday, the 20th inst., will show you that there is a decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of 5163. This decrease of 5163 is explained as follows.—There is a decrease at Ashton-under-Lyne of 1265; Blackburn, 525; Burnley, 172; Bury, 452; Garstang, 17; Glossop, 33; Haslingden, 466; Leigh, 7; Oldham, 1357; Rochdale, 206; Saddleworth, 113; Salford, 81; Stockport, 1732; total, 5714. There is an increase at Barton-upon-Irwell of 7; Bolton, 20; Chorlton, 760; The Fylde, 51; Lancaster, 12; Macclesfield, 110; Manchester, 336; Preston, 88; Prestwich, 49; Warrington, 36; Wigan, 143; total, 1551; making a net decrease of 5163. I have received no returns from the clerks of the Unions of Chorley, Clitheroe, and Todmorden for the week ended the 20th inst., and I have therefore inserted in my tabular report their figures for the week ended the 13th inst., and I am unable to state whether there has been an increase or a decrease in either of those places. The figures entered for Oldham represent a decrease of pauperism as compared with the week ended the 6th inst., and those for Stockport are also compared with the same week. There were on the 20th inst., 264,417 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to. In the corresponding week of last year, 61,264 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 203,153 persons in receipt of parochial relief, or 331.6 per cent. The weekly cost of out-door relief on the 20th inst. was £18,745 8s. 7d. In the corresponding week of last year it was £3035 16s. 8d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £15,709 11s. 11d., or 517.4 per cent. The average percentage of pauperism in the population of these unions on the 20th inst. was 13.3; in the corresponding week of last year it was 3.1. The average amount of out-door relief per head per week, both in money and kind, in these unions on the 30th inst. was 1s. 5d.; the lowest was 1s. 0d., and the highest 2s. 7d. (at Burnley). Of the 264,417 persons receiving parochial relief on the 20th inst., 12,163 were in-door paupers. The amount of money in the hands of the treasurer of the above unions on the 20th inst. was £78,417 9s. 4d.; in the previous week the amount was £891,631 1s. 3d.

I am, my Lords and Gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

H. B. FARNALL, Special Commissioner.

P.S.—The decrease of 1782 paupers at Stockport is for a fortnight, there having been a decrease of 1040 for the week ended the 13th inst. as compared with the week ended the 6th inst. (and this decrease I alluded to in a postscript to my last report), and a further decrease of 742 for the week ended the 20th inst. as compared with the week ended the 13th inst. I have just received the return for the week ended the 20th inst. from the clerk of the Todmorden Union, but it came too late to be enclosed in my report. I may, however, state that a decrease of pauperism has taken place there during the week ended the 20th inst. as compared with the week ended the 13th inst.

We fear that all danger of sickness, in some of those epidemic forms which usually follow seasons of severe distress has not been averted by the recent increase in the scale of relief. Dr. Buchanan, sent down as Medical Inspector by the Privy Council, has just visited Bolton. He laid before the General Purposes Committee of the Board of Guardians a report, in which he states that during the last month or two, but especially in the last fortnight, cases of typhoid or gastric fever have been scattered through the town of Bolton in greater number than usual. He had notes of nineteen such cases in seven different houses since the beginning of December. In one house in Slater's-field six persons had been attacked with a very bad form of the disease, and the attacks had been at intervals, and appeared to show contagion. One of the six had died, a second was beyond hope of recovery, and two others were in a most critical state. Most of these persons had been treated at their own houses, and he had to submit to the Guardians that most of these cases should be removed from their homes into properly constructed wards. In so far as the fever was contagious, there was risk to other persons in treating it in the small and often crowded cottages of the poor; and in so far as it depended on any local condition there was far less chance of the patient himself if he remained at home. It was also material to observe that in some of the cases he had seen the peculiar severity of the fever seemed due to the low health of the person before his attack. It was of the utmost importance, in order to avoid epidemic fever, that the poor should be maintained at a good standard of health and strength. In compliance with the recommendations contained in this report the Guardians have opened fever wards in the work-house for the treatment of these cases.

The want of occupation for the operatives out of work is still a subject of general complaint, though a large number of the girls and young women have been provided for in sewing schools, and attempts are being made to open adult schools and reading rooms for the men.

Rumours have been afloat that some operatives have been offered work and refused it, preferring the alms received from the committees. We can conceive this to be true of the Irish and other hangers-on of the industry of Lancashire, but not of the regular factory hands. Those who have investigated the matter, on the part of the Leeds subscribers and of the Central Committee, discredit these stories altogether.

The provision of winter clothing and blankets does not go on quite so smoothly and rapidly as the Times' correspondent thinks it ought, and he is severe upon the shortcomings of the Committees. Their task is not an an easy one, and we believe, judging even from the statements of their critic, that they are getting on with business-like dispatch.

Christmas dinner tickets of 8d. each have been distributed to large numbers of the operatives at the expense of the Mansion-house fund. In some districts the amount was raised by the local committees to 1s. per head. Time was when such a Christmas dinner would have seemed as meagre to the operatives as to their employers.

Mr. Gladstone made on Saturday, at Chester, a speech, chiefly statistical, on the effects of the cotton famine. He stated the number of persons employed in the cotton manufacture throughout the country at 400,000. Of these he believed that one-eighth were in full work, three-eighths working short time, and one-half unemployed. There were of the unemployed and their families 250,000 paupers and 190,000 dependents of the Relief Committees; the whole 440,000 being relieved at a cost of about £44,000 weekly, or 2s. a head. There were, he thought no complaints from the recipients that this relief was insufficient, though at first, before the machinery for the collection and distribution of the national subscriptions was properly organized, the poor were very sorely pressed indeed. He mentioned that the loss to the revenue entailed by the cotton famine was at the rate of of £1,500,000 a year, that of wages reached £8,000,000 a year; the total loss to the country, he thought, must be estimated to exceed £12,000,000. The public subscriptions had already reached one-tenth of this amount, and might be expected to reach £1,500,000; whereas the sum hitherto expended must fall short of one-half the amount actually raised, so that they might look forward in cheerfulness to the absence of any new and great calamity to the remainder of the winter. Should the dreadful and sanguinary war which desolated America and threw the surplus of its curses upon Europe be brought to a close, a great and early relief might be expected; but, in any case, the administrators of public bounty would, it might be trusted, meet the spring with some considerable funds in hand. After paying an encomium to the suffering operatives for the manner in which they had borne their affliction, he said that as they had begun and continued, he hoped they would so persevere to the end. They had new forms of trial before them. They had passed from the condition of highly-paid labourers to that of receivers of relief, and thus they had done with no diminution but with an increase of respect and honour. They would, he hoped, soon pass back again from the condition of receivers of relief to that of highly-paid labourers. But this they could not do at once. A state of things was pretty certain to arise in which the range of prices, on which wages must depend, would be such as to enable their employers, or such of them as only bent but did not break before the storm, to offer low wages, but not such as to enable them to offer high ones. To accept these low wages, to commence again the workmen's career on a reduced and contracted footing, would be a new form of trial. Might they meet it as duty and not as pride would prompt them, and might it be their last.

We think that Mr. Gladstone may prove mistaken on this last point. If peace should be made in America before the planting season of this year, we believe that the supply of cotton and the demand for calico will be such as to ensure to the operatives full employment at full wages. Until peace is made we fear that there can be very little hope of any material improvement in the condition of Lancashire. We do not think that the manufacturers are disposed to put that trust in India and Egypt which is recommended by gentlemen who look at everything commercial and political through Abolitionist spectacles.

Mr. Charles Buxton has written a letter to the Times, vindicating his consistency as an Abolitionist in not sympathizing with the Federalists, and in desiring the termination of the war by the recognition of the Southern Confederacy. His arguments are just enough, only they are not new. Everybody knows that the North cares nothing for the negro, and it was hardly worth while to prove over again that the humanitarian pretences of Mr. Lincoln are sheer hypocrisy. Mr. Buxton proceeds:—

Two remarks more, and I will have done. First, it is said that the war must go forward because nature has drawn no line between North and South. Why, if the North offered peace on the basis of the status quo, then the two Powers would be divided between Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Kansas, on one side, and Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas, on the other.

Now, these States already stand clearly apart. For example, the Carolinian is in every way a Carolinian, though no river or mountain chain separates him from Virginia. He pays taxes in Carolina. He votes in Carolina. He makes and obeys or breaks the laws of Carolina. The rowdy, say of Roxborough, fights his duel, lynches his Abolitionist, commits his murder, and then is tried (unless he is not tried) by a Carolina Court, under Carolina law, and is hung (that is to say, is not hung), as he ought to be, by a Carolina Jack Ketch. The boundary is practically efficient.

We think these sentences prove that Mr. Buxton is still in the darkness of Abolitionist fanaticism. Virginia is Southern by military occupation as well as by character; admitting for a moment that Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri are perhaps debatable ground, no fair or honest mind can pretend, on any ground whatever, that the Old Dominion belongs to the North. Again, Mr. Buxton's remarks on the efficiency of State boundaries are just. But he is absurdly wrong in supposing that lynching an Abolitionist is an ordinary Carolinian sport. Game of that kind is too shy to be often found south of Mason and Dixon's line; a colder climate is more congenial to its temperament and its courage. Rowdies, too, are peculiar to the North and West; New York, Philadelphia, and New England swarm with them; you may meet them—but they are of Northern importation—in Baltimore, but hardly in the Carolinas. The only indigenous species of Southern rowdy inhabits the steamboats of the Mississippi and the towns on its bank, now in Federal keeping. And finally, when rowdies do commit a murder, Southern justice is only too glad to have an opportunity of hanging the offenders out of the way. The manly philanthropy which breeds garotters does not flourish in the Confederate States.

Sir W. Crofton, late Director of Convict Prisons in Ireland, has delivered a very important speech, calculated to direct into a right channel the agitation which is now going on for a reform of our system of secondary punishments. He points out the important fact that the system which is abused—that of granting tickets-of-leave to criminals, allowing them to be at large before the expiration of their sentence, on condition of good behaviour—has never been carried into effect in England. The truth is even worse than Sir Walter makes it. General Jebb, whom the Government has petted and favoured, while it snubbed and thwarted Sir W. Crofton, has contrived so to conduct our English convict prisons, that criminals are utterly unmanageable during their captivity, do no work, become more brutal and ferocious than before, undergo no deterrent suffering, and are released after two-thirds of their time has expired, unconditionally. They are not even obliged to work out the remainder of their old sentence when convicted of a new crime; and in some cases men sentenced to a long term of penal servitude for a felony have been released and re-convicted several times before the expiration of that term.

The system, of course, has proved a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. In Ireland the same law has been worked by rational and honest officials; the culprit undergoes a real punishment and a real probation, and his release is really conditional, and subjects him to police supervision, of which Sir J. Jebb will not hear in this country, but which is found to answer admirably in Ireland. Sir W. Crofton said, in the first place, to bring about a better state of things, they must, in the treatment of criminals, be more mindful of the deterring effects of punishment, and less careful to maintain the convict in high condition by food. They must, by exercising a discrimination in their system of training, endeavour to reconcile the public to employ the well-intentioned. Secondly, they must have a more minute classification of convicts, detaining the more grave offenders and those under long sentences in a special prison under more rigid discipline. This class was one which at this moment the public were desirous of sending from our shores; but as no colony would receive them, and no new settlement would take them off their hands, it would be best, he argued, to detain them until the expiration of the long sentences passed upon them. Thirdly, they must no longer allow twelve years' penal servitude to be considered a substitute for penal servitude for life. Fourthly, the public should have a safeguard against the conduct of the convict during the period of his sentence, which was now lost, by the enforcing of the conditions of the licence by the police. Fifthly, they must use the necessary appliances to have a system of records of former convictions produced in all cases against old offenders, thus entailing long sentences upon them, and thereby increasing the hazard of a criminal avocation. Sixthly, they must not only so arrange their system of deportation to Western Australia as to send the limited number she could now receive, but they must conduct it so as to increase the absorbing power of the colony.

A memorial in this sense, recommending the honest enforcement of the conditions attached to the ticket-of-leave, and the adoption of the Irish system of prison discipline, has been signed by some eminent authorities at Bristol, and forwarded to Sir G. Grey.

Several of the Bishops have addressed a formal protest to the railway companies against Sunday excursion trains—a proceeding which will not tend to increase the popularity of the Church among the working-class. The dissenters, however, are so much worse than the most bigoted Churchmen in this respect that they can hardly use this incident as a weapon of offence.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The Archbishop of Paris, an Ultramontanist, died on Monday last.

M. Fould's report on the financial condition of France has been printed in the Moniteur. There will be a financial deficit for the present year of 35,000,000*f.*, which is caused by the expenses attendant on the Mexican expedition, which is estimated at 83,000,000*f.* for 1862. Alluding to 1863, M. Fould calculates on a surplus of 110,000,000*f.*, which he estimates will meet the expenses for that year of the Mexican expedition, as well as any unforeseen expenses. The Budget of 1864 will be presented with a diminution of 4,000,000, and M. Fould states that were it not for the extraordinary expenses which weigh upon 1862 and 1863 it would have been possible to re-enter on a normal situation at the beginning of 1864, but which desirable result was only adjourned.

There are reports in Paris of an expected Congress or Conference of the protecting Powers to deliberate on the affairs of Greece.

ITALY.—General Garibaldi has returned to Caprera, still in a weak state, the suppuration from the wound in the ankle still continuing, and reducing his strength. His protracted convalescence may give him time to see clearly and judge calmly the terrible error which has ended so disastrously for himself and so disadvantageously for his country.

The new Ministry promise to make vigorous efforts to put down brigandage in Naples. It is said that transportation on a large scale is to be tried, its deterrent effects being found greater than in this country. The Neapolitans have always been averse to public executions, and fusillades have been already too freely employed.

The appeal of Mr. Bishop has been heard and dismissed. The man has behaved wrongly and foolishly, but he has been badly used, the legality of his condemnation is not quite clear, and M. Farini would do well to pardon him.

The Pope has begun to speak of reforms. This is progress; not long ago the very idea of improvement was pronounced not only damnable, but impracticable. Those who live long enough may possibly see the Roman Government a little ameliorated, but it must always be bad.

GERMANY.—The Prussian Chambers are to meet on the 14th. We shall see whether any change has taken place in their temper. If not, their reassembling bodes no comfort to the King, and no peace to the Ministry.

GREECE.—It appears certain that the popular vote for Prince Alfred has been all but unanimous. The disappointment will be severely felt, nor is it certain that the bribe of the Ionian Islands—even if realized—will be held to make amends. The Greeks have certainly a right to complain that Lord Russell has treated them unfairly.

THE EAST.

JAPAN.—There has been a revolution of some kind in this mysterious empire; but its nature and extent are as yet unknown. The most connected account represents it as a coup d'état on the part of the Mikado, or spiritual Prince and nominal Emperor, against the Tycoon, or hereditary Prime Minister and real Sovereign. Another statement says:—

The Government of His Majesty the Tycoon of Japan issued a notification at Jeddo, on the 19th October, to the effect that all Daimios or Princes (excepting only those of the blood Royal, and also those intrusted with the direction of affairs) should respectively withdraw to their Principalities.

Henceforth the Government make it no longer compulsory on them to reside at Jeddo; they will be called up once in three years to the metropolis for the space of 100 days.

The Princes Awarri, Mito, and Kishii, being of the blood Royal, they will reside at Jeddo by turns of one year each, one remaining while the other two are permitted to withdraw to their ancestral territories.

A further notification has been issued imposing sumptuary restrictions, and recommending economy both in clothing and living to the people of Japan, high and low.

A brother of the late Tycoon has been appointed Prince Regent since the demise of the late Emperor up to the present crisis. He belonged to the priesthood, but owing to his high consanguinity, coupled with his great talents, he has been summoned to this important post.

N.B. It is impossible to assign the true motives for such sudden and radical changes, but it does appear as though the Government of the Tycoon was much stronger than has hitherto been conceded. It is thought possible that greater liberality to foreigners may follow these events, and that a variety of restrictions hitherto imposed upon native traders may be gradually removed.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 31. 1862.

Our market closed for the Christmas holidays with an upward tendency. Fair Dhollerahs being worth 17½, and Middling Orleans 25d.

On Friday and Saturday, although the market was reported closed, a business of a few thousand bales was done at firm prices.

On Monday we opened with a very strong feeling; the trade and speculators both bought freely, and the sales reached 20,000 bales at ¼ to ½ advance and Fair Dhollerahs touched 18d.

On Tuesday the tone was more subdued, and a general indisposition was shown to operate until the declaration of the actual stock on hand to be made on the following day; the sales fell to 5000 bales at slightly easier prices.

To-day our market has received a shock from the result of stock-taking; the amount on hand turns out to be 100,000 bales over the estimate, of which 50,000 are American, this great excess arising, no doubt, chiefly from resales of spinners' cotton.

The effect has been to reduce business to a very narrow compass, and prices are in some cases ½d. lower. We quote Middling Orleans 24½d., and Fair Dhollerahs 17½d. to 17¾d.

A heavy import during the past week has swelled our stock to a larger amount than it has attained since the month of April last; it verges on 400,000 bales, and has now reached its maximum; from this time it must continuously decline, until reduced to a very low ebb in May or June next, when the new East India crop begins to arrive.

In America, interest has lately centred around the battle-field of Fredericksburg, where the Federals have again sustained a disastrous defeat. Its effect will be likely to end the winter campaign in Virginia, and force the Army of the Potomac into winter-quarters. Northern people, meanwhile, will base their hopes upon Banks's expedition, which seems to be destined for Western waters; and the cry "On to Vicksburg" will, ere long, supplant the "on to Richmond" of the past twelve months.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday December 30.

The demand for yarn and cloth during the past week has, been comparatively good, at gradually hardening prices, induced by the firmness exhibited in the Liverpool market.

Yarns from No. 32s. to 60s. Twist and pincops suitable for the home trade, have been enquired for, and an advance of about 1d. per lb. has been obtained for them.

Export yarns have also been sought after, but the firmness displayed by holders has rather tended to check business, still a moderate amount of transactions has taken place in water twist, warps, and doubled yarns at extreme rates.

Cloth is in better request at higher prices, both for the home trade and for shipping. The home houses having taken largely of shirtings for dyeing purposes, also printers and domestics.

For export the demand is more healthy than formerly, as a greater range of sorts are being picked up by shippers.

To-day our market has been quiet, as far as amount of business effected is concerned.

In yarns the disposition shown by buyers to operate, was checked by spinners asking an advance of from 1d. to 3d. per lb. on Friday's rates, this with the small sales in Liverpool of 5,000 bales, brought things to a stop for the day.

Cloth has also been affected by the same causes, and very little business has transpired.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

By a schooner that has successfully run the blockade from Wilmington, North Carolina, with a cargo of cotton, turpentine, and resin, for one of the West India Islands, we have files of Southern papers to the 24th of November.

Hon. William Ballard Preston, senator from Virginia, in the Confederate Congress, and one of the most highly respected men of that State, died on the 16th of November, at his residence in Montgomery county, Virginia.

Severe frosts on the nights of the 22nd and 23rd of November, had effectually destroyed the last vestiges of yellow fever at Wilmington, and rendered the city safe for visitors from the country.

No fears of an attack seemed to be entertained at the date of our advices, and the forts on the Cape Fear River are reported to be in an effective state of defence against a formidable force. Brigadier-General W. H. C. Whiting had been appointed to the command of the Wilmington District.

The schooner Harkaway, Captain Sabistan, with 540 sacks of salt, had run the blockade into Wilmington on the night of the 23rd. The steamer Kate, on the 22nd, bound from Nassau to the same port, ran upon some obstructions near Smithville, and partially sank. A Confederate guard was placed on board, the cargo secured, and on the 24th the extent of the damage was not known, but not believed to be very serious. According to the Charleston Courier twelve blockading vessels, among them the frigate Susquehanna, were watching the entrances to Charleston harbour on the night of the 21st, more than usual activity and signalling being observable on that night.

A telegram from Richmond dated the 20th states:—

General Joseph E. Johnson has been assigned to the command of the Western Department, composed of East and Middle Tennessee and the army of the Mississippi, which have been consolidated. Johnson's health is now fully restored.

About the position of the armies in the West a telegram of the same date from Mobile reads as follows:—

Mobile, November 20.

A letter in the Advertiser and Register, dated Abbeville, 15th, says:—The army has been on the qui vive for a week past, anticipating an attack from the enemy. To-day information was received that the Federals have retired some distance. From their movements, it is difficult to conjecture whether they meditate an attack upon Pemberton's army or not. It is certain they have advanced their forces from Jackson, Bolivar, and a portion from Corinth, to Lagrange and Grand Junction. At the latter place General Grant has established his headquarters. Our army occupy a position of great natural strength, are well fortified, and have been manifesting great impatience to advance upon the invading force. It is not thought probable that the enemy will hazard an engagement.

Despatches from Augusta, Georgia, give but little additional details of the repulse of the Federal gunboats, already announced through Northern sources, at Fort McAllister, near Genesis Point, on the Ogeechee River, near Savannah. The Southern accounts state that the fort sustained no injury, and that the loss of the Confederates was none killed, and only three slightly wounded.

The utmost confidence appeared to have prevailed at the date of our advices about the condition of affairs at Fredericksburg. Some doubt was entertained whether the enemy were really bent upon an attack at that point, but the preponderance of opinion inclined to the belief that the demonstration at Port Royal, eighteen miles below that city, was a mere feint. The army of General Lee was in excellent health and spirits and buoyant with confidence in a speedy and brilliant victory.

In regard to the supply of sugar, the Mobile Register obtains the most satisfactory assurances from its correspondents at Alexandria, Louisiana. It appears that the Federals are unable to cut off the communication with Western Louisiana, unless they succeed first in forcing the defences of the Red River; and this seems to have been the object of the gunboat expedition, of the complete failure and return of which we were last week informed by the telegraph. The Register's correspondent says:—

The steam-mills in Alexandria are in full blast, and turning out quantities of the best sugar that has been made for years. Port Hudson and Viessburg being securely held by the Confederate Government, it is believed that the Parish of Rapides can supply its armies with sugar, molasses, and a large quantity of corn, while Texas can furnish all the beef they require. In this connection the defences of Red River are of great importance. The planters are animated by the most patriotic spirit, and are ready to do all the work needed on fortifications without cost to the Government. Let the latter do its part with ordnance and the proper officers, and we will save that garden spot of the Southern Confederacy from the desolating clutches of the invader.

The next session of the Confederate Congress was to commence on the second Monday in January.

The Richmond Examiner of the 20th announces that an absence of vouchers for the sum of upwards of $1,500,000 has been discovered in the Medical Purveyor's Department. An official investigation, now progressing, will, it is believed, not reveal any criminality but informality and looseness, in the administration of the affairs of the Medical Purveyor's Department.

The directors of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad have declared a dividend of 11 per cent. on its capital stock, payable on and after the 1st of January. The directors of the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad have declared a dividend of 10 per cent. payable on and after the 22nd of November.

The Senate of the House of Commons of North Carolina met on the 17th inst., at Raleigh. We give elsewhere in extenso the Message of the Governor, which, among other points of interest, affords much information on the means by which the South has succeeded to so great an extent in replacing the supplies cut off by the blockade. The Message, and also the general tone of our exchanges evince a bitter, and not perhaps, according to European ideas, altogether justifiable feeling against those who are charged with having speculated upon the wants and necessities of the people during the war. Indeed, a resolution has been passed in the "House of Commons," which is the style of the popular branch of the North Carolina Legislature, "instructing an inquiry by the Judiciary Committee into the expediency of fixing a scale of prices for articles of prime necessity." By far the most interesting items in our Southern exchanges are those relating to the progress of the manufacturing industry, and the ingenuity with which substitutes are discovered for those articles which cannot be supplied.

From the Mobile Register we learn that the salt works in Clark County, Alabama, under the direction of the State authorities, are now turning out 1,000 bushels per day.

The Rockfish Manufacturing Company, in North Carolina, commended by the Governor in his Message, announces through the Wilmington Journal that having decided to comply with the terms of the Exemption Act passed by the Congress of the Confederate States, will sell their goods to merchants in North Carolina on the same terms as they furnish the State, on condition that the parties purchasing will enter into obligation to sell the same by the piece to consumers at a profit not exceeding five cents per yard. It is intended to confine their sales to one firm in each town.

Cards for the carding of cotton and wool, indispensable to the thrifty housewives who ply their handlooms while father, husband, and son are off to the wars, had at one time risen to fabulous prices. Although of exceedingly simple manufacture, the deficiency in steel wire, which enters mainly into their construction, had raised the retail price of these homely utensils from a few shillings to £5. A Georgia paper informs us that "Messrs. Divine, Jones, and Lee, who have established the manufactory of cards at Cartersville, Georgia, and who make thirty pairs a day, give one pair for five hard tanned sheep skins. They want the skins for making the cards. Any one can tell what is meant by 'hard tanned' by looking at the leather in which the card teeth are set in any pair of cards."

Soap and candles of home manufacture can be procured by those who are able to pay the war prices. To those who are not a correspondent of the Savannah Republican addresses the following "Practical Hints:—

Our fathers used little artificial lights. They preferred the cheap light of day. For this reason they went early to bed, and were all the more healthy and more wealthy for their practice. The chief light of their houses, like that of the houses of the nobility of England a few centuries back was a ruddy glare from the hearthstone.

1. Primitive Lights.—The earliest artificial illuminators of which we have any record, were lamps. These, at first, consisted of nothing more than a cup of oil or grease, with a wick lying against its side. Its shape was soon improved in convenience and elegance.

2. A Hastily Expedient Light.—The writer was one of a family party who were belated in the mountains of Georgia, and compelled to seek shelter with a family who owned neither lamp nor candle. Our ingenious hostess, however, devised a light for the table. It was by means of a slice of fat bacon (do not laugh, reader, I tell the simple truth). This slice was spread in the bottom of a saucer, and on this was laid some candle wick, the burning end of which was kept elevated by being passed through a tailor's thimble.

3. Rush Lights.—Among the poor of Europe a very cheap and easily made light is constructed of the ordinary bulrush stripped of its skin, except enough to hold the internal path together, and then saturated with suet or wax.

4. Confederate Candle.—This rivals the rush light in simplicity, and far exceeds it in serviceableness. To make it, melt together a pound of beeswax and a quarter of a pound of resin, or of turpentine fresh from the tree. Prepare a wick thirty or forty yards long, made up of three threads of loosely spun cotton. Saturate this well with the mixture, and draw it through your fingers to press it closely together, and to keep the size even. Repeat the process until the candle attains the size of a straw or quill, then wrap around a bottle, or into a ball with a flat bottom. Six inches of this candle elevated above the rest will burn for fifteen or twenty minutes, and give a very pretty light, and forty yards have sufficed a small family a summer for all the usual purposes of the bedchamber.

5. Lard Taper.—Equal to our mountain friend's bacon light in cheapness, and yet more pleasantly available for the necessities of the sick room, is a light made up of a saucer half full of lard, and a little wisp of spongy paper. The paper, twisted so as to form a short pointed wick with a broad base—say two thirds of an inch high, an inch broad—is set in the midst of the lard, and by the heat it generates, aided by the shelving sides of the saucer, keeps itself supplied with fuel until the lard is all consumed. The paper can be shaped on the point of one's finger, and the burning end twisted quite small. It should rest on the bottom, and the vessel should be shallow—a saucer, not a cup.

6. Lard Lamps.—At the present prices of illuminating material, the most economical by far for those who live in the interior, and far from gas, is lard. This requires a lamp whose wick tubes are of thick metal, for the purpose of conveying the heat of the flame into the midst of the lard, and keeping it melted around the wick. The lard must be melted when the lamp is lighted, or it will not burn well. The wick should be of several thicknesses of spongy cloth.

7. Lard Oil.—When combined with one-fifth part spirits of turpentine, will burn in an ordinary lamp and afford a beautiful light. To obtain the oil, enclose lard in a strong, close, canvas bag, and subject to gradually increased pressure. The indurated mass left in the bag is not injured for culinary purposes.

8. Candles of Tallow and Prickly Pear.—Whoever can command tallow for candles will greatly improve them in firmness and in illuminating power, by combining with it a few leaves of the prickly pear, in the proportion of about one part by weight of the last, to four or five of the first. The leaves should be kept in the heated tallow until all commotion ceases, and until the tallow itself reaches the boiling point. Of course, the heated mixture will need straining. It is said by those who profess to know, that the longer tallow is boiled the whiter it becomes in case it is not burned; but to avoid burning, the vessel containing the tallow should be heated in a sand bath (another vessel partly filled with sand) and not set immediately on the fire.

9. Wax Candles.—Beeswax gives a light almost equal to sperm. It may be moulded like the tallow candles, or it may be rolled by enveloping the wick in a thin stratum of wax spread on a board, and afterwards smoothed evenly by rolling between two boards. The combination of wax and tallow need not be suggested.

10. Wax and Resin. mixed in equal proportions, affords an excellent light, though liable to smoke unless supplied with a suitable sized wick.

11. Myrtle Wax. is obtained by boiling the berries of the swamp myrtle, on which is to be seen a greenish-white cover. The myrtle is found abundantly in all our seaboard counties, and has been seen by the writer as far inland as Macon and Forsyth. Its favourite locality is swampy though not wet ground. The berries should be boiled in a bag, and the clarified wax, which is of a pretty green colour, mixed more or less largely with tallow.

12. The value of our ordinary pine tree as an illuminator remains yet to be developed. Camphine is nothing more than the highly volatile spirits of turpentine; it is that part of the spirit which rises from the still after heating the virgin gum. That which comes after is more or less mixed with the heavier resin. Burning fluid is made by mixing camphine (or even the purer varieties of spirits of turpentine) with four or more times its bulk of alcohol. The high price of alcohol has arrested the manufacture of burning fluid; but the camphine remains as abundant as ever in the pine forests of the whole South, and awaits only the magic touch of some one who will devise a plan for rendering it explosive, to furnish the country with one of the best and cheapest lights. Will not somebody try? Rosin is the inspissated juice of the gum remaining in the still after the volatile part, or spirit, has been separated by heat. It has resisted all efforts hitherto made to mould it into candles or to use it in lamps being too hard for one and too soft for the other; and, moreover, it burns with a dense and unpleasant smoke. But the smoke may be consumed by attaching a glass chimney with a strong draught, when a flame is produced almost as brilliant as that of kerosene, and no doubt a suitable lamp for it can be constructed. I venture the prediction that it is yet to be used as an illuminator, in other ways than at the gas-works.

With one more characteristic extract we must conclude for this week our gleanings from the Southern press. One of our exchanges says:—

The old negro drummer, Jordan, of historic fame as a drummer at the battle of New Orleans, in conformity with the order of Beast Butler, handed in a complete list of his property for confiscation by the Lincoln Government, and declared himself "an enemy of the United States."

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, December 30.

In one of his most splendid orations Cicero drew with even more than his usual power, a forcible picture of the all absorbing power of war, and pointed out that arts, eloquence, and even the majesty of law, sank into insignificance amid the din of arms. What was true then is true now. How can I hope to interest your readers with a sketch of the empty gossip at Paris, with a description of toys, of etrennes and other falsities, at a time when their every thought carries them across the Atlantic—when that gloomy battle field on the banks of the Rappahannock, with its mounds of slain, and lugubrious heaps of wounded must be present to their mind—when the distracting thought that a friend, a brother, a son, a husband may be among the victims of that last fearful butchery. The touching lines of Tennyson will have occurred with painful force to more than one of your readers when the news first came of that battle on the 13th, and the recollection flitted across their mind of the gay scenes in which they may have been mixing at the very moment when one dear to them was sent to his last account,—

O father wheresoe'er thou be,
Who pledgedst now thy gallant son,
A shot ere half thy draught be done
Hath still'd the life that beat from thee.

Well wishers to the Southern cause, and deeply convinced of its justice, as are nine-tenths of Englishmen in and out of England, the satisfaction they must feel at this last Southern victory is diminished by the reflection that this last scene in the bloody tragedy might have been avoided, had our Government joined France in her late offer of mediation between the contending parties. But whatever may be the feeling in England, what must be that in the Federal States, when they acquire the conviction that the late battle was but the last desperate effort of the Republican faction, to regain by means of a battle, (which even had they gained, it would not have altered the relative position of North and South) the political influence and prestige of which the triumph of the Democratic party in the elections has deprived them. The political character of the late battle is very clearly pointed out by an excellent letter from New York, in the Moniteur, which shows that the Cabinet at Washington deliberately resolved to risk the destruction of their only army worthy of the name, in the hope of regaining popularity by means of a victory, and of silencing the growing aspirations for peace, by the resentment and mortification of a defeat. It is satisfactory to think that they have overshot the mark. Although you will have received, in all probability, a detailed account of the discomfiture of Burnside, nevertheless, I make no apology for transcribing in extenso, the able letter in the Moniteur, as besides its important political revelations, it sets forth with admirable lucidity, the utter incompetency of Northern generals. The letter is dated the 13th inst., and runs thus:—

Our provisions that in crossing the Rappahannock the Army of the Potomac was rushing to its destruction, have been realized; the river has been crossed, the battle has been fought, and is perhaps raging at the very time we are now writing. But with all its discretion, the telegraph is unable to conceal the whole truth—victory deserts the Federal arms. The extent of the disaster remains to be ascertained. Details are still wanting, and what is more, we cannot expect them for some time, as the telegraphic wire passes through the War Office at Washington. But there are some questions of the highest importance which suggest themselves even at the present stage of our information, and which are calculated to bring out some of the important features in the military drama which is just now being played out. These questions are in everybody's mouth at New York.

How comes it, then, that this disaster, foreseen from a distance by men who, reduced to follow the march of the army on the map in their study, have but random information and incomplete details, should not have been detected, touching by the finger, avoided by generals and officers used to warfare, accustomed to the enemy's manœuvres, and who had but to turn their glasses in the direction of Fredericksburg and its heights to measure the difficulties they had to contend with? A great many people complain at New York and other cities of the Union of the inferiority of Northern generals when compared with their adversaries. It is certain that the events of the war have afforded grounds for those reprobations. The Southern general Lee has given proofs of his remarkable talents for manœuvring, of his being able to handle 100,000 men; he has shown himself a skilful strategist, possessing that rapid coup d'œil necessary to vary and dispose his resources so as to meet the requirements of the war. On the other hand, "Stonewell" Jackson has shown himself a bold and safe commander, well adapted to carry out the boldest undertaking, and able to execute at the head of large divisions perilous but decisive movements.

It would, however, be unfair to pretend that in the Federal staff they have not found adversaries occasionally (parfois) worthy of their steel. The Army of the Potomac in particular numbers in its ranks divisional commanders who have given unquestionable proof of talent in the battle-field. Hooker, Sigel, Franklin, Burnside himself, are officers who may score more than one successful action, and who, in partial engagements, have roughly taught the Southerners that they were not to be trifled with. How is it, once more, that so many experienced eyes should not have detected the insurmountable obstacle against which the Army of the Potomac was about to dash itself to pieces? How many warning signs there were that should have opened their eyes. The past was full of lessons of sanguinary eloquence. The Southern generals have seldom varied their tactics. To attract their enemies as far as possible from their basis of operations, to weary them by protracted watching, to exhaust them by broken up-roads, scanty provisions, and other difficulties, which, on the contrary, diminished for them as they fell back on their own roadways, and places d'armes, and then at the last moment to engage a battle with every chance in their favour, such has been the unvarying system of the Confederate leaders. That plan has been strictly adhered to in the present campaign from the day when McClellan, driven forward by importunities from Washington, assumed an offensive attitude. General Lee, whose bivouac stood almost at the gates of the capital, and had, throughout the latter part of the autumn, stationed his head-quarters, his depots, and his heavy guns at Winchester, in Virginia,—that is to say, barely twenty miles from the outskirts of Washington, General Lee suddenly vanished and slowly retired without offering any resistance before the enemy's advance. McClellan by no means concealed from himself that this retrograde movement was merely a repetition of the system which the Confederates had already found answer so well—to fight him only on their own ground. He, who had seen the smoke of Richmond fires from his tent, knew what deceptions such a retreat concealed. Therefore he only advanced step by step and reluctantly as it were, and that was the most serious charge against him when he was removed from his command.

On this side of the Atlantic, the week has passed off with the most provoking tranquillity. The Greek question continues unsettled, but does not seem to excite the slightest interest. The Greeks have voted for Prince Alfred with praiseworthy unanimity, and like the Irish lover will take no denial. The cession of the Ionian Islands continues one of the puzzles of the day. Under the same head is to be included M. Fould's financial report, the only clear feature of which is, that the accounts for 1862, show an excess of thirty-five millions of francs of expenditure over receipts, but which has been received with satisfaction in so much that it declares that no loan will be necessary.

The Ultramontane party has lost one of its champions (great, chiefly, by his vis inertiae) the Archbishop of Paris. He died full of honours but not of years, having only just completed his 67th year. The appointment of his successor will, it is thought, afford a clue to the Imperial policy. There are many candidates in the field, the chief being Cardinal de Bonald, Archbishop of Lyons, who is not only more Ultramontane than the Pope himself, but also a Legitimist, and M. Landriot, Bishop of La Rochelle, who supports the "liberties of the Gallican Church" against Papal encroachments. The late Monseigneur Morlat is the first Archbishop of Paris who has died a natural death since 1848. In that year Monseigneur Affie was killed by a chance shot at the barricades of the Faubourg St. Antoine, and his successor, Monseigneur Sibour, was murdered at the altar by a fanatical priest.

The whole of the Paris population is, however, just now absorbed by the jour de l'an, and giving and receiving etrennes is the order of the day. The custom is as old as the Romans, but the fashion is reversed. Then inferiors used to propitiate their patrons by presents, now employers and patrons are expected to make themselves agreeable to their subordinates, and however they may grudge it, inexorable custom leaves them no choice.

How many must envy Cardinal Dubois, who, before the levelling principles of '89, reduced France to an uniform standard of equality was able to reply to his butler, who applied for his New-Year's perquisites, "Monsieur, je vous donne tout ce que vous m'avez volé dans l'année." But even in these days those who had sufficient strength of mind to resist the tribute were not popular, as is shown by an epitaph on a notorious miser, under the reign of Louis XV.:—

Ci-git dessoussé marbre blanc
Le plus avare homme de Rennes
Qui trepassa le dernier jour de l'an
De peur de donner des etrennes.

There is no news from Italy—from Germany vague reports of a coolness between Prussia and Austria which displays itself in rather warm diplomatic notes—Denmark continues to be favoured with bullying despatches by England, and according to the latest accounts has been suffering from a similar infliction on the part of Russia.

The next great event anticipated is the speech which the Emperor may possibly make to the Corps Diplomatique on Thursday, and should all then pass off quietly, nothing startling is expected until the meeting of the French Chambers, when the Emperor will, as usual, deliver urbis et orbi a speech, the world will eagerly scan to discover, assurances that will satisfy the general craving for peace.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

The following is General Lee's report of the battle of Fredericksburg:—

Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia,
December 14.

The Honourable Secretary of War, Richmond, Va:—
Sir,—On the night of the 10th instant the enemy commenced to throw three bridges over the Rappahannock, two at Fredericksburg, and the third about a mile and a quarter below, near the mouth of the Deep Run. The plain on which Fredericksburg stands is so completely commanded by the hills of Stafford, in possession of the enemy, that no effectual opposition could be offered to the construction of the bridges or the passage of the river without exposing our troops to the destructive fire of his numerous batteries. Positions were therefore selected to oppose his advance after crossing. The narrowness of the Rappahannock, its winding course and deep bed, afforded opportunity for the construction of bridges at points beyond the reach of our artillery, and the banks had to be watched by skirmishers. The latter, sheltering themselves behind the houses, drove back the working parties of the enemy at the bridges opposite the city; but at the lowest point of crossing, where no shelter could be had, our sharpshooters were themselves driven off, and the completion of the bridge was effected about noon on the 11th.

In the afternoon of that day the enemy's batteries opened upon the city, and by dark had so demolished the houses on the river bank as to deprive our skirmishers of shelter, and, under cover of his guns, he effected a lodgment in the town. The troops which had so gallantly held their position in the city under the severe cannonade during the day, resisting the advance of the enemy at every step, were withdrawn during the night, as were also those who, with equal tenacity, had maintained their post at the lowest bridge.

Under cover of darkness and a dense fog, on the 12th, a large force passed the river and took position on the right bank, protected by their heavy guns on the left.

On the morning of the 13th, his arrangements for attack being completed about 9 o'clock, the movement veiled by a fog, he advanced boldly in large force against our right wing, General Jackson's corps occupied the right of our line, which rested on the railroad; General Longstreet's the left, extending along the heights to the Rappahannock, above Fredericksburg; General Stuart, with two brigades of cavalry, was posted in the extensive plain on our extreme right. As soon as the advance of the enemy was discovered through the fog, General Stuart, with his accustomed promptness, moved up a section of his horse artillery, which opened with effect upon his flank, and drew upon the gallant Pelham a heavy fire, which he sustained unflinchingly for about two hours.

In the meantime the enemy was fiercely encountered by General A. P. Hill's division, forming General Jackson's right, and after an obstinate combat repulsed. During this attack, which was protracted and hotly contested, two of General Hill's brigades were driven back upon our second line. General Early, with part of his division, being ordered to his support, drove the enemy back from the point of woods he had seized and pursued him into the plain until arrested by his artillery.

The right of the enemy's column, extending beyond Hill's front, encountered the right of General Hood, of Longstreet's corps. The enemy took possession of a small copse in front of Hood, but were quickly dispossessed and repulsed with loss.

During the attack on our right the enemy was crossing troops over his bridges at Fredericksburg, and massing them in front of Longstreet's line. Soon after his repulse on our right he commenced a series of attacks on our left, with a view of obtaining possession of the heights immediately overlooking the town. These repeated attacks were repulsed in gallant style by the Washington Artillery, under Colonel Walton and a portion of McLaws' division, which occupied these heights.

The last assault was made after dark, when Colonel Alexander's battalion had relieved the Washington Artillery, whose ammunition had been exhausted, and ended the contest for the day.

The enemy was supported in his attacks by the fire of strong batteries of artillery on the right bank of the river, as well as by the numerous heavy batteries on the Stafford heights.

Our loss during the operations, since the movements of the enemy began, amounts to about 1800 killed and wounded. Among the former I regret to report the death of a patriotic soldier and statesman, Brigadier General Thomas R. R. Cobb, who fell upon our left; and among the latter that brave soldier and accomplished gentleman, Brigadier General M. Gregg, who was very seriously, and, it is feared, mortally wounded during the attack on our right.

The enemy to-day has been apparently burying his dead. His troops are visible in their first position in line of battle, but, with the exception of some desultory cannonading and firing between skirmishers, he has not attempted to renew the attack.

About 550 prisoners were taken during the engagement, but the full extent of his loss is unknown.

I have the honour to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,
R. E. LEE, General in Command.

MESSAGE OF HIS EXCELLENCY GOVERNOR ZEBULON B. VANCE, TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The Honourable, the General Assembly:—

Certainly, a Legislature has never been convened in the State of North Carolina to protect greater interests or meet greater responsibilities.

Eighteen months ago, when the State entered into the war which is now waging, all was life and buoyancy and excitement. The novelty of our undertaking, and the enthusiasm of our people in support of our cause, not only rendered the course of the Legislature and the Executive easy, but actually preceded and marked it out. But the long continuance of the contest, the slaughter of our soldiers, the occupation of our territory by the enemy, the destruction of our homes, and the blockaded condition of our coast, have reduced us to straits, and given rise to a class of evils, in the presence of which ephemeral patriotism must perish, and the tinsel enthusiasm of novelty give place to that stern and determined devotion to our cause which alone can sustain a revolution.

It now becomes the duty of you, the General Assembly, to set an example to your constituents of firmness, prudence, determination, and energy; to correct the errors of the past, to provide for the exigencies of the future, and to use well and wisely the power vested in your body by the Constitution, for the protection of our rights and liberties.

The subject of first importance is the prosecution of the war, and the means of defending our State against the invasion of the enemy. The Legislature, by several acts in 1861, provided that, in case the Confederate Government should fail or neglect to provide for the defence of North Carolina, the Governor should be authorized to raise a certain number of troops for that purpose, and made appropriations of money for their support. Impressed with the defenceless condition of our eastern counties when I came into office, I had fully determined to avail myself of this authority, and would have proceeded at once to do so, but for the intervention of insurmountable difficulties. The principal of these was the Conscrip Law passed by the Confederate Congress subsequent to the passage of the several acts referred to. By this law, as extended in its provisions a short time before the adjournment of Congress, all able-bodied men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years became liable to enrolment as soldiers of the Confederate States. To raise an adequate force for State defence from our citizens beyond the age of forty-five, and submit to this vast drain besides, I thought entirely impracticable. I hoped, too, that by aiding and assisting in the execution of the conscription law, I would be effectually providing for State defence. This reasonable hope has, I regret to say, been disappointed; and although North Carolina has a greater extent of sea-coast than any other State she has fewer troops given her for its defence.
